THE History of Union and Middlesex Counties, although chiefly a compilation, contains much original matter. It has been the aim of the editor and of his assistants to investigate all original sources of information relating both to the general and local histories of the Counties, and to give due credit for all that has been borrowed, from whatever source. The authorities which have been consulted are numerous, embracing many volumes of history and historical collections, and an almost endless variety of lesser papers and documents, public and private, descending to the minutest details of social, ecclesiastical, and family records, and covering a period of two hundred and fifty years. That all this matter could be handled and wrought into a volume so comprehensive and exhaustive as the one now before the reader, without any errors or mistakes, would be too much to expect of human vigilance and skill, especially when exercised within the limits prescribed to the compilers. We have done the best we could under the circumstances. The volume doubtless contains some errors, but we trust that none of them are of so grave a character as to impair the general accuracy and value of the history.

Materials have been found for a somewhat larger volume than was originally contemplated in the prospectus. Indeed, such might naturally have been expected from counties so ancient and important as Union and Middlesex,—counties containing the first English settlements in East Jersey, the seats of the Proprietary and Colonial Governments, and the scenes of some of the most stirring and important events of the Revolutionary period. But the work might have been swollen to much larger dimensions, and yet been of less value. For, while it has been the endeavor of the editor to so condense the material introduced as to eliminate all trashy or worthless matter, he has been no less solicitous to conserve all important and valuable information relating to the counties.

The authorities consulted in the volume are chiefly referred to in foot-notes. Due credit has been given in most instances for the borrowed matter. The only exception to this rule is in some cases where assistant writers in furnishing matter to the editor were not sufficiently careful to indicate the sources whence they derived this data. It was afterwards found impossible to accurately insert the proper quotation marks. This explanation will show that, whatever may be the seeming, there has been no intentional plagiarism.

Dr. Hatfield's "History of Elizabeth, New Jersey," has been, with his permission, freely used, and has furnished much valuable material relating to Union County and to the Borough and City of Elizabeth.

In Middlesex County there is no better historical authority than the gentleman whose accurate and graceful pen has furnished matter for some of the most important chapters in that department of the work,—Mr. Charles D. Deshler, of New Brunswick. Mr. Deshler's name is a sufficient guarantee that his part of the work at least has been well done. We acknowledge our indebtedness to him for valuable information and assistance in many ways, also to Dr. Cook, State Geologist, to Professor Smock, and to the members of the press and the county and local officials generally. The countenance and assistance of these gentlemen, and others, have greatly lightened our task in compiling the volume which is herewith submitted to the intelligent judgment of our readers.

HISTORY OF UNION AND MIDDLESEX COUNTIES, NEW JERSEY.

UNION COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

DISCOVERY AND OCCUPATION OF NEW NETHERLAND.

UNION COUNTY, although not organized under this name until the year 1857, embraces territory very anciently known and occupied by Europeans. That portion of it lying along the western shores of Achter Kull, or Newark Bay, was discovered, together with the North River and the Bay of New York, by Henry Hudson and his companions in 1609. Hudson was an Englishman by birth, and previously to sailing upon this voyage had made two trips to America under the auspices of English merchants, with a design of discovering a northwest passage to China and the Indies. Failing in these adventures, but not discouraged, although his former patrons refused to supply him with a vessel for another voyage, he applied to the rivals of the English, the Dutch East India Company of the United Netherlands, by whom he was fitted out with a two-masted "Vlie-boat" of eighty tons burden, called the "Half-Moon." This adventurous craft, manned by twenty men, part of whom were Dutch and part English, anchored in Sandy Hook Bay on the 3d of September, 1609.

Three days later, on Sunday, September 6th, the eye of the adventurous stranger from the Old World first rested on the goodly spot afterwards chosen by the Elizabeth Town Associates as the site of the first colony planted in Union County. The discoverers were John Coleman and four others, whom Hudson had sent in a boat through the Narrows to explore the harbor, and who, after finding "very good riding for ships, and a narrow river to the westward between two islands," which they entered and followed a distance of "two leagues to an open sea," must have seen directly before them across that sea, which was Newark Bay, the shores of that beautiful location chosen at a later time for the first English settlement in East Jersey. The journal of the voyage, kept by Juet, says, "The Lands were as pleasant with Grasse and Flowers and goodly Trees as any they had seene, and very sweet smells came from them."

Coleman was slain the same day, on his return, by the treacherous arrow of a native, and his body was buried on Sandy Hook, at a place which still bears the name of Coleman's Point. Probably these hostile savages were of a different tribe from those who met Hudson in so pleasant a manner at his first landing, whom the journalist describes as "Very glad of our coming, and brought greene Tabacco, and gaue vs of it for Kniues and Beads. They go in Deere skins loose, well dressed. They haue yellow Copper. They desire Cloathes, and are very ciuill. They haue great store of Maiz or Indian Wheate, whereof they make good bread. The Countrey is full of great and tall Oakes."

The day following some of the crew landed, who "saw great store of Men, Women, and Children, who gaue them Tabacco at their coming on Land. So they went vp into the Woods, and saw great store of very goodly Oakes, and some Currants. One of them came aboard, and brought some dried. Many others also came aboard, some in Mantles of Feathers, and some in Skinnies of diuers sorts of good Furies. Some women also came with Hempe. They had red Copper Tabacco pipes, and other things of Copper they did weare about their neckes."¹

Returning again through the Narrows, Hudson cast anchor on the 11th of September in the harbor of New York, "and saw it was a very good harbor for all winds." His first landing appears to have been at a point about six miles up on the New York side.

Having thus familiarized himself with the bays and inlets about Manhattan, he prepared next to explore the noble river which bears his name, and which he still hoped might be the long-sought passage to the Indies. With what feelings of joy this thought must have inspired him for a time, and how great must have been the disappointment when he found the river gradually growing less and less navigable, and saw before him the lofty mountain ranges among which it had its source! The precise point at which he terminated his voyage northward is not material, though it is believed that he stopped at a point in what is now the town of Half-Moon, in Saratoga County, some eight or ten miles above Albany.¹ He returned on the 2d of October, and in consequence of an attack from the Indians at the head of Manhattan Island, "he bore gradually across the river, and anchored in Weehawken Cove, just above Castle Point."² On the 4th, with fair weather and a northwest wind, he weighed anchor, passed through the Kills to Amboy, and then stood out to sea."

Occupation of New Netherland.—The report of Hudson's discovery on his return to Holland created a great stir among the merchants. It had opened a new field for trade which they were eager not only to occupy, but to monopolize. In 1610, it appears that at least one ship was sent hither by the East India Company for the purpose of trading in furs, which it is well known continued for a number of years to be the principal object of commercial attraction to this part of the New World. Five years after Hudson's voyage, a company of merchants, who had procured from the States-General of Holland a patent for an exclusive trade on Hudson River, had built forts and established trading-posts at New Amsterdam (New York), Albany, and the mouth of the Rondout Kill. The latter was a small redoubt on the site of what is now a part of the city of Kingston, N. Y. It was known as the "Ronduit," from whence comes the name of Rondout.³ The fort near Albany was upon Castle Island, immediately below the present city, and the one at New York was erected on what is now the Battery. It was finished and occupied later than the others, on account of the hostility of the "fierce Mannhattans," who were not disposed to allow the Dutch to gain possession of the island. On the expiration of the grant of the United Company of New Netherland, the States-General refused to renew it, but they continued to trade thither until 1623 or 1624, when the Dutch West India Company, a powerful mercantile association chartered in 1621, took possession of the lands temporarily granted to their predecessors. In 1624, Peter Minuit was appointed Director of New Netherlands, built Fort Amsterdam, and brought over colonists who settled on Long Island. Staten Island and Manhattan were purchased of the Indians, and up to 1629 the settlements were merely trading-posts. In that year the West India Company's Council granted to certain individuals extensive seigniories or tracts of land with feudal rights over the lives and persons of their subjects. Under this grant Kilian Van Rensselaer, a pearl-merchant of Amsterdam, secured in 1630 and subsequently a tract of land twenty-four by forty-eight miles in extent, composing the present counties of Albany, Rensselaer, and part of Columbia, and other wealthy patroons obtained large grants for similar seigniories in other portions of New Netherland.

The Dutch at the same time were engaged in colonization on the Delaware, which they called the South River, and regarded as a part of New Netherland. This river had also been discovered by Henry Hudson, who sailed into it a short distance prior to entering New York Bay. The West India Company attempted to settle this portion of their colony as early as the portion on the North River, and to put it all under the government at New Amsterdam. In 1623 the company dispatched a ship under the command of Cornelius Jacobse Mey, with settlers fully provided with means of subsistence and with articles of trade. Mey entered the Delaware Bay, and gave his name to the northern cape,—Cape May. After exploring the river he landed, and effected a settlement below Camden, erecting Fort Nassau on a small stream called by the natives Sassackon.

On the 12th of December, 1630, David Pieterse de Vries left the Texel in command of another vessel, and arrived on the Delaware in the course of the winter. He found none of the Europeans who had preceded him, and Fort Nassau had fallen into the hands of the Indians. Misfortune also awaited the new settlers. Having erected a fort, the commander returned to Holland; and during his absence a feud arose with one of the native tribes which at length terminated in the massacre of every one of the colonists. De Vries returned shortly afterwards with a new company, and was only saved from a similar fate by the kindness of an Indian woman. Disheartened by repeated disasters, the colony soon after abandoned the country, and for some years not a single European was left upon the shores of the Delaware. The Swedes next visited it, but into their history it is not our purpose here to enter.

De Vries, having been driven from the Delaware, next turned his attention to the Hudson, where in a few years he became an influential patroon of New Netherland.

About 1640 he purchased of the Indians a tract of about five hundred acres at Tappan, to which he gave the name of "Vriesendaël." "It was beautifully situated along the river-side, sheltered by high hills; and the fertile valley through which wound a stream, affording handsome mill-seats, yielded hay enough spontaneously for two hundred head of cattle. Buildings were soon erected, and Vriesendaël became for several years the home of its energetic owner."

The first attempt was made to plant a colony at Achter Kull, at the close of the year 1651. The policy of the Dutch government had been to encourage the settlement of colonies or manors similar to the lordships and seigniories of the Old World by men of large fortunes, known as patroons, to whom peculiar privileges both of trade and government were accorded. These manors were of great extent, and their proprietors were looked upon as an order of nobility, much like the old barons of the feudal period. The most desirable tracts, both on the North and South Rivers, had thus been colonized principally by several shrewd and enterprising directors of the Amsterdam Chamber of the West India Company. The whole of the neck opposite New Amsterdam, as far as the Kills and Newark Bay, together with Staten Island, had been appropriated for years.

Directly west of these colonies stretched for miles along the waters of Achter Kull, and the estuary to the west of Staten Island, one of the most inviting regions in all New Netherland. To this land was now directed the eager attention of the Hon. Cornelis Van Werckhoven, one of the schepens of Utrecht, in Holland. He duly notified the Amsterdam Chamber of his intention to plant two colonies or manors in New Netherland. A commission was thereupon given to Augustine Heermans, of Bohemia, who had made New Amsterdam his home since the year 1633, and had become an influential and wealthy citizen, to purchase these lands from the natives. Accordingly Heermans negotiated with the resident proprietors, and purchased for Van Werckhoven the whole of the tract, extending from "the month of the Raritan Creek westerly up unto a creek, Mankackewachky, which runs northwest up into the country, and then from the Raritan Creek aforesaid northerly up along the river behind States Isle unto the creek, namely, from the Raritan Point, called Ompoge,¹ unto Pechciesse, the aforesaid creek, and so the said creek Pechciesse up to the very head of it, and from thence direct westerly throwe the Land until it meets with the aforesaid Creek and Meadow Ground called Mankackewachky aforesaid."²

Possession was given, and the trees in each hook of the tract were marked with the initials of Werckhoven. The land thus described included the region west of Staten Island, from the Raritan to the Passaic Rivers, and extended back into the country indefinitely.³

Three other tracts, one to the south of the Raritan, and two on Long Island, were purchased for the same good old Dutchman, with the hope of large gains from each. But objection having been made on the part of other as greedy speculators against the accumulation of so much territory in the hands of one owner, the case was referred to the Amsterdam Chamber, who decided that Van Werckhoven could retain but one of the tracts in question. He chose to locate himself on Long Island, and so commenced there the colony of New Utrecht, so named from his native city in Holland. The title to the land above described reverted, therefore, to the original owners.⁴

CHAPTER II.

ATTEMPTS TO COLONIZE ACHTER KULL UNDER THE DUTCH RULE.

THE lands about Achter Kull and on the Raritan attracted the attention of people in New England and on Long Island, and desiring to found an English colony there, they applied to Governor Stuyvesant for a grant of land. The circumstances which led to the application were these: Certain New Englanders from the colony of New Haven, living on the poor and barren soil of Long Island, where they could scarcely gain a subsistence, were desirous of exchanging their situation for the more promising lands of this section of New Jersey. They may also have been actuated by political reasons. Charles II. had been restored to the throne of England, May 29, 1660, and it was but natural that the people of New England, who under the Protectorate had enjoyed the utmost freedom in the administration of their civil affairs, should feel some misgiving as to the security of their rights and liberties. They had, indeed, good reason to apprehend a serious conflict with the new government, and it was with extreme reluctance, especially on the part of the colonists of New Haven, among whom republican sentiments had been most fully developed, that they consented to proclaim the new monarch and to congratulate him on his accession to the throne. It was at this time that the thoughts of the people of Connecticut began to turn to the more liberal Dutch government of New Netherland, and some of them, together with their friends who had crossed the Sound and settled on Long Island, began to negotiate with Governor Stuyvesant for lands at Achter Kull, on Newark Bay. The first of these was John Stricklan (Strickland), a resident of Huntington, on Long Island, who, in behalf of himself and a number of other New England people, addressed the following letters to Capt. Bryan Newton, one of Governor Stuyvesant's Council, by whom they were duly presented to the director-general:

"WORTHY SIR: after my due respects presented unto you these few lines ar to request a kindness of you. taking you to be my spetial frend, and know no other like your self to intrust in such a Case as this: the thing I dezire and som others with me is this: that you woude be pleased to take the first and moste sutable opportunity to speake with the honored gouernor, deziring him to resoleue you in these particulars first. whither or no, that place vpon the mayne land which is called Arther Cull be free from any iaggements: secondly if free: then whither or no he will be pleased to grant it to a Company of honest men that may dezire to sit doune ther to make a plantation vnder his gouernment and that you would be pleased hauing so done to return an answer by the first, which we shall waite for, and hauing incouragement we shall forthwith adree our selues to treat further with him aboute the matter thus not doubting of your faithfullness herin I take leave and rest yours to Commande

"JOHN STRICKLAND from huddington April 29: 1661."

These letters were received by the director-general and Council of New Netherland at a very opportune time, for their High Mightinesses, the Dutch rulers, had decided upon the policy of inviting Republicans disaffected on account of the restoration of the English monarchy, both in Old and New England, to come and settle in their dominions, where they could enjoy the utmost civil and religious freedom. In the spring of 1661 a proclamation was issued to "all Christian people of tender conscience, in England or elsewhere oppressed, to erect colonies anywhere within the jurisdiction of Petrus Stuyvesant, in the West Indies, between New England and Virginia, in America." A charter of "Conditions and Privileges" of a very liberal character had been drawn up by the West India Company, and approved Feb. 14, 1661.

On the 2d of June following Mr. Strickland received a favorable answer to his application, of which the following is a translation :

"The preceding requests being delivered to Capt. Lieutenant Brian Nuten, and b-yng by him communicat-d to the Honble Director General and by his Exclty delivered to the Council, it is after question put resolved to give said Capt. Lieutenant for Answer, that he may let the Petitioners know that they may freely come to look at the indicated parcel of land, and if they like it, that further disposition would then be had on their application and proposal. This 2 June, 1661."¹

In this same month of June the General Court of Connecticut instructed their Governor, John Winthrop, to proceed to England and procure from the king a charter for the colony, to include the whole territory "eastward to Plymouth line, northward to the limits of Massachusetts Colony, westward to the Bay of Delaware, and also the islands contiguous." The object of this was to include the whole of Connecticut in one strong colony, under as liberal a charter as could be procured from the king; but the proposition excited in the colony of New Haven no little opposition and indignation, several of the magistrates chosen under the charter declining to take the prescribed oath. It is not strange, therefore, that the liberal proposals of the Dutch government, just then made public, should have met with a warm reception in New Haven and the adjacent towns. A deputation was sent to New Amsterdam to make further inquiry, and to ascertain the character of the lands to be settled. The situation proved more desirable than had been anticipated. The deputation was so "courteously entertained" and made so favorable a report of the country as to induce Benjamin Fenn and Robert Treat, magistrates of Milford, Dr. Jasper Gunn, one of the deacons of the church of Milford, and Mr. Richard Law, one of the magistrates of Stamford, all of them of the New Haven jurisdiction, and originally from Weathersfield, on the Connecticut, to come down in November, 1661, with full powers to negotiate with Governor Stuyvesant for the settlement of a plantation in these parts, "within the limits of the company's jurisdiction behind Staten Island, about the Raritan River."

This attempt to effect a settlement failed on account of one condition which the director-general and Council at New Amsterdam were unwilling to concede. The New Haven people wanted an absolutely independent community, with all the rights and privileges of self-government. Among the conditions insisted upon by them were liberty to gather a church in the Congregational way, such as they had enjoyed in New England about twenty years past; the right of calling a Synod by the English Churches that might be gathered in New Netherland for the regulation of their ecclesiastical affairs; the right to administer justice in civil matters within themselves by magistrates of their own selection, without appeal to other authorities; the purchase of the lands by the Dutch government from the natives, and a full conveyance thereof to the associates forever, none to be allowed to settle among them except by their own consent; the right to collect debts, and a written charter stipulating these rights in full.²

All these conditions were freely granted by the director-general and Council, except the concession of self-government without appeal. This the Governor was unwilling to grant, as it would confer upon the proposed colony greater liberty than was enjoyed by the other towns and settlements of New Netherland. The delegation insisting upon the fullest concession of popular rights, and the Governor firmly resisting the demand, the conference was broken off, but was renewed in March, 1662, with the same result. The matter was then referred to the directors at Amsterdam, who reported March 26, 1663, saying they would have been pleased could the settlement have been made, inasmuch as it would "serve as a bulwark to our nation against the savages on the Raritan and Minisink." The chamber directed Stuyvesant to insist on retaining appellate jurisdiction in certain criminal cases, but to treat with the English on such terms as in his opinion were best adapted to promote the welfare of the State and its subjects. Although negotiations were resumed in June, 1663, it does not appear that any satisfactory result was arrived at so long as the country was under the jurisdiction of the Dutch. Later in 1663 occurred the revolt against the Dutch government by the English people of Long Island, who placed themselves under the jurisdiction of Connecticut. "Early in December a party of twenty Englishmen from Jamaica, Flushing, and Gravesend proceeded in Stoffel Elsworth's sloop to the Raritan River, with the intention of purchasing a plantation from the Indians. But the design was frustrated by an armed party under command of Capt. Kregier, sent out for the purpose by Governor Stuyvesant in the company's yacht."¹

No further attempts appear to have been made to settle this part of the country till after the English conquest of 1664.

Events, however, had been shaping for several years which changed very materially the aspects of colonial affairs. Charles II. had for some time after his accession to the throne meditated the reduction of the American colonies to a state of immediate dependence on the crown and the extension of his power along the whole coast of North America. He was ready to embrace the first opportunity, therefore, that might offer for extending his jurisdiction over the coveted territory. "The Company of Royal Adventurers of England trading with Africa," more commonly known as "The Royal African Company," had just been chartered (Jan. 10, 1663), with the Duke of York as their president. They were nothing more nor less than slave-traders. In the prosecution of their nefarious traffic they had been greatly annoyed and very seriously damaged by the powerful and monopolizing West India Company of the United Provinces. Early in the following year, therefore, an expedition was secretly sent out by the Royal African Company against the African possessions of the Dutch Company, the two countries being at peace.² In order the more successfully to compete with the Dutch and to cripple them in their rivalry, the duke sought and obtained from his royal brother, Charles II., March 22, 1664, a grant of Long Island, and of all the land from the west side of Connecticut River to the east side of Delaware Bay, the province of Sagadahock, in what is now the State of Maine, and the islands along the coast of New England, together with the right of government or sovereignty, thus including not only the Dutch province of New Netherland, but a large part of the territory given by royal patent less than two years previously to the colony of Connecticut. The duke, as lord high admiral, had control of the royal navy. An expedition was immediately fitted out, consisting of four ships of war, under command of Col. Richard Nicolls, a faithful adherent of the royal family, to whom the duke gave a commission to serve as his deputy governor within the whole grant. With him were associated also Sir Robert Carr, Knight, George Cartwright, Esq., and Samuel Maverick, Esq., as royal commissioners to visit the colonies, with plenary powers to adjust disputes, appeals, and complaints of every description and provide for the public welfare, looking well, of course, to the rights of the crown.

On Friday, August 29th, the fleet cast anchor in the outer bay of New Amsterdam. The next day orders were sent for the surrender of Manhattan. After various negotiations, protracted through the following week, the terms of capitulation were agreed upon on Saturday, August 27th, and on the following Monday the Dutch authorities surrendered the town and fort to the English, who immediately took possession. New Amsterdam became New York, in honor of the duke, and Fort Amsterdam, Fort James. Nicolls was proclaimed deputy governor, and the people quietly submitted to the sway of the conquerors. A few weeks sufficed to bring the whole province of New Netherland into subjection, and to give the control of the whole coast, from Maine to the Carolinas, to the crown of Great Britain.

CHAPTER III.

FIRST ENGLISH SETTLEMENT AT ELIZABETH TOWN.

The Patent Granted.—Immediately upon the assumption of the government by Col. Nicolls, the attention of those settlers who had several years before sought a removal to Achter Kull, west of Staten Island, was directed again to this inviting region. An association was at once formed, and several of their number departed to go down to New York and secure of the Governor liberty to purchase and settle a plantation. Four weeks had scarcely elapsed since the surrender when we find them presenting the following petition:

"To the Right honourable Col. Richard Nicolls Esq^r Governour of New-York, &c. The Humble petition of us subscribed sheweth:

"That several of us Y^r Petitioners being Intended formerly to have purchased and settled a plantation upon y^e River called after-cull River before Y^r arrival into these parts: our Intentions, notwithstanding our making some way with the Indians & Charges & Expenses about the premisses, was obstructed by the then Ruling Dutch. And some of us by Reason of not having any Accommodations here were put upon thoughts of Removing into some other of his Majesties Dominions; but now upon this Y^r happy arrival and the Decease of the Dutch Interest, we would Gladly proceed in the Design aforesaid. In order whereunto, we make bold wth all humility to petition to Y^r Honor that you would Grant us liberty to purchase and settle a parcel of land to Improve our labour upon on the River before mentioned, and some of us being Destitute of habitations where we are, we crave Your Answer with as much Expedition as may be. we humbly Take our leaves at Present and subscribe Y^r Honor to command.

Having thus secured the Governor's warrant for their enterprise, "the undertakers" made speedy arrangements for a conference with the native owners of the soil. Capt. John Baker, of the city of New York, it is said, was employed as the English and Dutch interpreter, and one of the natives as the Indian and Dutch interpreter. The conference was held at Staten Island, where the chief sagamores of the Indians then lived, and resulted satisfactorily to all the parties. A tract of land was purchased, for which the following deed was given:

"This Indenture made The 28th Day of October In the Sixteenth Year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord Charles By The Grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, King Defender of the faith, &c. At or about the same time Governor Nicolls drew up and published certain proposals by which property in lands might be acquired in any of the unoccupied territories of the Duke of York in America, as follows:

"The Purchasers are free from all manner of Assessments or Rates five Years after their Town Platt is Set out, and when the five years are Expired, they shall only be Liable to the Publick Rates and payments, according to the Custome of other Inhabitants both English and Dutch.

"All Lands thus Purchased and Posses'd, shall Remain to the Purchasers and their Heirs as free-lands to Dispose of as they Please.

"In all Territories of his Royal Highness, liberty of conscience is allowed; Provided such liberty is not Converted to licentiousness or the Disturbance of Others in the exercise of the Protestant Religion.

"The several Town-ships have liberty to make their Particular Laws, and deciding all Small Causes within themselves.

"The Lands which I intend shall be first Planted, are those upon the west side of Hudsons River, at or adjoining to the Sopes, but if any Number of men sufficient for Two or Three or more Towns, shall desire to Plant upon any other Lands, they shall have all Due Encouragement Proportionable to their Quality and undertakings.

"Every Town-ship is Obliged to pay their Minister, according to such Agreement as they shall make with them, and No man to refuse his Proportion, the minister being Elected by the Major Part of the householders, Inhabitants of the Town.

"Every Town-ship hath the free Choices of all their Officers both Civil and military, and all men who shall take the oath of allegiance to his Majesty and are not Servants or Day-labourers, but are admitted to Enjoy a Town lot, are Esteemed free-men of the Jurisdiction, and cannot forfeit the same without Due Process in law."¹

These proposals were all that could be expected, emanating as they did from a court that was bitterly opposed to everything like democracy, exceedingly jealous of the power and privileges of the people, and so hostile to the Puritan party in the Church of England as to have driven more than two thousand non-conforming ministers into private life. They were regarded with peculiar favor by the new settlers in the duke's territories, and accepted as a liberal constitution for the planting of new towns and the organizing of new municipalities.

Encouraged by the Governor's concessions, and furnished with every requisite document to establish their right and title beyond all doubt and controversy to the absolute proprietorship of their lands, the four purchasers from Long Island, with their associates, took measures for a speedy and effective occupation of the fair domain thus lawfully and honorably acquired.

Settlement of the Patent.—The precise date of the occupation of the Elizabethtown purchase by the original proprietors is not on record. Mr. Hatfield is of the opinion, for various excellent reasons which he gives, that the settlement was actually commenced, ground broken, and something of a habitation attempted as early as Nov. 24, 1664.

The tradition that but four families were found in occupancy of the town so late as August, 1665, grew out of the fact, most probably, that but four names are recorded as purchasers in Governor Nicolls' grant. It seems to have been erroneously supposed that these four were the sole proprietors of the purchase, whereas the Indian deed expressly conveys the land, as also does Nicolls' grant, to the associates of these grantees as well.² The whole transaction was a concerted enterprise, thought of and talked over, and agreed upon by a considerable number of persons like-minded and of like origin, residents of the same neighborhood on Long Island. Denton, one of the projectors of the undertaking, writes, four or five years afterward,—

"That the usual way is for a Company of a people to joy together, either enough to make a Town or a lesser number; these go with the consent of the Governour, and view a Tract of Land, there being choice enough, and finding a place convenient for a Town, they return to the Governour, who upon their desire admits them into the Colony, and gives them a Grant or Patent for the said Land, for themselves and Associates. These persons being thus qualified, settle the place, and take in what inhabitants to themselves they shall see cause to admit of, till their Town be full."

The settlement at first was a compact one, in accordance with the plan which had been adopted in New England for mutual defense against the Indians, and which had been first applied in New Jersey in the establishment of the old town of Bergen in 1658. The object as set forth in the "Answer to the Elizabeth Town Bill in Chancery," page 22, was as follows:

"As the country at their first coming was inhabited by no other than the native Indians, who were then in great numbers, the said purchasers and associates agreed at first to make small divisions of their lands, according to the usage and custom then in New England, to the end that they might settle and plant near together, so that in case any attempt was made by the Indians they might mutually aid and assist each other, the circumstances of the inhabitants at that day being so dangerous and troublesome that we, at this time, can have no adequate ideas of the hardships of."³

The settlers of the first two or three years were mainly of one class, and of the same general origin, almost wholly New Englanders from Long Island and Connecticut. Very few of the planters for the first five years came over directly from the mother-country. This will appear from an examination of the names of these pioneers, recorded as early as February, 1666, and to be found on subsequent pages.

Very soon after the commencement of their undertaking various meetings for consultation and agreement in relation to the division or allotment of the lands, and other regulations for the orderly transaction of the business of the town, were held, a record of which was made in a book provided for the purpose by one of their number, appointed to this service, and known as the town clerk. The character of this Town Book and the nature of the record may be seen by reference to the Town Book of Newark, published in 1864 by the New Jersey Historical Society. This book, so necessary for a proper understanding of the early history of the town, was safely kept, and records continued to be made in it until the year 1718, when, during the troubles of that period, the book disappeared, having been purloined or destroyed, or both, and has not since been forthcoming. The loss is irreparable. Extracts from this book have been preserved, the particularity of which deepens the regret felt at the loss of so much invaluable material. The earliest record of which we have now any knowledge is the following :

"At a Meeting Court held at Elizabeth Town in the Province of New Jersey, the 19th of February 1666, by the Freeholders and Inhabitants thereof, James Bollen, Esq., President, by the approbation of the Governor Philip Carteret, Esq.; it was concluded and agreed that the aforesaid town shall consist of fourscore families for the present, and that if hereafter more shall present, they may make an addition of twenty more, according to their discretion for the good and benefit of the town [as to them] shall seem fit.

"A true copy from Elizabeth Town Book of Records, No. A, fol 14, per
"SAMUEL WHITEHEAD, Town Clerk." 1

Another record of the same date has, in like manner, been rescued from oblivion :

"It is further ordered and agreed, by the consent as aforesaid, that all persons that have taken, or shall take lots, shall come and settle and inhabit the same by the fifteenth day of April next, otherwise that the said lots shall be disposed of to any other persons that will come and settle thereon, and that every person that shall take up a home-lot shall be obliged to continue upon the same, or in the town, for the space of three years, either by himself in person or by his servants, or some other person that he shall bring into the town, that shall be approved of; and not to employ any for that purpose that are already belonging to the town; and that he shall not make any sale of the said lot for any time during the space of three years to come, but first shall make proffer to the inhabitants thereof October 28th, 1667, and it's further ordered That whosoever shall break this order shall pay four pounds a month, and proportionately during the time of their so Entertainment." 2

A similar regulation was adopted by the Newark people in the following year.³ Some division of the town plot into lots convenient for the settlers must have been made on their first coming. At this same meeting, or possibly at an earlier date,

"It was agreed, That small parcels of land should be laid out to every inhabitant who came, in part of what he was entitled to. To wit, To every inhabitant in the Town Plat of Elizabeth Town a home lot containing about four acres, and a pittle or addition to it containing about two acres." 4

Every settler, whatever proportion he may have contributed to the general expense, was put upon the same footing as regarded his homestead, the only difference being in the choice of a location, and this, probably, was determined, as at Newark, by lot.

"They agreed amongst themselves to go over and fix the Lots, which was before by the whole Committee agreed upon to be Six acres, and after the Lots prepared, and how they should begin and Succeed, the matter was solemnly submitted to the Lord for his Guidance." 5

The lots were laid out on both sides of the creek, beginning with the first upland above the salt meadows, and extending up the creek some two miles. The ordinary dimensions of these lots were four chains in breadth and ten chains in length, making a front on the street of two hundred and sixty-four feet, and extending back six hundred and sixty feet. In some cases, owing to the irregular course of the river and highways, the shape of the lots, which was ordinarily a parallelogram, varied from the regular form and size, but, as well as might be, equal privileges were secured. Owing to the indefiniteness of the surveys as recorded, and for want of everything like a map or diagram of the town plat, it is quite impossible to determine the locality of each settler.

At the town-meeting just mentioned the male inhabitants of the town were required to take the oath of allegiance, of which and the names subscribed a record has been preserved, as follows :

"The Oath of A Leasance and Fidelity taken by the Inhabitants of Elizabeth Town and the Jurisdiction thereof beginning the 19th February 1665.

"You doe aware upon the Holy Evangelist contained in this book to bare true faith and Allegiance to our Sovereign Lord King Charles the Second and his Successors and to be true and faithfull to the Lords propyeters their Successors and the Government of this Province of New Jersey as long as you shall Continue an Inhabitant under the same without any Evocation or Mentall Reservation whatsoever and so help you God.

The whole number is sixty-five. Capt. John Baker's name is wanting, on account of his absence in the service of Governor Nicolls, at Albany. Some names are found in this list not included in the list of Associates. They were the names, probably, of temporary residents employed as laborers or helpers. Bailly and Denton had sold out; the former to Carteret, and the latter to Ogden.

The most reliable statement of the names of the original Associates is found in Elizabeth Town Book B, some fifty years after the settlement of the town, and is thus expressed:

"Richard Nicolls, by virtue of the Power and Authority vested in him by . . . James (then) Duke of York &c Did thereby Grant Bargain Sell and Confirm unto Capt John Baker (then) of New York, John Ogden (then) of North-Hampton, and . . . John Bailly and Luke Watson, and their Associates the Premises aforesaid—In free-simple, which same Associates (together with them the s^d Baker, Ogden, Bailly, and Watson equally seised each to a Third Lot Right in poises) were, the said John Baker, John Ogden, Jus Bailly, and Luke Watson, and with them Thomas Young, Benjamin Price, John Woodruff, Philip Carteret, Two Third lots, Robert Bond, Sealy Champain (Transfer'd to Benjamin Parkhurst) William Meeker, Thomas Thompson, Samuel Marsh, Town Lot for the Minister Willm Piles, Peter Conenhuven, John Brock't (Transfer'd to Sam^l Hopkins), James Bollen, Jacob M-lyen, Nicholas Carter, and Jeremiah Peck. And, To each a Second Lot-Right in the same Premises, Isaac Whitehead, Joseph Meeker, Humphry Spinning, Jeffery Jones, George Ross, Joseph Bond, Matthias Hatfield, Barnabas Winds, Robert White, Peter Morss, John Winans, Joseph Sayre, Richard Beach, Moses Thompson, John Gray, William Johnson, John Brackett Junr, Simon Ronse, William Trotter, John Ogden Junr, Jonas Wood, Robert Morss, M^l Leprary, Caleb Carwithe, William Parlon, and Stephen Osburne.—And to each a first lot Right in the same Premises, Jonathan Ogden, Abraham Shotwell, David Ogden, Nathaniel Tuttle, Benjamin Price Junr, Roger Lambert, Abraham Lawrence, John Hindes, Thomas Moor, Joseph frazey, Yokam Andross, Denis White, Nathanael Norton (since Transfer'd to Henry Norris), Great John Willson, Hur Thompson, Benjamin Onian, Evan Salsbury, Little John Willson, Stephen Crane, Henry Lyon, John Parker, John Ogden for John Dickinson, Leonard Headley, Nathaniel Bonnel, George Morris, Joseph Osborn, Parley (Transfer'd to Henry Norris), George Pack, John Pope, Francis Barber, William Oliver, Richard Painter, and Charles Tooker." ¹

The number is eighty, of whom twenty-one had third lot-rights, twenty-six had second lot-rights, and thirty-three had first lot-rights. Carteret had, in addition to his own third lot-right, the third lot-right of Bailly, of whom he had purchased it. Twenty-six had been admitted subsequently to the taking of the oath of allegiance in February, 1666, of whom some were sons of the first settlers.

Carteret brought over with him in the ship "Philip" eighteen male servants, belonging to Sir George and himself, a portion of whom were Frenchmen, probably from the Island of Jersey:

"John Dejardin.
Doct^r Rowland.
Claude Vallot.
Rich^d Pewtinger.
Richard Michell.
Richard Skinner.
Wm Hill.
Henry Hill.
Erasmus House.

John Tayler.
John Clark.

Claude Barbour.

besides several others the same time imported, and many others since."²

In the first importation must have been included some female servants,—Mariah Thorell, Susannah Poulain, and Ellen Prou (all French) being of the number. Of the male servants, two were subsequently admitted as Associates, Claude Vallot and William Hill. Richard Michell had land given him by the Governor, but was not admitted as an Associate.³

CHAPTER IV.

ORIGINAL PATENTEES AND ASSOCIATES OF ELIZABETH TOWN.

THE following sketches of the original petitioners, of the other patentees, and of the eighty Associates of Elizabeth Town have been condensed from Mr. Hatfield's notices of them in his "History of Elizabeth":

The Original Petitioners.—John Strickland's name occupies the first place among those who sought here a home. He was, as already seen, a resident of Huntington, L. I. His application was in behalf of "a Company of the english nasion." He was simply their agent. The names of the "Company" have not been preserved. Strickland was an Englishman. He came over in 1630 with Winthrop's company, and was admitted a freeman in the Bay Colony May, 1631. He was a member of the church of Watertown, Mass., from which he, Jonas Wood, and others were dismissed May 29, 1635, to form a new church on the borders of the Connecticut River. Soon after he removed to Wethersfield, Conn. His son Thwait settled there, but the father, after a short sojourn, removed to Uncowah (Fairfield), Conn. Subsequently he took part in a bloody fight at Greenwich between the Dutch and Indians, at a spot since known as "Strickland's Plain." In 1644 he sold his estate at Uncowah to William Frost, and united with the Rev. Robert Fordham, John Ogden, John Karman, John Lawrence, and Jonas Wood in settling on "the Great Plains on Long Island," to which they gave the name of Heemstede. In the patent obtained Nov. 16, 1644, he is called "Sticklan." In 1661 it appears that he resided at Huntington, whence he sought to remove to this place. He was induced, however, to settle at Jamaica, L. I., and in 1663 was one of the freeholders of that town. Yet he was a patentee of Huntington in 1666, and still later a resident of Hempstead. The names of at least four of his associates at Fairfield and Hempstead are found among the Elizabeth Town Associates. It is quite likely that they were interested in the petition of 1661. The petitioners of 1664 were all of them his neighbors at Jamaica, as some of them had been at Watertown, Wethersfield, Fairfield, and Hempstead.⁴

John Baillies (Baylie, Bailly), the first signer of the petition of 1664, was probably the same who resided at Guilford, Conn., in 1642. A John Bailly was admitted a freeman of Connecticut May 21, 1657, and was chosen constable at Hartford March 16, 1657. This may have been his son. Previous to 1662 he had removed to Jamaica, L. I., where he was familiarly called "Goodman Baylie," and was licensed to keep an ordinary for the town. He was one of the four patentees of this town, but probably did not become a resident, as he disposed of his interest here Sept. 8, 1665, to Gov. Carteret for "a valuable sum." He was still living at Jamaica in 1683.¹

Daniel Denton, the next in order of the petitioners of 1664, and his brother Nathaniel, the fourth in order, were sons of the Rev. Richard Denton, "a Yorkshire man," first settled at Halifax, in England, who came to Watertown, Mass., in 1634, then to Wethersfield, Conn., in 1635, whence he removed to Stamford in 1641, and thence to Hempstead, L. I., in 1644, having been the first minister of each of the last three towns. He returned to England in 1658, and died in 1662 at Essex. His two sons, Daniel and Nathaniel, were among the first patentees of Jamaica, L. I., in 1656. Daniel was the first clerk of the town, taught school, practiced medicine, and served as justice of the peace. He wrote "A Brief Description of New York," which was published in London in 1670, and was the first printed work on the subject in the English language. In 1673 he was a resident of Piscataway and a magistrate. Nathaniel continued at Jamaica, and was living in 1683. The two brothers sold their rights in the Elizabeth Town purchase in 1665 to Capt. John Baker and John Ogden. Another brother, Samuel, was also interested in the purchase.²

Thomas Benedict (Benydick), the third of the petitioners of 1664, was a native of Nottingham, Eng., where he was born in the year 1617. He was bred a weaver, and migrated to New England in 1638, with his step-sister, Mary Bridgum, whom, shortly after, he married. She was the mother of the numerous American family of Benedicts. Not long afterwards they removed to Southold, L. I., where their five sons and four daughters were born. In June, 1656, they were residents of Huntington, L. I., and were neighbors of the Stricklands. In 1662, "Goodman Benedict" was one of the leading men of Jamaica. With Daniel Denton, his townsman, he represented Jamaica in the Hempstead Convention, March 1, 1665. The same year, instead of carrying out his original design of removing with his neighbors to Achter Kull, he became a resident of Norwalk, Conn., which henceforth became the home of the family.³

John Foster, the fifth of the petitioners of 1664, was a resident of Jamaica. His father, Thomas, was of the Hempstead company, whither he came from Fairfield, Conn., as early as 1644. The family were dwelling at Jamaica in 1663. Foster was still a citizen of Jamaica in 1688. His interest in the new purchase was disposed of to another, but to whom and for what cause does not appear.⁴

Luke Watson, the last named of the petitioners of 1664, was the only one of them all that retained an interest in the Jersey enterprise, and became one of the founders of this town. His father married Elizabeth, the daughter of William Frost, of Fairfield, Conn., and had died before 1645. His widow was then married to John Gray, and with her husband and son, Luke Watson, removed first to Newtown, and then to Jamaica, L. I., whence they came hither. Watson was a man of some consideration at Jamaica, being one of the "four men" chosen, Aug. 6, 1659, "to be presented for magistrates to y^e governor." He was among the first emigrants to this place. He was located next north of Capt. Baker. He had an allotment of 170 acres of upland on the W. side of Rahway River, and N. of its W. Branch; also 130 acres of upland on the E. N. E. of Rahway River, and W. of William Johnson and Jeffry Jones; also 100 acres on the S. side of the creek; also 24 acres of meadow on Rahway River, and 6 acres elsewhere. His wife's name was Sarah. He sold, July 22, 1673, to "William Case of Road Island," for "2000 Pounds of good and Merchantable Sheep Wool," all his "Neck of Upland and Meadow laying and being on the East End of Elizabeth Towne River and known by the Name of Luke Watson's point within the bounds of Elizabeth Towne," computed to be 100 acres. He obtained, Jan. 21, 1675, a warrant for the survey of 400 acres. The next year he removed to the Hoar-kill settlement (Lewes), in Delaware, renting his house and lot to Benjamin Wade, to whom he sold them, March 16, 1677, for £24. The remainder of his interest here he sold, in 1678, to William Broadwell and Joseph Frazey. He was an active and useful citizen, and in 1683, 1687, 1689, and 1690 he was a member of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, of which his son, Luke, Jr., was a member in 1697.⁵

Such were the original petitioners, all of them originally from New England, and in full sympathy with the prevailing sentiments of that region. Two of them only, Bailey and Watson, became patentees, and of these only one a settler, and he but for ten or eleven years.

Other Patentees.—The other patentees were Capt. John Baker and John Ogden.

Capt. John Baker heads the list. He had been for some time a resident of New Amsterdam, though an Englishman by birth, and had acquired a familiarity with the Dutch language that made him on several occasions useful as an interpreter in dealing with the Indians. It is probable, as previously intimated, that he was thus employed by Denton and his associates in the Staten Island negotiations for this town, and so became interested in the enterprise. The earliest definite information of him is found in the records (Dutch) of a court held at the city hall, New Orange (New York), Nov. 14, 1673, in an action against Capt. John Baker:

"Jan Smedes and Jan Mynderssen, Carters declare that about nine years ago shortly after the surrender of this place [1664], they rode 300 p's of firewood out of the bush for Claes Dierlofsen, and afterwards brought the same firewood to Capt. Backer's house within this city, and the bill for carting has not yet been paid them by said Backer as they are prepared to declare or oath. Capt. Backer resided in Broadway in the house now occupied by Willem Van der Scheure [Schuyren]."

As Capt. Baker belonged, in 1673, to another jurisdiction, Claes probably gained nothing by the suit. The house that he occupied in Broadway was on the east side, a short distance below Wall Street. After the conquest of the city Governor Nicolls appointed him, Sept. 25, 1665, chief military officer at Albany. On this account his name is not included among those who took the oath of allegiance here in February following. In August, 1669, he was subjected to a court-martial at Fort James, New York, for an assault on William Paterson, a merchant of Albany, and judgment was rendered against him Oct. 6, 1669. He continued in command at Albany until May 14, 1670, from which time he became permanently a resident of this town. His house-lot was of the ordinary size, bounded S., E., and W. by the highways, and N. by Luke Watson. Afterwards it came into the possession of Matthias Hatfield, Esq., the grandson of the planter of that name. He obtained, March 14, 1675, a warrant for the survey of 1200 acres for "himself and his Wife and eight other Persons" of his family. He was appointed coroner March 28, 1683, and judge of small causes. He was a leading man in the community, and ever among the foremost in resisting the proprietary assumptions. He died in 1702.¹

John Ogden, the other patentee, who became a permanent resident, was one of the most influential founders of the town. He was at Stamford, Conn., in 1641, within a year after its settlement. He had previously married Jane, who, as tradition reports, was a sister of Robert Bond. In May, 1642, he and his brother Richard, both of them, at the time, of Stamford, entered into a contract with Governor William Kieft, Gisbert op Dyck, and Thomas Willett, of New Amsterdam, church-wardens, to build a stone church in the fort, 72 by 50 feet, for the sum of 2500 guilders ($1000), to be paid in beaver, cash, or merchandise, one hundred guilders to be added if the work proved satisfactory, and the use of the company's boat to be given the builders for carrying stone a month or six weeks if necessary. The work was duly and satisfactorily completed.²

It was probably in this way that the two brothers became acquainted with the west end of Long Island. Early in 1644, in company with the Rev. Robert Fordham, Rev. Richard Denton, and a few others, they removed from Stamford and settled at Hempstead, L. I., of which John Ogden was one of the patentees. At the expiration of five or six years, not liking the control of the Dutch, with whom he had considerable dealings at New Amsterdam, and disgusted with the cruelties practiced upon the natives, of whom scores, soon after his settlement at Hempstead, had there, by order of the government, been put to death, he removed to the east end of the island to dwell among his own countrymen. In 1647 he had obtained permission of the town of Southampton to plant a colony of six families at "North Sea," a tract of land bordering on the Great Peconic Bay, opposite Robbin Island, about three miles north of the village of Southampton. Some two or three years elapsed before his removal and the planting of the settlement at the North Sea, called, in the colonial records of Connecticut and New Haven, as well as in Nicolls' grant, "Northampton."

He was made a freeman of Southampton March 31, 1650, and was chosen by the General Court at Hartford, Conn., May 16, 1656, and again in 1657 and 1658, one of the magistrates for the colony. He sat in the General Court as a representative from Southampton in May, 1659, and in the Upper House May, 1661, and afterwards. His name appears repeatedly in the new charter of Connecticut (obtained April 23, 1662, by Governor Winthrop from Charles II.) as one of the magistrates and patentees of the colony, also quite frequently in the records both of Connecticut and New Haven. He was held in high honor at home, being one of their first men.

During his residence at Northampton, Ogden, by frequent visits as a trader to New Amsterdam, had kept up his acquaintance with his old friends and neighbors on the west end of the island. When, therefore, after the conquest, it was proposed to him to commence a fourth settlement in the new and inviting region of Achter Kull under English rule, he readily entered into the measure, and, in company with his old friend, Capt. Baker, purchased the interests of the Dentons and Goodman Benedict, and thus became, being a man of substance and distinction, the leading man of the new colony. He was among the very first, with his five full-grown boys, John, Jonathan, David, Joseph, and Benjamin, to remove to the new purchase and erect a dwelling on the town-plot. He located his house, it is thought, on the Point road, now Elizabeth Avenue, near where Robert Ogden, his great-grandson, and Col. Barber afterwards lived. The bounds of his home-lot are not recorded.

He was appointed, Oct. 26, 1665, a justice of the peace, and, Nov. 1st, one of the Governor's Council. In the Legislature of 1668 he was one of the burgesses from this town. To carry forward his improvements, or to meet previous obligations, he borrowed, Oct. 9, 1668, of Cornelius Steenwick (the mayor of the City of New York, a wealthy merchant) £191 5s. 0d., "one fourth part thereof to be paid in good Wheat at 4/6 p^r Bushell one fourth part in good drie Ox hides at 6 stivers p^r pound dutch weight One fourth part in good merchantable Tobacco at 4 stivers p^r pound like weight and one fourth part in Good Corn fed fat Pork well packt in casks and delivered at New Yorke at Three Pounds ten Shillings p^r Barrell." As security he mortgaged, April 29, 1669, "a Certain Water Mill now in my Tenure or Occupation," as the mortgage expresses it, "near unto the Mansion or Dwelling House of Gov. Carterett in Elizabeth Towne."

This mill was located immediately west of the Broad Street stone bridge, and, with the dam across the creek just above, was, doubtless, constructed by Mr. Ogden, whence the creek was frequently called "Mill Creek," or "Mill River." The Governor's house was located east of the bridge and north of the creek, on the ground latterly occupied by the Thomas house.

Three of his sons, John, Jonathan, and David, took the oath of allegiance February, 1666, and were numbered among the original Associates. The house-lot of John, Jr., contained four acres, and was twelve by four chains in length and breadth, bounded S. E. by John Woodruff and Leonard Headley, N. E. by a highway, N. W. by Mrs. Hopkins, Sr., and S. W. by the creek, a highway between him and Mrs. Hopkins. He had also twelve acres of "upland Lying upon the way that goes to the Governor's point," also sixty acres of "upland Lying in the plaines" between Henry Norris and Leonard Headley, also nine acres of "meadow Lying at the east end of y^e great Island." Jonathan had a house-lot of six acres fifteen by four chains, bounded S. E. by his younger brother Joseph, and on the other sides by highways. He had twenty-two acres of upland in a triangle, bounded by the Governor and Benjamin Parkis; also eighty-four acres of upland "Lying in a plaine," bounded by Benjamin Parkis, Leonard Headley, Isaac Whitehead, Jr., and the Mill Brook, also fourteen acres of meadow in two plots on the creek and on the great island. David's house-lot contained five acres, and was bounded east by the Mill Creek, north by Jeffry Jones, and west and south by highways. He had, in addition, sixty acres of upland, bounded by Joseph Frazee, William Lets,

Samuel Marsh, Jr., and Capt. Baker, also eight acres of meadow on Thompson's Creek.¹

The Eighty Associates.—Such, as just narrated, were the original petitioners and patentees. Who were the other founders of the town? What was their origin, what were their principles, and where did they locate? In answering these inquiries, those who took the oath of allegiance, including all who were on the ground during the first year of the settlement, will be considered in alphabetical order.

Joakim Andris (Yokam Andross, Andrews) was probably from New Haven, Conn., and a son of William Andrews, who came to New Haven previous to 1643 with a family of eight persons. His house-lot contained 4 acres, and was bounded N. and E. by a highway, S. by Matthias Hatfield, and W. by Dennis White. He had died in 1675, and his widow, Amy, sold, June 22, 1675, to Thomas Moore "the house Orchard Garden Home Lott Pasture for Calves," and all that might be claimed by the concessions, a first lot-right, except 20 acres sold by her husband to Peter Moss, "and one peare tree and some Gonsberry bushes," reserved for her use.²

Francis Barber has left no memorial of his origin. He sold, March 10, 1672, to Vincent Ronyon, carpenter, a house-lot (bought of William Pyles, who had bought it of Thomas Moore), 40 rods by 16, bounded N. by George Pack, and fronting on the highway. He was still here in the following year, but must have removed soon after to Staten Island, where, on the W. side of the island, on Smoking Point, Dec. 21, 1680, 88 acres of woodland and meadow were surveyed for him, and where, in 1686, he served as commissioner of excise. The Barber family of a later date had another origin and a more illustrious record.³

Robert Blackwell was one of the early settlers of this town, though his name is not found in any town document now extant. In a deed, on record in New York, Robert Blackwell is spoken of as "late of Elizabeth-town in New Jersey, merchant." He married, April 26, 1676, Mary Manningham, step-daughter of Capt. John Manning (by whom the city was surrendered, in 1673, to the Dutch), and so became the owner of Manning's Island, since known by his own name.⁴

Robert Bond was the father of Joseph, and a resident of Southampton, L. I., as early as 1643. He was appointed, October, 1644, by the General Court of Connecticut, in company with Mr. More, "to demand of each family of Southampton the amount they would give for the maintenance of scholars at Cambridge College." He was one of the company that settled East Hampton in 1648. He came originally from Lynn, Mass., and was doubtless of the same stock with the Watertown family. He had a principal part in securing the land of East Hampton from the natives, and in transacting the business of the town. He was one of the first magistrates of the place, and repeatedly represented the town in the General Court of the colony. John Ogden and Capt. John Scott having had some differences with the town about Meantauquit (Montauk) in 1662, Robert Bond was chosen one of the commissioners to settle it. His intimacy with Ogden (tradition says that each married the other's sister) and others of his neighbors, who were about to remove to these parts, led him to cast in his lot with them, and lend his valuable counsels to the settlement of this town, where his influence was second only to John Ogden's. Carteret, at his coming, was glad to avail himself of his mature experience, and appointed him, Jan. 2, 1668, one of his Council, and an assistant to the justices. Governor Winthrop, of Connecticut, highly commended him. He was appointed, March 13, 1676, justice of the peace. His first wife was Hannah, a sister of John Ogden. After her death he married at Newark, in 1672, Mary, the widow of Hugh Roberts. She was the daughter of Hugh Calkins, an emigrant from Wales in 1640, and a resident, first of Gloucester, Mass., and then of New London, Conn. He thus became interested in the Newark colony, and was elected the same year their representative. He continued still to reside in this town, where he died April, 1677. His wife survived him twenty-four years. Stephen Bond, of Newark, was one of his sons. The father received a warrant for 360 acres of land at E. Town, June 30, 1675, but a caveat was entered against it, Jan. 16, 1677, by Benjamin Price, Sr. Joseph, at the same date, received a warrant for 160 acres.¹

John Brackett, Sr., was from New Haven, Conn., of which he was one of the first settlers. He assented to the covenant there June 4, 1639, and as late as 1643 was unmarried. At the seating of the congregation in 1646 places were provided for him and "Sister Brackett," showing that previous to this time he had taken to himself a wife. He was frequently employed in laying out lands about the town, and his name is of frequent occurrence in the colonial records until 1660. When troops were raised to resist the encroaching Dutch, he was appointed, June 23, 1654, one of the "surgeons." He was probably induced to accompany his neighbors to this colony in order to aid them in laying out their lands. Near the close of 1677, several of the planters having urged the Governor to define the exact bounds of their several possessions, he deputed Brackett, Dec. 19, 1667, in the absence of Vauquellin, the surveyor-general, "to lay out, survey, and bound the said bounds of Elizabeth Towne the planting fields towne lots and to lay out every particulars man's proportion according to his allotments and the directions" of the Governor, "for the avoiding of all controversies and disputes hereafter concerning the same, having had certain notice of the good experience, knowledge, skill, and faithfulness of John Brackett in the surveying and laying out of land." In the controversies of a later day it was affirmed by the town's party that they had "not seen, known, or heard of any one Survey made in pursuance of that commission." The surveys were probably made, but were superseded by later and more accurate surveys, and hence were not preserved. Brackett sold out his rights as early as 1670 to Samuel Hopkins, and returned to New Haven, both he and his son, who also had been admitted as an Associate. John, Jr., died at New Haven, Nov. 29, 1676. "Brackett's Brook," a branch of the E. Town Creek, in the north part of the town, indicates probably the locality of their allotment.²

Nathaniel Bunnell (Bonnel) was undoubtedly also from New Haven, Conn., and of the same family with William and Benjamin, of that town. William was there previous to 1650. Nathaniel had a house-lot of six acres, 15 by 4 chains, bounded E. by Thomas Price, W. and N. by Isaac Whitehead, Sr., and S. by a highway. He had also an allotment of 120 acres, "Lying upon the South Branch of Elizth Town Creek, and y^e plaine which said above mentioned Creek passeth through;" also "12 acres of meadow Lying in the great meadows upon John Woodruffe's Creek."³

Nicolas Carter came from Newtown, L. I. His name appears, April 12, 1656, among the purchasers of that place from the natives. His allotment there was 20 acres. He came there in 1652, from Stamford, Conn. He is repeatedly spoken of in the Newtown records, among the leading men of the town, until 1665, the date of his removal to this place. His son, Nicholas, born 1658, was apprenticed, March 25, 1669, to "Richard Painter, Taylor," of Elizabeth Town. The indenture says: "Unlawfull Sports and Games he shall not use. Taverns or Tipling houses hee shall not haunt or frequent, his Masters Goods he shall not

In the inventory of his estate, April 18, 1677, his house and all his land were valued at £70; two oxen, £12 10s.; two cows and calves, £5; one "farrow cow," £3 15s.; two two-year old heifers, £5; a cannon, £1 5s. The whole amounted to £151 11s. 5d.

Imbezle purloin or by any unlawfull means diminish or Impair, his Masters Secrets he shall not disclose." His house-lot contained five acres, 10 by 5 chains, bounded E. and S. by highways, N. by the creek, and S. by William Hill. He had also twenty acres of upland on Luke Watson's Point, adjacent to Edward Case and Jacob Melyen; also forty acres of upland "in a swamp lying at the E. side of the blind Ridge," bounded partly by Aaron Thompson and Jacob Melyen. This tract and his house-lot he sold, March 16, 1677, to Benjamin Wade, for £30, payable in pipe-staves. He had also seventy acres of upland, bounded by Roger Lambert, George Pack, and the swamp; also 193 acres of upland on the Mill Creek, bounded by Barnabas Wines, the plain, a small brook, and the creek; also 22 acres of meadow in the Great Meadow, and 18 acres on Thompson's Creek. His allotments contained 368 acres. He bought also, March 9, 1677, of Jacob Melyen, then of the city of New York, 101 acres of land on the South Neck. The most of his lauds he sold, May 18, 1681, to Samuel Wilson, and shortly after died.¹

Caleb Carwithy (Carwithe, Corwith) was the son of David, a resident of Southold, L. I., where he died, November, 1665. Caleb was a mariner, and quite a rover. At Hartford, Conn., he was arraigned, October, 1646, for pursuing an absconding debtor on the Sabbath-day. Previous to 1654 he made trading voyages between New Haven and Boston. In 1661 he resided at Southampton, L. I. He was admitted in 1664 a freeman at Huntington, L. I. The following year he came to this place. In the winter of 1669 he entered into an association with John Ogden, Sr., Jacob Melyen, William Johnson, Jeffry Jones, and others of this town for whaling purposes. His house-lot adjoined Charles Tucker on the west, and George Ross on the N. west. He sold thirty acres of land, Feb. 8, 1671, for £11, to William Piles. A year or two after he removed to Southampton, L. I., where he was living in 1683, and where his descendants have been quite numerous and respectable.²

William Cramer was a carpenter from Southold, L. I., where he married Elizabeth, the sister of Caleb Carwithy. He attached himself to the Governor's party, and seems not to have been numbered with the Town Associates. He was appointed, April 27, 1670, constable of the town, in place of William Pilles. His house-lot contained 6 acres, of irregular form, bounded on the N. W. by Evan Salisbury, and on every other side by highways. He had also 5 acres of upland adjoining John Little; also 10 acres of upland lying in the swamp, bounded by Barnabas Wines, Richard Beach, and John Little; also 20 acres of upland, bounded by Stephen Crane, Roger

Lambert, and the great swamp; also 60 acres adjoining the last plot and Crane's Brook, bounded also, as before, by Crane and Lambert; also 80 acres "at the two mile brook," bound by unsurveyed land and the brook; also 8 acres of upland "in the neck," bounded by Caleb Carwithy, Luke Watson, and the creek meadow; also 6 acres of meadow on the creek, and 14 acres of meadow "at Rahawack,"—in all 209 acres. He sold out, Sept. 1, 1677, to John Toe, weaver, and soon after removed with Luke Watson to the Hoar-Kill (Lewes), Del. He died in 1695.³

Stephen Crane was from Connecticut, and was, probably, nearly related to Jasper Crane, of Newark, who was one of the first settlers of New Haven, Conn., in 1639, was at Branford in 1652, and at Newark in 1667. The family is quite ancient and honorable. Ralph Crane accompanied Sir Francis Drake to America in 1577, and Robert Crane was of the first company that came to Massachusetts Bay in 1630. Sir Robert Crane was of Essex County, England, in 1630; and Sir Richard, in 1643, of Wood Rising, Norfolk, England. Henry and Benjamin Crane were of Wethersfield, Conn., at an early day, and the former removed thence to Guilford. Stephen was born not later than 1640, and was married as early as 1663. His house-lot contained 6 acres, and was bounded S. E. by Samuel Trotter, N. W. by Crane's Brook, E. by the Mill Creek, and W. by the highway. He had also 60 acres between two swamps, and adjoining William Cramer; also 72 acres on Crane's Brook, bounded by the brook, William Cramer, Richard Beach, Nathaniel Tuttle, and William Pardon; also 18 acres of meadow "towards Rawack Point,"—in all 156 acres. He died about 1700.⁴

John Dickinson was from Southold, L. I., and a son or brother of Philemon, who came over in the "Mary Ann," 1637, to Salem, Mass., was admitted to the church in 1641, married Mary, daughter of Thomas Payne, of Salem, removed to Southold about 1649, was captain of a sloop in those parts, and resided at Oyster Bay in 1653. John was one of the witnesses, Aug. 18, 1665, to the payment to the Indians of a part of the purchase money for the town lands, and took the oath of allegiance in February following. He died soon after, and his rights were transferred to John Ogden.⁵

Joseph Frazee (Frazee) came with the first settlers, but whence does not appear. His house-lot contained 6 acres, of the usual form, 15 by 4 chains, and was bounded S. W. by David Ogden, N. E. by William Letts, S. E. by a highway, and N. W. by a swamp. He received, May 9, 1676, a warrant for 120 acres. Feb. 1, 1685, he received a warrant for 50 acres adjoining his own land, "betwixt Raway River and the branch, in Compensation for two highways made through his Land, one leading to Vincent's and the other to Woodbridge." His son Joseph had also 135 acres on "Raway" River, adjoining Dr. Robinson's land, and 15 acres of meadow between Rahway River and "Emet's Creek." The house-lot he sold to William Looker, then of Woodbridge. Frazee bought, Sept. 21, 1678, of Luke Watson, 182 acres; and July 4, 1682, William Broadwell's town lands. His possessions were mostly along the Rahway River, and the family settled eventually in Westfield and New Providence. A tract of land on the Passaic River has, in consequence of their locating upon it, been called "Frazey's Meadows." Mr. Frazey sold, Sept. 7, 1698, 39 acres E. of the Rahway to Samuel Pack. He died in January, 1714.¹

John Gray was, as elsewhere said, the step-father of Luke Watson, having married, as early as 1644, Elizabeth, Watson's mother, and daughter of William Frost, of Uncowah (Fairfield), Conn. He was one of the patentees of Newtown, L. I., being, with three exceptions, the largest contributor among many to the expense of the purchase. He incurred, in 1653, the wrath of the Dutch government (for what does not appear), and sentence of banishment was pronounced against him March 24th. Again, Aug. 10, 1654, he was on trial, "accused of divers crimes," of which "abusing the magistrates" of the town alone is specified. He confessed, was indicted, and sentenced. Jan. 26, 1656, he is spoken of as "a fugitive from justice." Yet in 1658 he was still residing at Newtown. His offense was probably political. He must have been well advanced in life when he accompanied Watson to this town, and having lost his first wife had married Hannah —, to whom by deed, Sept. 10, 1675, he gave his estate. In April, 1673, when he sold his meadow land to William Pilles, he had removed to New Piscataway. He probably died soon after the gift to his wife. No record is found of his allotments.²

Daniel Harris was from Northampton, L. I., and a son of George, who was one of the neighbors of John Ogden. He came on with the first emigration (probably unmarried), induced, it may be, by his early companions, Ogden's boys. He has left no memorial. Henry Harris, who was one of Mr. Harriman's parishioners in 1696, may have been his son, and George Harris, in 1725, a grandson.³

Leonard Headley has left no memorial of his origin. He had surveyed, Oct. 14, 1678, "in right of himself and his wife," 150 acres. His house-lot contained 4 acres, 10 by 4 chains, bounded northwest by John Ogden, Jr., and on the other sides by highways. He had 8 acres of upland "at Brackett's Spring," and along the brook, adjoining Hur Thompson and a swamp; also 6 acres of upland, "lying in the way going to the point," bounded in part by John Ogden, Jr., and John Woodruff; also 20 acres on the Creek, bounded by Daniel Dehart and Robert Vauquellin; also 33 acres, "in the plaine," bounded by George Morris and John Ogden, Jr.; also 65 acres of upland "at the North end of the plaine," "by the Mill brooke," and bounded by Margaret Baker, Jonathan Ogden, and Benjamin Parkis; also 14 acres in the Great Meadow. He died February, 1683, and Sarah Smith administered on his estate, which was valued at £99 3s. 6d.⁴

Matthias Heathfield (Hetfield, Hatfield) was a weaver, and came hither from New Haven, Conn., where he took the oath of fidelity May 1, 1660. In the Record of Surveys, Aug. 29, 1676, he is called "Hatfield," and in his will, "Hattfield." He is supposed to have been a son of Thomas Hatfield, of Leyden, a member of John Robinson's church, and a native of Yorkshire, England. Mr. Thomas Hatfield, who settled about the same time at Mamaroneck, N. Y., was probably his brother. His house-lot contained 5 acres, 10 by 5 chains, bounded east by the highway and Thomas Moore, north and south by unsurveyed land, and west by Dennis White. He had also 22 acres of upland "in a triangle" bounded by William Letts, John Winans, Samuel Marsh, and a swamp; also 12 acres of upland, bounded by Nathaniel Bonnel, Robert Vauquellin, and a way that parted him from Governor Carteret; also 112 acres of upland on "the two mile brook;" also 40 acres of upland "towards the west branch of Elizabeth Town River," bounded by John Winans and an Indian path; also 14 acres of meadow "at Rawack," and 3 acres of meadow on the north side of East Town Creek,—in all 208 acres. He was a boatman, as well as a weaver, and seems to have been a man of considerable means. "For twelve hundred gilders secured to him by bill" (a large sum in those days) he purchased, Dec. 5, 1673, of "Abraham Lubbersen, of New Orania, in the New Netherlands, his dwelling-house and homelott, with all other accommodations belonging to s^d first Lott, within the bounds of Elizabeth, both upland and meadow."

It thus appears that Mr. Lubbersen was among the early settlers of the town. He had been a citizen of New Amsterdam before the conquest, and resided in 1665 in De Hoogh Straat (High Street), now Pearl, east of Broad Street, having previously lived for several years on the west side of the Prince Graft (Broad Street). This latter residence he sold Sept. 5, 1671, and is spoken of in the deed as "Abram Lubberse of Elizabeth towne in New Jearsie." He was one of the skippers of the port, having command of a Hudson River sloop. He came here in 1666 or 1667, and built the stone house on the lower part of Pearl Street, at its junction with Hatfield Street, now in the possession of Abel S. Hatfield. It is, undoubtedly, the oldest house in town, is in good repair, and has never been alienated from the family since its purchase in 1673. Mr. Lubberson had three children born here,—Abraham, Josias, and Andries. On the reconquest of New York by the Dutch, in 1673, he returned to his old home in New Orange, as the city was then called.

Mr. Hatfield was the original owner of the land on which the First Presbyterian Church stands, and is entitled to the credit of having given it to the town for a church and burial-place. When the church property was surveyed in 1766, the trustees affirmed "that the first Purchasers and Associates did give the 1st Tract of land for the use of the Presbyterian Church, the Record of which on or about the year 1719 was either lost or destroyed." This statement was admitted by the Town Committee, and they allowed, Aug. 27, 1766, the above "Lot of Land to the 1st Trustees their Heirs and Successors on the right of Matthias Hatfield, one of the 1st Associates." A grandson of Mr. Hatfield had then been a trustee of the church for twelve years, and was the first president of the board. He must have known the exact state of the case. Mr. Hatfield died in December, 1687, his wife, Maria (of Dutch nativity), and three sons, Isaac, Abraham, and Cornelius, surviving him. It is not known, though it is quite probable, that he left daughters also.¹

John Hinds (Heynes, Haynes, Haines) and his brother James were "East Enders" from Long Island. They were sons of James Hinds, who came over from England to Salem, Mass., as early as 1637, when he was admitted a freeman. He married in 1638, and at an early day removed to Southold, L. I., where he died March, 1653, his estate being valued at £123 5s. 4d. He had eight children,—John, James, Benjamin, Mary, James (2d), Jonathan, Sarah, and Thomas. His widow was married in June, 1656, to Ralph Dayton, of Southold. John was the oldest son, and was baptized Aug. 28, 1639. James was baptized Feb. 27, 1648. Benjamin Haines, who was at Southampton in 1639, and a resident of North Sea (Northampton) in 1657, was probably a brother of James, Sr. He was the grandfather of Stephen, who removed to this town as early as 1725, and was the ancestor of Governor Daniel Haines.

John Hinds, the son of James, Sr., of Southold, was bred a cooper. No record remains of his allotments of land. He married Mary, a daughter of Goodman Thompson, and their daughter had been married as early as 1700 to Isaac Whitehead, Jr. He was a constable of the town in 1710 and 1711. A curious record of him occurs in the ledger of Rev.

John Harriman: "1695, Feb. 28, pr acco^t of teaching my son Samuel the mistery of a cooper, tho^a not pformed according to bargain—£4. 00. 00."

James was also a cooper, and came here about ten years later than his brother John. He received, July 11, 1677, a warrant, "in Right of himself & his wife," for 120 acres of land, on account of which he had a survey of 108 acres of upland, bounded by Richard Clark, James Emot, and the Westbrook; also 12 acres of "meadow in the great Meadows." He purchased Sept. 4, 1676, of William Looker, then of Jamaica, L. I., his house, garden, orchard, and house-lot, probably in the way of trade, as he continued still to reside in this town, and was living in 1703.²

Benjamin Homan (Oman) was from the east end of Long Island. John Homan was at Setauket (Brookhaven) a few years later, and was, it may be, either his father or his son. He was one of the Associates of the town, and had the usual allotments of land, but no mention is made of them in the records. He lived a bachelor until his death, April 1, 1684. He gave, by will, six acres to Benjamin Meeker, and the remainder of his estate, valued at £63 5s. 6d., to Martha Parkis (Parkhurst), of E. Town, widow. She may have been his sister.³

William Johnson was at New Haven, Conn., as early as the year 1648. Thomas and John, who came to Newark in 1666-67, the one from Milford, and the other from Branford, the sons of Robert, an emigrant to New Haven from Hull, England, were probably his cousins. They had a brother William, but he continued at Guilford, Conn., was a deacon of the church, and grandfather of Rev. Dr. Samuel Johnson, of New York. William Johnson, of this town, had a house-lot of four acres, 10 by 4 chains, bounded west by Humphry Spinage, south by Jacob Melyen, and north and east by highways; also 12 acres of upland on "the little Neck," bounded by George Ross, Humphry Spinage, and his own meadow; also 60 acres of upland on "Rawack" River, bounded by Symon Rous, the swamp, the river, and his meadow,—"a highway to pass through the said Land;" also 60 acres of upland on "Rawack plaine," bounded by Luke Watson, Symon Rous, a swamp, and unsurveyed land; also 100 acres of upland on "the W. branch of Rawack River;" also 6 acres of meadow on Rawack River; also 6 acres of meadow on E. T. Creek, joining his 12 acre lot; also 13 acres of meadow on the Rawack River,—in all 262 acres. He mortgaged, Nov. 11, 1678, his whole estate in the town to Roger Lambert to secure the payment of £100, and subsequently Lambert became the owner.⁴

Jeffry Jones was from Southold, L. I., where he was made a freeman May, 1664. He and Edward Jones, who was at Southampton as early as 1644, it is thought, were sons of the Rev. John Jones, who came with the Rev. Mr. Shepard, of Cambridge, and the Rev. John Wilson, of Boston, Mass., from England, arriving Oct. 2, 1635; was a colleague of Rev. Peter Bulkley, of Concord, Mass., from 1636 to 1644, when he came to Fairfield, Conn., and resided there until his death, 1664, being over seventy years of age. One of the sons, Rev. Eliphalet (born Jan. 9, 1640), was the first minister of Huntington, L. I. Jeffry Jones had a house-lot on the west side of Mill Creek, between David Ogden on the south, and William Cramer on the north. He had a warrant for 180 acres, but no return of the survey is on record. His house-lot he sold, Aug. 24, 1686, to Jonas Wood. He was associated, May 20, 1668, with Ogden, Bond, and Watson in running the boundary line between this town and Newark. He was also one of the Whaling Company, incorporated Feb. 15, 1669. An action of trespass and ejectment was brought against him by "the Proprietors," in the name of James Fullerton, in 1693, because of his refusal to take out a patent from them for his lands, and to pay them "Quit Rents." Judgment having been rendered against him, he appealed to the King in Council, by whom, Feb. 25, 1696, it was set aside. He outlived the most of the founders of the town, his death occurring in December, 1717.¹

Thomas Leonards was doubtless of the Southampton stock. He was admitted a freeman of Connecticut in 1658. He probably died soon after his coming, as no subsequent trace of him has been found.²

Samuel Marsh was from New Haven, Conn., where he took the oath of fidelity, May 2, 1647. He came here, among the first settlers from Connecticut, with his wife and seven children. His house-lot contained seven acres, of irregular form, 6 chains broad, and in length 15 chains on the west side and 10 chains on the east side, bounded on the west by Jonas Wood, and on the other sides by highways. He had also 18 acres of upland "in the Neck," bounded by John Wimans, Matthias Hatfield, and William Letts, also 100 acres of upland "at Rowack," called by the name of Ragged Neck, bounded by Jeffry Jones, Simon Rouse, and his own meadow; also 60 acres of upland adjoining the 100 acre lot, bounded by Jeffry Jones, a great swamp, and his own land; also 14 acres of meadow on the north side of his upland, and 6 acres of meadow, at Luke Watson's neck, on the north side of Thompson's Creek,—in all 205 acres. His eldest son, Samuel, Jr., was admitted among the 80 Associates, and had an allotment of 80 acres of upland at

"Rahawack," bounded by Robert Vauquellin, Simon Rouse, Thomas Moore, Benjamin Wade, and a great swamp; also ten acres of upland on the two-mile brook, adjoining Matthias Hatfield and David Oliver; also 10 acres of meadow "lying at Rahawack in the Meadow of Samuel Marsh, Senr,"—in all 100 acres. "Old Marsh," as the father was familiarly called, died in September, 1683.³

William Meeker was also from New Haven, Conn., where he took the oath of fidelity, July 1, 1644. He was propounded, Oct. 7, 1646, to "be loader to mill" "for a 12 month," "to goe in all seasons except vn-reasonable weather." Frequently he appears in the records as "Meaker" and "Mecar." His house-lot contained six acres, bounded north by Henry Norris, west by the highway, south by his son Joseph, and east by the swamp. He had also thirteen acres of upland, bounded by his son Benjamin, Robert Bond, and Joseph Osborne; also 45 acres of upland "by Henry Lyon," bounded by his son Benjamin and Robert Bond; also 75 acres of upland, bounded by Hur Thompson, a small brook, and a swamp; also 12 acres of meadow on the south side of Bound Creek, and 2½ acres on E. Town Creek,—in all 152 acres. He was appointed, Oct. 13, 1671, constable of the town, and in performance of the duties of his office became obnoxious to the Governor and his party, and the property just described was forfeited in favor of William Pardon, as related on a subsequent page. His sons, Joseph and Benjamin, were also numbered among the eighty Associates. Joseph had a house-lot containing six acres, bounded north by his father, south by his brother Benjamin, east by Robert Vauquellin, and west by a highway. He had also 35 acres, bounded by Joseph Sayre, a small brook, a fresh meadow, and a highway that goes into the meadows; also 45 acres, "adjoining to Master Bond," bounded by Henry Lyon, Robert Bond, Henry Norris, and John Woodruff; also 12 acres "on the West Side of the plaine," bounded by Moses Thompson, Isaac Whitehead, Sr., Moses Hopkins, and the Mill Creek,—in all 98 acres. Benjamin had a house-lot, containing five acres, 9 by 5½ chains, bounded west by a highway, east by George Morris and Henry Lyon, north by his brother Joseph, and south by unsurveyed land. He had also 24 acres of upland, bounded by Joseph Osborne, Robert Bond, and "a run;" also 60 acres of upland, bounded by Robert Bond, Henry Lyon, and Isaac Whitehead, Sr.; also 66 acres of upland, bounded by Hur Thompson, two small brooks, and a swamp,—in all 155 acres. He was one of the town constables in 1711. Joseph kept a country store, and Benjamin was a carpenter, while both were planters. The father died in December, 1690.⁴

Jacob Melyen (Monlains, Murline, Melleyns, Melyn, Meleins) came here from New Haven, Conn., but was previously of New Amsterdam. He was the son of the patroon, Cornelius Melyn, whose name is familiar to every student of Dutch American history. The father was born, 1602, at Antwerp, Holland, and emigrated in 1639 to New Netherland. He returned in 1640 for his wife (Janneken) and children, and obtained a grant of Staten Island. There he planted a colony in 1641, which was broken up by the Indian war of 1643. Removing to New Amsterdam, he took up his residence in Broad, between Stone and Pearl Streets, on the east side. He espoused the popular side in politics, for which he was heavily fined by Governor Stuyvesant, and banished for seven years. He returned to Holland for redress, was wrecked Sept. 27, 1647, and lost one of his sons, barely escaping with his own life. The home government sustained his appeal, but Stuyvesant still persisted in his opposition. After another voyage to Holland, he re-established himself in 1650 on Staten Island, continuing there until the colony was again dispersed by the Indians, in the massacre of 1655. He removed to New Haven, Conn., where he and his son Jacob took the oath of fidelity, April 7, 1657. In 1659 he repaired again to Holland, effected a settlement of his difficulties, relinquished Staten Island to the West India Company, and soon after returned to New Netherland. He had died in 1674, leaving his wife, three sons,—Jacob, Cornelis, and Isaac,—and three daughters,—Marian (married), and residing at New Haven), Susanna, and Magdaleen, who were married subsequently to Jacob Schellinger and Jacob Soper, merchants of New York.

Jacob, the eldest son, was born at Antwerp, Holland, about 1640, and came an infant to America. His boyhood was passed in the midst of the exciting scenes just referred to, by which he was educated in the love of liberty and hatred of oppression. He accompanied his father to Holland and back in 1659, returning to New Haven. He was reprimanded, May 1, 1660, by Governor Newman, as related in the "Blue Laws" of Connecticut, for kissing and taking other improper liberties with Miss Sarah Tuttle. He married, in 1662, Hannah, the daughter of George Hubbard, of Guilford, Conn. Her sister Abigail, in 1657, had become the wife of Humphrey Spinning. He and Spinning attached themselves to the band of pilgrims who, in 1665, emigrated from New Haven to this town. He had been familiar, doubtless, with this particular locality from his childhood, by reason of his residence on Staten Island. His knowledge of the Dutch language, and possibly of the Indian tongue also, made him a valuable acquisition to the new colony of Achter Kull.

His house-lot contained four acres, 10 by 4 chains, and was bounded west by his brother-in-law, Humphrey Spinning south by John Winans, north by William Johnston, and east by a highway. This lot, with his house, barn, orchard, etc., he sold, Feb. 8, 1678, to John Winans. He had 100 acres on the South Neck of Elizabeth township, which he sold, March 9, 1677, to Nicholas Carter. For himself, wife, and two servants he was allowed 360 acres. His patent gave him 450 acres. He was a partner in the Whaling Company of 1669. During the Dutch rule, 1673-74, he was in high favor, being appointed one of the schepens of the town, and captain of the militia company. He removed to New York in 1674, and resided in the Mill Street Lane (South William Street). Two of his children, Susanna and Jacob, were baptized in the Dutch Church, New York, Oct. 3, 1674, and three others, Daniel, Sammel, and Abigail, Aug. 7, 1677. Subsequently to 1683 he removed to Boston, probably for the convenience of educating his son Samuel (afterwards a minister of this town), who graduated in 1696 at Harvard College. At Boston he traded in leather, and served several years as constable. His decease occurred in December, 1706, his wife surviving until 1717. His daughter Abigail married (1) William Tilley and (2) Chief Justice Samuel Sewall. His daughter Joanna, born in 1683, about the time that he removed to Boston became the wife of the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, of this town. In his will he affirms that he had spent £300 on Sammel's education. In the Boston News Letter, Oct. 1, 1705, is an advertisement in these words: "A House and Land in the High-Fore-Street at the Sign of the Buck, in the South End of Boston, now in the Occupancy of Mr. Jacob Melyen, to be Sold."¹

Thomas More (Moor, Moore) was from Southold, L. I. He was the son of Thomas, who came over in 1630, in the "Mary and John," to Dorchester, Mass.; joined the church at Salem, was admitted a freeman, May 18, 1631, and removed with his brother, Deacon John Moore, first to Windsor, Conn., then to Southampton, and then to Southold, L. I. The father was a man of influence, and represented Southold in the General Court at New Haven in 1658, and at Hartford in 1664. Thomas, Jr., was at Newton in 1664, whence the following year he came to this town. His house-lot, "formerly belonging to Joachim Andriessen," he sold to William Pyles previous to 1672, and purchased, June 22, 1675, the house-lot, containing four acres, bounded north and east by a highway, south by Matthias Hatfield, and west by Denis White. He had also 60 acres of upland, "towards Rahawack," adjoining Benjamin Wade; also 42 acres "on the South side of Elizabeth River," bounded by Benjamin Wade, Humphrey Spinage, the river, and the plain; also 60 acres of upland, "on the North side of the said River," bounded by Humphrey Spinage, Stephen Osborne, and "the branch of the said Elizabeth River;" also 20 acres of meadow, adjoining William Pilles' upland,—in all 187 acres. Thomas Moore in 1676 had 80 acres surveyed for him on the south side of Staten Island. He survived until June, 1708.¹

Robert Mosse (Morss, Morse) and his son Peter were from Massachusetts. They were at Boston in 1644, at Newbury in 1654, and still later at Rowley, whence, in 1665, they came hither. The father was a tailor, and had a large family. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded north by his son Peter, south by William Pardon, west by the highway, and east by Elizabeth River and a highway. He had also 12 acres of upland, bounded by William Trotter, his son Peter, and Crane's Brook; also 44 acres of upland, bounded by the river, William Pardon, William Trotter, Daniel Tuttle, his son Peter, and the Common; also "a Neck of Land Lying between two brooks," 66 acres, bounded by West Brook, Peach Garden Brook, and Thompson's Creek; also another plot of 66 acres, adjoining on the west, lying on Peach Garden Brook; also 6 acres of meadow on Thompson's Creek, 9 acres on the Sound, and 7 acres on Peach Garden and West Brooks,—in all 202 acres. The tract on the E. T. Creek he disposed of, Sept. 26, 1681, to his son-in-law, William Broadwell, and several other tracts, June 24, 1686, to Jonas Wood. The next day he obtained a warrant for 150 acres more.

Peter's house-lot contained six acres, bounded west by a highway, north by William Trotter, south by his father, and east by E. T. Creek. He had also 12 acres of upland, adjoining his father; also 40 acres of upland "near the Ash Swamp upon a hill," bounded by William Pardon, Stephen Crane, John Little, and the Common; also "a Neck of Land at Rawack," 140 acres along West Brook, Rawack Swamp, and the Common; also 18 acres of meadow on Thompson's Creek, and 6 acres on Luke Watson's Point,—in all 224 acres, of which 20 acres were "in Right of Joachim Andriessen." The homestead was on "Thompson's Creek," hence more generally known of late as "Morse's Creek," long the boundary between Rahway and Elizabeth. Peter died in May, 1702.²

Nathaniel Norton was from the east end of Long Island, but, though admitted one of the eighty Associates, was induced after a short sojourn to return to the island. He took up his abode at Brookhaven, where he was living in 1675, and in 1683 his East Town rights were transferred to Henry Norris.³

William Oliver cannot now be traced with any certainty. He was probably the son of John, who died in 1746, or of Thomas, who died in 1652, at Boston or its vicinity, each of them leaving a large family. Thomas was of Bristol, and came over in 1632 from London. William had a house-lot containing eight acres, 20 by 4 chains, bounded west by Charles Tucker, south by Jonas Wood, and north and east by highways. He had also 12 acres of upland "at Luke Watson's Point," bounded by Jeffry Jones, Caleb Carwithy, the meadows, and a highway; also 84 acres of upland "at Rawack," bounded by Peter Morse, Samuel Marsh, Sr., David Oliver, and William Pilles. He died about 1694.⁴

Joseph Osborn (Osbourne, Osburne) and Jeremy Osborn were from East Hampton, L. I. They were the sons of Goodman Thomas Osborne, one of the founders of that town in 1649 or 1650. He had been also one of the founders of New Haven, Conn., in 1639, where, in 1643, he was rated at £300, and had a family of six. Richard, then of New Haven, and afterwards of Fairfield, was his brother. Thomas was at Hingham, Mass., in 1635, and removed to Connecticut before the Pequot war of 1637, in which he served. Thomas, John, Jeremiah, Joseph, and Stephen were his sons. The first two settled in East Hampton, the others joined the company of emigrants to Achter Kull, and were founders of this town. Jeremiah was a witness, Aug. 18, 1665, to the payment of the money to the Indians for the purchase of the town. He probably died soon after, as his name does not appear among the original Associates. His brother Stephen had taken his place before 1673. Jeremiah Osborn, who was one of Mr. Harriman's parishioners from 1687 to 1705, and afterwards became a Quaker, was a son of Stephen, was born in 1661, removed to Morris County, and lived to an extreme old age. He made a long deposition, March 23, 1741, in the celebrated case of Daniel Cooper vs. John Crain and others, printed at length in the E. T. Bill in Chancery, Schedule X.

Joseph Osborn received a warrant for 150 acres of land, but the returns of the survey are not on record, consequently his several parcels of land cannot now be located. Stephen had two house-lots, "Lying and being in Elizabeth Towne Upon the Mill Creek," containing 12 acres, 12 by 10 chains, bounded W. by the creek, S. and E. by highways, and N. by an unsurveyed house-lot. One of these two lots probably was Jeremiah's. He sold them both, Oct. 13, 1689, to Joseph Wilson. He had also 12 acres of upland on "the little Neck," bounded by Jeremiah Peck, Joseph Sayre, John Woodruff, Moses Thompson, and a swamp; also 121 acres of upland on "the South branch of Elizabeth Towne Creek," bounded by Nathaniel Bonnel, Thomas Moore, George Ross, and the branch; also three acres of meadow on the E. T. Creek, and 12 acres "in the great Meadows at the upper end of Forkey Creek,"—in all 160 acres. He died July, 1698. Joseph was living in 1707.⁵

George Pack came with the first colonists, but whence cannot now be learned. He had a house-lot containing six acres, bounded N. W. by John Little, and on the other sides by highways. He had also 30 acres of upland, bounded by Barnabas Wines, John Little, Nicholas Carter, and unsurveyed land; also 40 acres of upland, bounded by Joseph Sayre, Nicholas Carter, two small brooks, and unsurveyed land; also 4 acres of swamp and 12 acres of meadow on "the great River" (the Sound),—in all 118 acres. He died February, 1705.¹

Richard Paynter (Painter) was a tailor, who came hither from New York, but originally from Southampton. Carter's son was apprenticed to him March 25, 1669. His house-lot contained three acres, 10 by 3 chains, bounded S. by Capt. Philip Carteret, formerly Abraham Shotwell, and N. E. and W. by highways. He had also 20 acres of upland, bounded by a round hill, the Mill Creek, and Mrs. Baker; also 96 acres of upland, bounded by Isaac Whitehead, Jr., Leonard Headley, Joseph Sayre, and the Mill Brook; also 15½ acres of meadow,—in all 134½ acres. His residence here was of short duration. In the winter of 1670–71 he removed to New York, and sold, April 3, 1671, his "Plantation with the Dwelling-House, etc.," to Balthazar De Hart, of New York, merchant. De Hart died in January, 1672, and his executors sold, July 4, 1672, to Richard Skinner, of E. T., "Joyner," the house and property bought of Richard Painter ("wherein the above named Richard Skinner now Liveth and was servant unto the said Richard Painter and also to the said Balthazar De Hart") for £48; "£16 in Porke at Three Pounds the Barrell, Wheat at four Shillings the Bushell, Pease at three shillings the Bushell Beef in Life at three Pence the Pound." Skinner must have forfeited the property for want of fulfillment of the conditions of payment, and it was again sold, March 21, 1681, by Daniel De Hart, to George Jewell, then a recent comer from Piscataway. Painter was living in 1679 at Southampton, "on the west street running by the swamp."²

John Parker, it is thought, was from the east end of Long Island, probably of the Bridgehampton family. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded east and north by Governor Carteret, south by the highway, and west by Joseph Ogden. He had also six acres of upland on "the North Neck," bounded by Leonard Headley, John Ogden, Jr., and "the Common pasture;" also 60 acres of upland, bounded by John Woodruff, the meadow and the "Common Land;" also 12 acres of upland on the west side of Mr. Woodruff, and between two swamps; also 12½ acres of meadow in the same vicinity,—in all 96 acres. His house-lot he sold to Carteret, Aug. 15, 1675, for £8, probably without improvements. He died in December, 1702, leaving his property to Robert Smith, of Egg Harbor, Widow Sarah Browne, Thomas Headley, and "the Church of Christ in Elizabeth Town;" to the latter £3.³

Thomas Pope was an associate in 1644 of Strickland, Ogden, the Dentons, and Jonas Wood in settling Hempstead, L. I. He seems to have either accompanied or followed John Ogden to the east end of the island, as in 1652 he had a house-lot of 3 acres "next to Mr. Stanbrough," granted him at Southampton. His son John also is named among the early settlers of that town. His house-lot here was on the south side of the creek, adjoining the Governor. He sold it February, 1669, to William Pilles. He died previous to 1677. Mary, his widow, and her son, John, sold, Feb. 25, 1677, their dwelling-house and lot with 60 acres of upland, for £39, to Benjamin Wade. John was one of the eighty Associates. He received March 28, 1676, a warrant for 100 acres, and July 9, 1686, another for 150 acres. Of this last 120 acres were located "on Raway River," bounded by the river, "Pope's brook" (in the township of Springfield, near Milntown), and unoccupied land. The other 30 acres were bounded by Jeffry Jones, William Johnstone, and "Common Land." Of the first grant, a plot of 80 acres was bounded by John Miles, Joseph Frazee, and unsurveyed land. He had died in 1713. He gave the name to "Pope's Corners."⁴

Benjamin Price was from East Hampton. He came to the island, it is thought, with Lion Gardiner, in 1639. He subscribed as a witness the deed given March 10, 1640, by James Farret, Lord Stirling's agent, to Gardiner for the island that has ever since borne his name. He settled first at Southampton, but in 1649 united with several of his neighbors in settling East Hampton. He resided on the east side of the main street, not far from Gardiner and the Rev. Mr. James, and next to "the Parsonage lot, in the hart of the Towne." He took a leading part in town affairs, was appointed Oct. 7, 1651, recorder or town clerk, and Aug. 1, 1660, was one of the patentees of Montauk Point. He took an active part in furthering the emigration of so many East Enders to this locality, and was held in honor by his townsmen here. In 1675 he represented the town in the House of Burgesses, and was appointed Dec. 13, 1682, one of Governor Rudyard's Council; Feb. 4, 1683, justice of the peace; March 28, 1683, one of Governor Lawrie's Council; and Jan. 29, 1693, one of the judges of small causes. He outlived the most of the founders, his death occurring after Aug. 30, 1705, when his will was made, and not later than Oct. 7, 1712, when it was admitted to probate.

The locality of his house-lot is not on record. He had 24 acres of upland "along the Road Leading to the Point," adjoining his son Daniel; also 50 acres of upland adjoining "Henry Lyon's House," the Town Creek, "a Little Creeke on which Henry Bakers Tannfatt stands," Margaret Baker, John Woodruff, Leonard Headley, Ephraim Price, and Peter Woolverton; also 20 acres of upland on the Point road, adjoining Margaret Baker; also 120 acres of upland near the Great Meadow; also 9 acres of upland in the Great Meadow, north of Capt. Young; also 8 acres of upland "on the Long Meadow Island," on this side Rahway River; also 25 acres of upland on the Point road adjoining Margaret Baker; also 14 acres of meadow,—in all 270 acres.

Benjamin, Jr., his son, was also one of the eighty Associates. He was appointed, Aug. 22, 1695, one of the justices of the peace. His house lot contained six acres, bounded south and east by the highway, west by his brother Thomas, and north by Isaac Whitehead, Sr. He had also 41 acres of upland, bounded by Robert Bond, Joseph Bond, and unsurveyed land; also 19 acres of upland adjoining his father, and unsurveyed land; also 14 acres of upland adjoining his father and Joseph Ogden; also 88 acres of upland "near the Governor's point," bounded by his father and Daniel De Hart; also 10 acres of upland, bounded by his father and Col. Richard Townley; also two acres on "y^e way to y^e meadows," adjoining his father; also ten acres "of Salt Marsh in the great Meadow;" also 8 acres of meadow "by the Long pond & forked Creek;" also six acres of meadow "on a creek called Long Creek or forked creek,"—in all 200 acres.¹

Evan Salsbury, of whose origin nothing certain can now be ascertained, was probably Carwithy's friend and associate, coming with him from the east end of Long Island. His house-lot adjoined William Cramer on the southeast. He bought Cramer's house-lot and his second lot-right, but sold the two, Dec. 26, 1670, to John Little for £65. He is called a "brickmaker," but was bred a carpenter, and had previously, it is thought, followed the seas. Capt. John Young, of Southold, L. I., sold him, Oct. 4, 1671, his shallop of eight tons burden, "or thereabout," with all its appurtenances, the mast, sails, rigging, cable, anchor, etc., for "18,000 good Merchantable White-Oak pipe Staves," a bond being given for the payment, signed by Salsbury, Carwithy, and Cramer. The witnesses were Benjamin Price and Joseph Sayre. It is quite likely that he and Carwithy, who disappears from the records about this time, became "coasters," and of uncertain residence. Salsbury was here when the Dutch enrollment was made in 1673, but no further mention of him is made.²

Abraham Shotwell, whose origin is not known, was certainly in sympathy with the popular party of the town. In the contentions between the people and

Carteret, described in succeeding pages, Shotwell was bold and outspoken against the Governor's usurpations. He became the victim of Carteret's wrath, his house and grounds were confiscated, and he himself driven into exile. His house-lot was "next east of the mill." In July, 1683, it was thus described: "Bounded on the North by Land now in possession of George Jewell and runs along by his Fence three Chaios and one-third of a Chaine from thence running upon a South and by a West Line twelve Chains to the highway which Leads towards the mill or meeting house from thence it runs by the said highway westward three chains and one third part of a chain and from thence it runs along by the highway that leads from the Mill towards Newark upon a North and by East Line Twelve chains Containing in all four acres. Also, a small pece more Containing One Acre English measure ruoning by the highway which Leads from the Mill or meeting house Eastward three Chains and one third part of a chain from thence it runs downward to the Creek upon a South and by a West Line Three Chains & from thence it runs away Westward as the Creek or highway runs, three Chains and one third part of a Chaine and from thence it runs by the highway which Leads from the Mill towards Newark upon a North and by East Line three Chaius." It is easy to identify this property as including the whole east side of Broad Street from the stone bridge to a point 792 feet north of Elizabeth Avenue,—a most valuable piece of property. Shotwell retired to New York, and appealed to the Lords Proprietors. In the mean time he returned to his home sustained by his townsmen. His appeal was not sustained, and he was informed, by orders from the proprietary government, that he must depart the town, and should he return that he would be subjected to severe indignities. His property was sold at public auction, Aug. 25, 1675, for £12, to Thomas Blumfield, carpenter, of Woodbridge, who resold it a fortnight later for £14 to Governor Carteret. It was on Shotwell's one-acre lot that the Governor is thought to have built his new house, where he resided at the time of his decease. Shotwell obtained a grant of land from the New York government, and died in exile. Daniel, who settled on Staten Island, was probably his son. John, another son, married, at New York, October, 1679, Elizabeth Burton. After Carteret's removal and death, John appealed to Governor Rudyard, who restored him by order, May 29, 1683, the property that had been arbitrarily wrested from his father. The Shotwell family settled mostly in the south and southwest parts of the town.³

Michael Simpkin was from Stamford, Conn. Nicholas Simkins in 1634 was captain of the Castle at Boston. Vincent Simkins (Smiking), a son or brother, probably, of the captain, accompanied the early colonists to Wethersfield, and was one of the company that bought, Oct. 30, 1640, Rippowams (Stanford) from the New Haven people, where he married, 1641, Mary, a daughter of Henry Ackerly. He had at least two sons, Daniel and John, most likely Michael also. He had died in 1656. Daniel settled in Bedford, N. Y., and John, with his widowed mother, removed to this town, where the mother soon after became the wife of William Oliver. He had an allotment of 80 acres of upland on the West Brook, bounded by William Cramer and William Oliver, a swamp and the two-mile brook; also 4 acres of meadow adjoining Aaron Thompson; also 3 acres of meadow on "Rawack River;" also 2 acres of meadow adjoining Jacob Melyen and George Pack,—in all 89 acres. John died unmarried before September, 1679, and his mother administered on his estate. Michael must have died soon after his coming, as no further mention of him is found.¹

Humphry Spinaage (Spinning) was from New Haven, Conn. He was a nephew of Goodman Humphrey Spinaage, one of the original settlers of New Haven, and one of the party that attempted to plant a colony on the Delaware in 1651. The nephew took the oath of fidelity at New Haven, April 7, 1657; and Oct. 14, 1657, married Abigail, the third daughter of George and Mary Hubbard, of Guilford, and sister of Hannah, the wife of Jacob Melyen. George Hubbard came from England about 1635, and was one of the early settlers of Wethersfield, Conn. He removed in 1644 to Milford, and in 1648 to Guilford. The house-lot of Humphrey Spinning contained four acres, 12 by 4 chains, and was bounded northeast and east by the rear of the house-lots of his brother-in-law, Jacob Melyen, William Johnson, and John Winans, and on every other side by a highway. He had also twelve acres of upland "on the Neck," bounded by Jeffry Jous, William Johnson, the meadows, and a highway; also 80 acres of upland "by Peach Garden Hill," bounded by Jacob Melyen, Charles Tucker, Peach Garden Brook, and his own meadow; also 40 acres of upland on the south side of the branch of Elizabeth River, bounded by Thomas Moore, John Winans, the plain, and Elizabeth Creek; also 60 acres on the north side of the branch, bounded by Benjamin Wade, Thomas Moore, the plain, and "the said River into Cranberry meadow;" also 7 acres of meadow on Peach Garden Brook; also 6 acres of meadow on Elizabeth Creek; also 9 acres on "the Point of Rawack Neck,"—in all 218 acres. He died September, 1689, leaving an estate valued at £223 8s. 0d.²

Thomas Tomson (Thompson) was one of the founders of East Hampton, L. I., in 1649, having come from

Lynn, Mass., by way of New London, Conn. At East Hampton he resided on the west side of the street, near Robert Bond and the two Mulfords. Goodman Thompson was one of the deputies of Elizabeth Town in the Legislature of 1672. He was active in opposing the arbitrary measures of Gov. Carteret, and was mulcted for his patriotism. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded north and south by Barnabas Wines, west by a highway, and east by the Mill Creek. He had also 18 acres of upland "on Luke Watson's Neck," bounded by Jacob Melyen, David Ogden, and a highway; also 52 acres of upland, bounded by Stephen Crane, Dennis White, George Pack, and his own land; also 20 acres of upland adjoining the last, bounded by his son Hur, Joseph Sayre, George Pack, and unsurveyed land; also 4 acres "in Rawack Meadow;" also 18 acres of meadow on a creek, which was named for him "Thompson's Creek," and since "Moris Creek,"—in all 118 acres. His three sons also were among the original Associates. Moses, who took the oath in February, 1666, had a warrant for 180 acres, but the survey is not on record. Aaron came into possession of the homestead at his father's death, September, 1676, and had a warrant for 60 acres in his own right, of which no return was made. Hur had a house-lot containing four acres, bounded south and east by a highway, north by Thomas Osborn, and east by unsurveyed land. He had also 12 acres of upland, bounded by Leonard Headley, Joseph Osborn, John Wilson, and a highway; also 45 acres of upland, bounded by Joseph Sayre, 2 small brooks, and unsurveyed land; also 40 acres of upland, bounded by Benjamin Meeker, a small brook, and the common; also 45 acres of upland, bounded by William Pardon, a small brook, the West Brook, and unsurveyed land; also 6 acres of meadow on the bay, 4 acres on Woodruff's Creek, and 10 acres more,—in all 161 acres. The father's estate at his death was valued at £152 15s. 6d.³

William Trotter came from Newbury, Mass. It may have been at his suggestion that so many of his former townsmen came on in the course of 1666-67 and settled the town of Woodbridge. His house-lot contained four acres, bounded east and west by a highway, south by Peter Morse, and north by Stephen Crane; also an addition of two acres, bounded east by the river, and on the other sides as the house-lot; also 13 acres of upland, bounded north and west by Robert Morse, south and east by "Elizabeth Town brook;" also 138 acres of upland, bounded by William Broadwell, a swamp, and unsurveyed land; also 23 acres of meadow in "the Common Meadow,"—in all 180 acres. In 1676 he had died. His name was given to a bridge in the northern part of the town plot.⁴

lander, coming hither with the East Enders of Long Island. His parentage has not been determined. He was probably the son (or may have been the brother) of John Tooker, of Southold, residing as early as 1655 in that part of the town that was called Riverhead, originally from the vicinity of Boston, Mass., and made a freeman at Southold Oct. 9, 1662. Charles had a house-lot containing eight acres, bounded north by the highway, east by William Oliver, west by Caleb Carwithy, and south by "the Swamp in Common;" also 21 acres of meadow on Thompson's Creek, and adjoining "the great island." He had at first a plot of upland containing 86 acres; but as this was found by survey to be included in Jacob Melyen's allotment, he obtained in lieu 69 acres of upland on the two-mile brook. He had also a parcel of land called "Peach Garden Hill," containing 86 acres, bounded by Capt. John Baker, Humphrey Spinage, Peach Garden Brook, and the Common,—in all 184 acres.¹

Nathaniel Tuttle (Tuthill) was from Southold, L. I. His father, John Tuthill, and uncle, William, were from Norfolkshire, England. The latter came over in 1635 in the "Planter," landing at Boston. The two brothers settled at New Haven in 1639–40. John came to Southold in 1641 with the Rev. John Youngs. In 1647 he was one of the four patentees of Oyster Ponds, L. I. Nathaniel came here with the first emigration, probably a young and unmarried man. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded north by William Pardon, east by the Mill Creek, southeast by Aaron Thompson and Barnabas Wines (a small hollow and a highway lying between), west and south another highway. He had also 12 acres of upland on the south side of Crane's Brook, adjoining Richard Beach; also 34 acres of upland adjoining George Pack and William Pardon; also 75 acres, bounded by Richard Beach, William Pardon, Stephen Crane, Robert Morse, and the Mill Creek; also 6 acres on "the great river" (the Sound), near "the Points of Rawack;" also 20 acres of meadow on the west of Thompson's Creek,—in all 153 acres. At his death, February, 1696, his estate was valued at £107 3s. 0d.²

Robert Vauquellin and his wife came over with Governor Carteret in the ship "Philip," landing July 29, 1665, at New York. He was a native of the city of Caen, Lower Normandy, France, and a grandson, doubtless, of Jean Vauquellin de la Fresnaye, lieutenant-general of the bailiwick of Caen, and chief justice of that country, whose decease occurred 1606, in his seventy-first year. Robert is styled in the East Jersey Records "Sieur des Prairies [des la Prairie], of the city of Caen, France," whence he is commonly called in the records and other documents of the day "Laprairie."³ In modern histories he is more frequently but erroneously called Van Quellin, as if he had been a Dutchman and not a Frenchman. Jersey, the home of the Carteret family, was inhabited principally by Frenchmen, and there, most probably, Vauquellin resided before his emigration. He accompanied Capt. Philip Carteret, January, 1665, to England, and Feb. 10, 1665, was appointed by Berkeley and Carteret surveyor-general of their new domain in America. The surveys recorded in the East Jersey Records from 1675 to 1681 all bear his signature, generally "Ro Vauquellin," and sometimes "La Prairie." He was appointed, Feb. 2, 1666, one of Carteret's Council, and adhered faithfully to the Governor's party and interests. Though admitted by the town as one of the eighty Associates, he had scarcely any interest in common with these sturdy Puritans.

He had a warrant for 300 acres of land "in Right of him and his wife that came with the Governor." He had a house-lot containing 12 acres, 30 by 4 chains, bounded east by Philip Carteret, Esq., and Richard Pewtinger, west by William Pardon, Joseph Meeker, Benjamin Meeker, and George Morris, south by a highway, and north by his own land; also 8 acres of upland or swamp, bounded by George Morris, Richard Pewtinger, Henry Norris, and a highway; also 4 acres of upland "near the Gov't point, on the S. Side of Math. Hatfields Line;" also 40 acres of upland, bounded by John Woodruff, Benjamin Parkhurst, Samuel Moore, George Morris, and a highway; also 40 acres of upland "at Rawack," bounded by Simon Rouse, Samuel Marsh, Jr., unsurveyed land, a small brook, and "Rawack River;" also 40 acres of upland "at the two mile brook;" also 27 acres of upland, bounded by Leonard Headley, Joseph Sayre, Isaac Whitehead, Joseph Meeker, unsurveyed land, and the Mill Creek; also 4 acres of meadow on Elizabeth Town Creek, 4 acres on "Rawack River," and 12 acres "on a small branch in Rawack River,"—in all 191 acres. A caveat or protest was entered by Benjamin Price against the four acres adjoining Matthias Hatfield. He was naturalized March 8, 1669–70. Finding at length that the Puritanic townsmen with whom he was compelled to associate were anything but congenial company, he concluded to change his residence. In 1678 he had removed to Woodbridge. He obtained, Feb. 4, 1681, a warrant for 200 acres of land and meadow on the Raritan for himself, "in Right of two men Servants and one Woman, viz.: Elizabeth Hallard, Edward fox & Francis the Spaniard;" also, shortly after, another warrant for 500 acres on the Raritan. He had obtained a patent for 175 acres in Woodbridge as early as Dec. 20, 1669. He received a warrant March 10, 1687, for 200 more acres adjoining his own land in Woodbridge. After this no further mention is made of him in the records.

³ The varieties of orthography at this period are shown by the fact that this name was written in at least twenty-two different ways: Vauquellin,

Dennis White was from Southampton, L. I. John White, the first settler of this name there, was at Lynn, Mass., in 1630, and at Southampton in 1647. Dennis was either his son or his brother. He had a house-lot containing nine acres, bounded east by Thomas Moore, Matthias Hatfield, and unsurveyed land, south-southeast by Jonas Wood, west and northwest by highways. He had also 90 acres of upland adjoining Aaron Thompson, also 12 acres of meadow,—in all 101 acres. In 1675 this property had come into the possession of Governor Carteret. It is likely, therefore, that Dennis White had removed from the town previous to that date, as nothing more is heard of him. Robert White (his brother it is thought) was also numbered among the eighty Associates, and had come in at an early date. His house-lot contained 8 acres, bounded southwest by Roger Lambert, northeast by John Little, southeast by William Letts, and northwest by a highway. He had also 50 acres of upland, bounded "by a little brook & a highway that goes to Woodbridge," John Winans, his own land, unsurveyed land, and the mile brook; also 34 acres of upland adjoining Jonas Wood; also 4 acres of swamp, and 12 acres of meadow,—in all 108 acres, granted him "in Right of himself, his wife, & Daughter." The latter, whose name was Ann, was old enough in March, 1676, to be married. His wife, Agatha, had become a widow in 1688.¹

Isaac Whitehead was of the New Haven company of immigrants. He was the son of John, one of the founders of New Haven. Isaac was a planter there as early as 1643, and took the oath of fidelity March 7, 1648. He resided on the east side, next the sea, beyond the Cove River. He came hither with a wife and seven children. He was chosen the first town clerk, and served as such until his death. He was appointed, March 22, 1680, captain of the military company; also, March 28, 1683, one of the judges of small causes, also in 1686; also, Dec. 3, 1683, coroner of the county. He had a house-lot containing six acres, bounded southeast by Nathaniel Bonnell, northwest by his son Isaac, northeast by his own land, and southwest by a highway. He had also 18 acres of upland, bounded by his son Isaac, Benjamin Price, Jr., Nathaniel Bonnell, and his own house-lot; also 12 acres of upland "at the W. side of the plain," bounded by Robert Vauquellin, Samuel Hopkins, and Joseph Meeker; also 20 acres of upland on "the Long Neck," bounded by Robert Bond, Benjamin Price, Jr., Nicholas Carter, and Henry Lyon; also 45 acres of upland adjoining Benjamin Meeker and Henry Lyon; also 55 acres of upland "at the great pond," bounded by Rev. Jeremiah Peck, Henry Lyon, and "the Sinking Marsh;" also 8 acres of meadow on Woodruff's Creek; also 10 acres of meadow on "Arthur Cull's bay;" also 3½ acres of meadow on East Town Creek,—in all 177½ acres. His decease occurred in February, 1691.

His eldest son, Isaac, born at New Haven, Nov. 20, 1652, was bred a cordwainer, and early became one of the Associates. He, too, was held in much consideration; he became, Nov. 4, 1693, captain of the militia; was appointed, Sept. 16, 1692, sheriff of the town; also, Jan. 29, 1693, one of the judges of small causes; also, April 1, 1693, coroner for the county; and Aug. 22, 1695, a justice of the peace for Essex. He had a house-lot containing four acres, bounded east by his father, and on the other sides by highways; also another house-lot of six acres, bounded north and west by his father, east by Thomas Frice, and south by a highway; also 64 acres of upland "on the East Side of the Mill Creek of Elizabeth Town," bounded by Jonathan Ogden, John Ogden, Jr., and Baltus De Hart; also 65 acres of upland "to the Northward of the Spring hill," bounded by Henry Lyon and Margaret Baker; also 35 acres of upland "on the North side of the Country road to Woodbridge," bounded by John Toe, James Hinds, Robert White, and Roger Lambert; also 6 acres of fresh meadow, adjoining John Woodruff; also 20 acres of meadow, a part "on Sloping Creek," and another part on "Oyster Creek,"—in all 200 acres. He died July 1, 1724.²

John Winans (Wynes, Waynes, Winons, Winnons, Wynons, Wynens, Wynans, Wynnings) was doubtless of the company that came from the east end of Long Island. It is quite likely that he was of the same family with Barnabas Wines, their names being frequently spelt alike. He was bred a weaver, a handicraft in great request at that early day. He had a house-lot containing 5 acres, 10 by 5 chains, bounded N. by Jacob Melyen, W. by Humphrey Spinage, and S. and E. by highways. He had also 16 acres of upland "on the Neck," between Matthias Hatfield and Samuel Marsh, Sr.; also 120 acres of upland "on Peach Garden Brook," bounded by Robert Morse, Matthias Hatfield, Robert White, and unsurveyed land; also 40 acres of land on "the S. branch of Elizabeth Creek or River," bounded by Humphrey Spinage, Matthias Hatfield, and the plain; also 4 acres of meadow "at Rawack," and 6 acres on Elizabeth Creek,—in all 200 acres. When his next neighbor, Jacob Melyen, had removed to New York, Winans bought, Feb. 8, 1678, his house-lot, house, barn, orchard, etc. He died at the close of 1694. His estate was valued at £271 15s. 8d.³

Barnabas Wines (Wynes, Winds) was from Southold, L. I. He was the son of Goodman Barnabas, who was made, May 6, 1635, a freeman of Watertown, Mass., sold out in 1642, and removed to Southold, where Barnabas, Jr., was made a freeman in 1664. His brother Samuel remained with his father, but he himself joined the Achter Kull band of emigrants and came here in 1665. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded N. by Aaron Thompson, S. by William Cramer, E. by the Mill River, and W. by a highway; also two acres of upland adjoining Aaron Thompson; also four acres of upland "at Luke Watson's point;" also 30 acres of upland "in a Swamp between Richard Beach and William-Cramer;" also 86 acres of upland, bounded by Nicholas Carter, George Pack, Francis Barber, and unsurveyed land; also 12 acres of upland "Joyning to the Calf pasture" and George Ross; also six acres of meadow at Thompson's Creek; also six acres of meadow at the S. side of E. T. Creek, and 12 acres by "the boggish meadow,"—in all 164 acres.¹

Peter Wolverson (Wolferzen, Wolphertsen) Van Couwenhoven was a genuine Hollander from New Amsterdam. He was born at Amersfoort, in Utrecht, Holland, and was a step-son of Wolfert Gerritsen, who emigrated to New Netherland in 1630 as overseer of Kilian Van Rensselaer's colony at Rensselaerwyck, near Fort Orange. Gerritsen in 1633 entered the company's service, and removed to New Amsterdam. Three years afterwards he took up his abode at New Amersfoort, or Flatlands, L. I., of which he was one of the founders. Young Wolferzen, in 1639, or earlier, came to New Amsterdam, where at that time he contracted to build a house for Thomas Hall. The next year, Dec. 2, 1640, he married Hester Symons, a native of Amsterdam, but then of New York. His brother Jacob, also a resident of New Amsterdam, erected in 1645 a brewery in Stone Street. Peter, too, became a brewer and a general trader, first in company with his brother, and then by himself, at the N. W. corner of Whitehall and Pearl Streets. He served one term of two years and four terms of a year each as one of the "Worshipful Schepens" of the city. In March, 1655, he was appointed city surveyor; also, June 30, 1663, a lieutenant of the military company of which Martin Kregier was captain. As such he did good service in the Esopus war, in the latter part of 1663, of which Kregier published a detailed narrative.

After the English conquest, Wolferzen had some difficulty with the Court of Assizes, and concluded to unite with his friends, John Ogden and Capt. Baker, in founding their new colony. In November, 1665, his wife having died, he married Alice Sybrants, of French extraction, with whom he removed at once to his new home. She died the following year, in giving birth to her son Peter, and was buried at New York. Her child was baptized in the Dutch Church, Feb. 27, 1669. In the list of Associates he is called "Peter Couenhoven." Having built a brewery, he obtained from Governor Carteret a license "for the keeping of an Ordinary in Elizabeth Towne, and for the selling and retailing of all sorts of drink and strong Liquors," for one year from Sept. 29, 1666. To meet his expenditures he borrowed, July 12, 1667, of the Governor, "2727 gilders 17 stivers," mortgaging, as he says, "all my Land dwelling hows and out houses, Brewhows, Copper and all other appurtenances thereunto belonging, together With all my goods and cattle moveable and unmoveable that I now have or may hereafter have in Elizabeth Towne." When the Dutch reconquered New York, Wolferzen returned to the city, and Carteret came, by foreclosure, into possession of the property. He is said to have been "well versed in the Indian language."

He was entitled to 480 acres, for which the Governor issued a warrant March 14, 1675, to himself. Of this amount 200 acres were surveyed April 14, 1677, as follows: The house-lot, "formerly belonging to Peter Woolverson," contained eight acres, "being a triangle piece" near John Woodruff's landing by a small creek; also 40 acres of upland on the neck, bounded S. W. "by the highway that goes to the point, and all round by Governor Philip Carteret's land;" also 152 acres of upland "towards the plaine," bounded by Daniel De Hart, Elizabeth Creek, Leonard Headley, and unsurveyed land; also 3 acres of meadow, adjoining the house-lot on Elizabeth Creek; also 6 acres of meadow on "the bay of Kill von Kull," and 15 acres of meadow on Oyster Creek and the great pond,—in all 224 acres.²

Jonas Wood and his wife Elizabeth were neighbors of John Ogden in 1652, at North Sea, or Northampton, in the town of Southampton, L. I. Jonas and Edward Wood were members of the church at Watertown, Mass., in 1635, and with John Strickland and others, were dismissed May 29, 1635, to plant a colony on the Connecticut River, to which they gave the name of "Wethersfield." In 1640, Jonas, Edward, Jeremiah, and Jonas, Jr., removed from Wethersfield, and with others settled Rippowams (Stamford), Conn. Jonas and Edward are thought to have been brothers, and the other two their sons. In the spring of 1644 they joined the colony that crossed over to Long Island and settled Hempstead, Jonas being one of the patentees. Jonas and Jonas, Jr., subsequently settled at Huntington, L. I., and were both living there in 1675. The Jonas, therefore, who accompanied John Ogden to Northampton, and in 1665 to this town, must have been a son of Edward and a cousin of Jonas, Jr., supposing the latter, as is most natural, to have been the son of Jonas, Sr., there being three persons contemporaneous bearing the same name, and thus occasioning confusion in tracing their genealogy. He appears to have been much respected by his townsmen here. He received license July 10, 1679, to keep an ordinary, and was chosen Nov. 3, 1693, and again in 1694, a deputy to represent the town in the Legislature.

He had a house-lot containing six acres, bounded northwest by Richard Mitchell, southwest by William Letts, southeast by the highway, and northeast by Samuel Marsh, Sr. He had also nine acres of upland, bounded by William Oliver, Charles Tucker, Richard Clarke, and George Ross; also 3 acres of upland adjoining Dennis White and the Common; also 150 acres of upland at "Rahawack," adjoining Jeffery Jones and Capt. John Baker; also 50 acres of upland, "a Ridge of Land between two Swamps," adjoining Robert White and the Common; also six acres of meadow on Elizabeth Creek, bounded by William Johnson, William Cramer, and Richard Clark; also 14 acres of meadow adjoining his upland at "Rahawack," and 10 acres of meadow on "Rahawack River,"—in all 228 acres. Several of these parcels he exchanged May 29, 1678, with Simon Rouse. In company with his son Samuel he purchased, June 24, 1686, several parcels of Robert Morse, and sold Aug. 25, 1686, a part of his patent; also June 29, 1687, 100 acres to "Andrise Prise Gaer, of E. T.;" and Oct. 17, 1688, the half of his house-lot to James Emott, Esq., a new-comer in 1683.¹

John Woodruff (Woodrofe) was of the Southampton colony. He was the son of John Woodruff, who was living, 1657, on the E. side of the street, between Thomas Burnett and John Foster. The father died at Southampton in May, 1670. In his will, May 4, 1670, is this bequest: "I give unto my Eldest son John Woodruff of Elizabeth Town one halfe Crowne piece of Money in full of all portions & Patrimony whatsoever, to be expected from mee, or out of any part of my Estate." At the close of will he says, "I by this make my Wife Anne Woodruff and my youngest son John Woodruff joynt Executors of this my Last Will and Testament." Here are two sons of the same father named "John." Were they children of the same mother also? Or was one of them an adopted son? His daughter Elizabeth was married to a son of Ralph Dayton (probably Robert), of East Hampton. His daughter Anne was married to a son of Robert Wooley. The emigrant son brought with him to this town his wife Mary, with "two men and a maid servant." His children were born after his arrival. He was appointed constable of the town Dec. 11, 1674, ensign July 15, 1675, and sheriff of the county Nov. 28, 1684.

His house-lot contained but $1\frac{1}{2}$ acres, bounded W.

by John Ogden, and on the other sides by highways. He had also "a Farme cont^d Two Hundred Ninety two Acres," since known as "Woodruff's Farms," bounded N. and W. by a great swamp, E. by the common meadow, and S. by a small brook and John Parker; also 14 acres on the North Neck; also 5 acres bounded by the common pasture, his own land, a small brook, and Leonard Headley; also 8 acres of upland, bounded by the Governor and Jonathan and Joseph Ogden's house-lots; also 6 acres of upland joining John Parker's house-lot "at the Farmes," bounded by John Parker, the common swamp, John Wilson, and his own land, "through which a way must be Left for John Parker to pass through to his Plantation;" also 30 acres of meadow, joining the great island and his own land; also 4 acres of meadow adjoining the above; and $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres of meadow on Elizabeth Town Creek,—in all 320 acres. Still later he obtained 120 acres more,—an island or hammock in the great meadow, containing 36 acres; also 22 acres by the brook in the swamp; also 30 acres of hassocks adjoining George Morris; also 14 acres of hassocks adjoining John Parker; also 9 acres of meadow on Oyster Creek; also five acres of meadow on the bay, and four acres on Forked Creek.³

Capt. Thomas Young and Christopher Young were from Southold, L. I. They were sons of the Rev. John Youngs, the first pastor of the Southold Church. The father was born in 1602, and Joan, his wife, in 1603. They married early, and had six children in 1637,—John, Thomas, Anne, Rachel, Mary, and Joseph. Christopher was born at a later date. John Young, in 1637, was the minister of "St. Margretts, Suff." in England. They sought, May 11th, "to passe to Salam in New England to inhabit;" but leave was refused. Three years later they succeeded, and with some of their church came to New Haven, whence they crossed to Long Island and founded Southold. John and Thomas were both mariners in command of coasters. Thomas was born, 1627, in England, and married, at Southold, Rebecca, a daughter of Thomas Mapes. In 1654 he removed to Oyster Bay. His wife died, and he married, 1658, Sarah, a daughter of John Frost.

It is quite probable that it was in Capt. Thomas Young's vessel that the first colonists from the towns on the east end of Long Island removed to this place, and in the same way others afterwards came, encouraged by the good reports brought them by Capt. Young of the new home so happily found by their old neighbors.

His name heads the list of those who took the oath of allegiance, February, 1666. On the 12th of the same month he was appointed one of the Governor's Council. Two days afterwards, John Day, cooper, of Elizabeth Town, binds himself as a servant to Capt.

Philip Carteret and Capt. Thomas Young, of Elizabeth Town, for two years in the craft or trade of a cooper, to receive "competent meat Drink and house-room," and "the halfe p^{ts} of What Coopers Work he shall doe and earne." By indenture, March 25, 1672, Sewanam, a Long Island Indian, binds himself to "Thomas Young of Elizabeth Town, mariner," as his servant for four years, "about the House or Family or abroad whether by Land or Water," on condition of being supplied "with sufficient Meat Drink and Clothes Washing and Lodging according to his Rank and Quality," to receive for his services a mare, and "after the first voyage to Europe or Barbados one suit of apparel." It thus appears that Capt. Young was in the European and West India trade, and quite a venturesome navigator for the times.

He had a warrant for 240 acres of land, of which only 112 acres are described: 100 acres at Young's Point, bounded on three sides by Sir George and Philip Carteret, a great pond, and unsurveyed land, and on the other side by meadow, one line running "along the meadow till it comes to a point of land near the Indian wigwam;" also 12 acres of meadow contiguous to the above, the great pond, and the swampy meadows. The locality was chosen, doubtless, because of his seafaring pursuits. It was at the junction of Achter Kull Sound and Newark Bay, a point of land then called "Thomas Young's Point," but in later years "De Hart's Point," about a mile north from the Governor's or "Old Point," where the Carterets had most of the land. A lot of land was laid out for him, in 1676, on the south side of Staten Island, northeast of "Seedar Pointe." His brother Christopher sold, Nov. 20, 1667, all his accommodations at Elizabeth Town, being a first lot-right and a house-lot of four acres, bounded south by George Pack, north by the Common, west "by the highway that goeth to Woodbridge," and east by another highway, to Dennis White for £10. On the 8th of June following White assigned it to Young again, by whom, not long afterwards, it was sold to John Little. Neither of the brothers became permanent residents here. Capt. Thomas returned to Oyster Bay, where he rested from his earthly pilgrimage in 1689. Christopher returned to the island, and settled at Southold, his former home, where he was living in 1675 and 1683.¹

Benjamin Concklin came with his East Hampton neighbors, but for some unexplained cause soon after returned to his former home. Joseph and Joshua Concklin, of the same lineage, came here some forty years later, and founded the Concklin family of this town. They were probably children or grandchildren of the Benjamin here noticed."²

Roderick Powell was a servant, and in the May following, having run away from his master, is described as "a pitiful fellow." A Richard Powell, of another lineage doubtless, was here only a few years later, to whom the Governor sold, January, 1678, his Woodbridge lands, taking Powell's Elizabeth Town house and lands in exchange, and selling the latter soon after to Henry Lyon.³

Jacob Clais, Zachary Graves, Moses Peterson, and Thomas Skillman, who all took the oath, were either transient persons, or were mere laborers, and not freeholders.

Three other names at least are to be added to the list of those who were settlers during the first year,—James Bollen, Robert Sealey, and Philip Carteret.

James Bollen came over, it is thought, with the English fleet in 1664. As he was styled "captain," he may have been in command of one of the vessels. Col. Nicolls appointed him "Commissary of the Ammunition" at New York. He was one of those who were deputed by Nicolls to receive the surrender of the fort at New Amsterdam, Sept. 8, 1664. He remained at New York until August, 1665. In the court records for that year it appears that he frequently served as foreman of the jury, his name being written "Bullaine" and "Balline." When Capt. Carteret, on his first voyage to America, arrived at "Newportes newes, Virginia," he sent his dispatches, June 13, 1665, "to Capt. James Bullaigne in New York," indicating previous acquaintanceship, probably in the island of Jersey, and quite likely a French extraction for Bollen. He attached himself to Governor Carteret on his arrival at New York, and as secretary of the new province accompanied him in August to Elizabeth town. He adhered most rigidly to the Governor through his trouble-some administration, and was rewarded with the entire confidence of his superior. He was appointed justice of the peace, Jan. 20, 1666, and as such officiated in almost every instance in the marriage services of the period. He presided at the town-meeting when the oath of allegiance was administered in February. He kept the records of the proprietary government, and several of the early volumes are the work of his fingers. Becoming exceedingly obnoxious to the town by his readiness to do all the Governor's bidding in opposition to the people, he exchanged properties, Sept. 30, 1673, with John Martin, of Woodbridge, and thenceforward ceased to reside here. His house-lot adjoined Abraham Shotwell's on the east. Martin sold the property, Nov. 6, 1674, to Henry Lyon, who resold it May 1, 1675, "together with the Cow Yard Orchard or Garden," to Carteret for £30. He died intestate in March, 1683, having survived his friend Carteret but a few weeks.⁴

Robert Sealey (Seeley) came over probably with Wintrop. He was at Watertown, Mass., in 1630; was employed as surveyor in 1634; came to Wethersfield, Conn., in 1636; was a lieutenant in the Pequot war of 1637; was one of the first settlers of New Haven in 1639; returned to England about 1646; came back and joined the Delaware Colony that was driven off by the Dutch in 1651; had command of the troops raised by New Haven to resist the Dutch in 1654; was at Saybrook in 1662; was at Huntington, L. I., and in charge of the militia in 1663; and was at New York in 1664. The next year he united with Ogden and others in settling Elizabethtown. His house-lot contained six acres, bounded north by Rev. Jeremiah Peck, west by the Mill Creek, east by the highway, and south by "the Parson's house Lott." John and Nathaniel Seeley, of Fairfield (1657), and Obadiah, of Stamford, Conn., it is thought, were his sons by his first wife. In December, 1666, he married Nancy Walker, at New York. He died intestate in October, 1668, and his widow sold, Nov. 2, 1668, his lands and rights here for £45 to Governor Carteret. The latter resold it Feb. 22, 1669-70, to one of his old Jersey friends, Claude Vallot, "of Champagne, in the kingdom of France," who had come over with the Governor, and having lived here five years as one of Carteret's "menial servants," had 12 days before been naturalized. In the list of Associates "Sealy Champain" is mentioned; it should be "Robert Sealey, transferred to Claude Vallot, of Champagne." Vallot exchanged the property Aug. 8, 1672, with Benjamin Parkhurst, of Woodbridge, and thenceforward made the latter place his home.¹

Capt. Philip Carteret, the Governor, is usually styled "the brother" of Sir George Carteret. Philip, the brother of Sir George, died in 1665. Consequently the Elizabeth Town Philip could not be the proprietor's brother. Nor could he be a brother-in-law. Lady Elizabeth Carteret, the wife of Sir George, had also a brother Philip, but he died in 1662. The mother of Sir George was Elizabeth Dumaesque, and the mother of the Lady Elizabeth was Ann Dowse, but Capt. Philip, the Governor, in his will speaks of his mother as "Rachel." Samuel Maverick, one of the royal commissioners, who knew Governor Carteret intimately, says, June 29, 1669, "As Sir George Carteret writes to his cosen, the present Gouverneur." The confusion may have been owing in part to the fact that each of them was the son of a Helier Carteret. But the father of Sir George was the great-grandson of Edward, and the father of Philip was the great-grandson of Edward's brother Richard, so that Sir George was but the fourth cousin of the Governor.

Philip Carteret was the son of Helier De Carteret, attorney-general of Jersey, and of Rachel —. He was the first born of his mother, his birth having occurred in 1639, the year after her marriage. As such he became seigneur of the manor of La Houque, parish of St. Peter, Jersey. He was the grandson of Peter De Carteret, jurat of the Royal Court of Jersey, whose father, Francis, was the second son of Richard, seigneur of the manor of Vincheles, and brother of Edward, the ancestor of Sir George. Philip was forty years the junior of Sir George, being only in his twenty-sixth year, full of the vigor and elasticity of early manhood, when he embarked to seek his fortune in the New World. His subsequent history is elsewhere in this narrative related at length.

The family and their friends in Jersey were originally French, and the language, manners, and customs of France prevailed on the island. Most of those who came with Carteret in the ship "Philip" were probably from the Carteret estates in Jersey, and of French origin. The family, as has been seen, had been ardently devoted throughout the civil war to the fortunes of the house of Stuart, and were high in the favor of the king and the Duke of York.²

It appears from this review, therefore, that the number of planters found here in February, 1666, or, if not on the ground, yet identified with the settlement, was about seventy. A large proportion, nearly all, had brought their wives with them. Some of them had several children also. A small number were considerably in years. The most of them, however, were young, vigorous, robust men, between the ages of twenty-five and forty,—just the men to lay the foundations of many generations.

CHAPTER V.

INDIAN OCCUPATION.

It would seem from Hudson's journal that the Indians on the east side of the Hudson River held no intercourse with those on the west side, and that the former were a much more fierce and implacable people than the latter. This probably arose from the fact that those east of the Hudson and along its upper banks were allies of the Iroquois, which were then the dominating confederacy of the red republicans of the forest. They had not only carried their conquests along the Hudson to the ocean, but along East River and Long Island Sound to the Connecticut, exacting submission and tribute from all the tribes of this region of country. They had also carried their conquering arms southward along the Susquehanna and the Delaware, reducing to submission the Andastes and the Lenni Lenapè; and even the Anticoeks, or tide-water people, along the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, trembled at their vindictive prowess.

² Collins' Peerage (ed. of 1735), iv. 321-326.

Rev. Mr. Abeel, quoted by Moulton, says that on the point where New York is now built Hudson found a very hostile people. But those living on the western side, from the Kills upward, "came daily on board of the vessel while she lay at anchor in the river, bringing with them to barter furs, the largest and finest oysters, Indian corn, beans, pumpkins, squashes, grapes, and some apples, all of which they exchanged for trifles."

That Hudson and the traders who followed him had gained some knowledge of the strength and resources of the Iroquois country is evident from the fact that they established their first trading-post at Albany instead of Manhattan. They must have also learned that the Iroquois, especially the Mohawks, the eastern branch of the confederacy, held an ascendancy over the lower tribes, and on this account sought first to gain the friendship and trade of the former. No doubt such an alliance with the masters enabled them the better to control the subjects, and prepared the way for their successful erection of a trading-post at Manhattan after they had carried on a successful and uninterrupted commerce at Fort Orange for at least ten years. During this time they had cemented such a friendship with the Mohawks as availed them for assistance in their subsequent struggle with the several tribes inhabiting this region.

The Delawares, or Lenni Lenape—Most writers on Indian antiquities have considered the tribes of the lower Hudson and of East New Jersey as branches of the general Delaware nation or Lenni Lenape, which means original people. Those most intimately connected with this region were the Minisies and Mohicans—the former being the inhabitants of the range of country from the Minisink to Staten Island and from the Hudson to the Raritan Valley. The latter inhabited the east side of the lower Hudson to its mouth. The Dutch called them respectively the Sanhikans and the Manhikans. According to Brodhead,¹ the former were also called Wabingi, or Wappinges, the latter, as Heckewelder claims, being derived from the Delaware word waping, signifying opossum. These were divided into numerous tribes, and these again into clans. In this section of New Jersey they were called Raritans, Hackensacks, Pomptons, and Tappeans. On the island of New York dwelt the fierce Manhattans, whom De Laet calls "a wicked nation," and "enemies of the Dutch." On Long Island, called by the natives Sewan-hacky, the land of shells, were the savage Metonwacks, divided into several tribes. The names of thirteen of these tribes have been preserved, viz., the Canarse and Nyack Indians, settled at the Narrows in Kings County; the Rockaway, Merrikoke, Marsapeagne, and Matinecoe tribes in Queens County; and the Nissauque, Setauket, Corchaug, Secataug, Patchogue, Shinnecoe, and Montauk, in Suffolk County. These Indians sold their lands to the whites in 1702-3, except about five hundred acres, on which lived a remnant of the Montauks as late as 1829. Great efforts were made to civilize them by means of missions and schools, Rev. Azariah Horton being missionary among them in 1741; but all these efforts proved unavailing; they gradually became extinct.²

The Delawares—the Indian people with which this history has principally to deal—occupied a domain extending along the sea-shore from the Chesapeake to the country bordering Long Island Sound. Back from the coast it reached beyond the Susquehanna Valley to the foot of the Alleghany Mountains, and on the north joined the southern frontier of their domineering neighbors, the hated and dreaded Iroquois. This domain, of course, included not only the counties of Bergen and Passaic, but all of the State of New Jersey.

The principal tribes composing the Lenni Lenape or Delaware nation were those of the Unamis or Turtle, the Unalachtgo or Turkey, and the Minsi or Wolf. The latter, which was by far the most powerful and warlike of all these tribes, occupied the most northerly portion of the country of the Lenape and kept guard along the Iroquois border, from whence their domain extended southward to the Musconetcong³ Mountains, about the northern boundary of the present county of Hunterdon. The Unamis and Unalachtgo branches of the Lenape or Delaware nation (comprising the tribes of Assanpink, Matas, Shackamaxons, Chichiquas, Raritans, Nanticokes, Tutelos, and many others) inhabited the country between that of the Minsi and the sea-coast, embracing the present counties of Hunterdon and Somerset, and all that part of the State of New Jersey south of their northern boundaries. The tribes who occupied and roamed over the counties of Bergen and Passaic were those of the Turkey and Wolf branches of the Lenni Lenape nation, but the possessions and boundaries of each cannot be clearly defined.

³ "The Wolf, commonly called the Minsi, which we have corrupted into Mous-sa, had chosen to live back of the other two tribes, and formed a kind of bulwark for their protection, watching the motions of the Menawce and being at hand to afford aid in case of a rupture with them. The Minsi were considered the most warlike and active branch of the Lenape. They extended their settlements from the Minisink, a place named after them, where they had their council-seat and fire, quite up to the Hudson on the east, and to the west and south far beyond the Susquehanna. Their northern boundaries were supposed originally to be the heads of the great rivers Susquehanna and Delaware, and their southern that ridge of hills known in New Jersey by the name of Musconetcong, and in Pennsylvania by those of Lehigh, Con-wago, etc. Within this boundary were their principal settlements; and even as late as the year 1742 they had a town with a peach-orchard on the tract of land where Nazareth, in Pennsylvania, has since been built, another on the Lehigh, and others beyond the Blue Ridge, besides many hamlet settlements here and there scattered."—History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania, by Rev. John Heckewelder.

ple,"—a title which they had adopted under the claim that they were descended from the most ancient of all Indian ancestry. This claim was admitted by the Wyandots, Miamis, and more than twenty other aboriginal nations, who accorded to the Lenapè the title of grandfathers, or a people whose ancestry antedated their own. The Rev. John Heckewelder, in his "History of the Manners and Customs of the Indian Nations," says of the Delaware nation,—

"They will not admit that the whites are superior beings. They say that the hair of their heads, their features, and the various colors of their eyes evince that they are not, like themselves, Lenni Lenapè,—an original people,—a race of men that has existed unchanged from the beginning of time; but that they are a mixed race, and therefore a troublesome one. Wherever they may be, the Great Spirit, knowing the wickedness of their disposition, found it necessary to give them a Great Book, and taught them how to read it that they might know and observe what He wished them to do and what to abstain from. But they—the Indians—have no need of any such book to let them know the will of their Maker: they find it engraved on their own hearts; they have had sufficient discernment given to them to distinguish good from evil, and by following that guide they are sure not to err."

Traditions among the Delaware Tribes.—Concerning the origin of the Lenapè, numerous and essentially differing traditions were current among the various tribes. One of these traditions is mentioned by Loskiel in his "History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the North American Indians," as follows:

"Among the Delawares, those of the Minsi or Wolf tribe say that in the beginning they dwelt to the earth under a lake, and were fortunately extricated from this unpleasant abode by the discovery which one of their men made of a hole, through which he ascended to the surface; on which, as he was walking, he found a deer, which he carried back with him into his subterraneous habitation; that the deer was eaten, and he and his companions found the meat so good that they unanimously determined to leave their dark abode and remove to a place where they could enjoy the light of heaven and have such excellent game in abundance.

"The two other tribes, the Unamis or Tortoise, and the Unalachtgos or Turkey, have much similar notions, but reject the story of the lake, which seems peculiar to the Minsi tribe."

There was another leading tradition current among the nations of the Lenapè, which was to the effect that, ages before, their ancestors had lived in a far-off country to the west, beyond great rivers and mountains, and that, in the belief that there existed, away towards the rising sun, a red man's paradise,—a land of deer and beaver and salmon,—they had left their western home and traveled eastward for many moons, until they stood on the western shore of the Namisi Sipu (Mississippi), and there they met a numerous nation, migrating like themselves. They were a stranger tribe, of whose very existence the Lenapè had been ignorant. They were none other than the Mengwe; and this was the first meeting of those two peoples, who afterwards became rivals and enemies, and continued such for centuries. Both were now travelers and bound on the same errand. But they found a lion in their path, for beyond the great river lay the domain of a nation called Allegewi, who were not only strong in numbers and brave, but more skilled than themselves in the art of war, who had reared great defenses of earth inclosing their villages and strongholds. In the true spirit of military strategy, they permitted a part of the emigrants to cross the river, and then, having divided their antagonists, fell upon them with great fury to annihilate them. But when the Lenapè saw this they at once formed an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Mengwe. The main body crossed the river and attacked the Allegewi with such desperate energy that they defeated and afterwards drove them into the interior, where they fought from stronghold to stronghold, till finally, after a long and bloody war, the Allegewi were not only humiliated, but exterminated, and their country was occupied by the victors. After this both nations ranged eastward, the Mengwe taking the northern and the Lenapè still keeping the more southern route, until, after long journeyings, the former reached the Mohicanittuck (Hudson River) and the latter rested upon the banks of the Lenapè Whittuck,—the beautiful river now known as the Delaware,—and here they found that Indian elysium of which they had dreamed before they left their old homes in the land of the setting sun.

These and other similar Indian traditions may or may not have some degree of foundation in fact. There are to-day many enthusiastic searchers through the realms of aboriginal lore who accept them as authentic, and who believe that the combined Lenapè and Mengwe did destroy a great and comparatively civilized people, and that the unfortunate Allegewi who were thus extinguished were none other than the mysterious Mound-Builders of the Mississippi Valley. This, however, is but one of the many profitless conjectures which have been indulged in with reference to that unknown people, and is in no way pertinent to this history. All Indian tribes were fond of narrating the long journeys and great deeds of their forefathers, and of tracing their ancestry back for centuries, some of them claiming descent from the great Manitou himself. Missionaries and travelers among them who were, or professed to be, familiar with their language and customs have spoken with apparent sincerity of Indian chronology running back to a period before the Christian era, and some of the old enthusiasts claimed that these aborigines were descendants of the lost tribes of Israel.¹ But all the traditions of the Indians were so clouded and involved in improbability and so interwoven with superstition, and the speculations of antiquarian writers have almost uniformly been so baseless and chimerical, that the whole subject of Indian origin may be dismissed as profitless.

Totems, or Tribal Badges of the Indians.—The Indians, from the earliest times, considered themselves in a manner connected with certain animals, as is evident from various customs preserved among them, and from the fact that, both collectively and individually, they assumed the names of such animals. Loskiel says,—

"It might indeed be supposed that those animals' names which they have given to their several tribes were mere badges of distinction, or 'coats-of-arms,' as Pylæus calls them; but if we pay attention to the reasons which they give for those denominations, the idea of a supposed family connection is easily discernible. The Tortoise—or, as they are commonly called, the Turtle—tribe, among the Lenapè, claim a superiority and ascendancy over the others, because their relation, the great Tortoise, a faubed monster, the Atlas of their mythology, bears, according to their traditions, this great island on his back,¹ and also because he is amphibious and can live both on land and in the water, which neither of the heads of the other tribes can do. The merits of the Turkey, which gives its name to the second tribe, are that he is stationary and always remains with or about them. As to the Wolf, after which the third tribe is named, he is a rambler by nature, running from one place to another in quest of his prey; yet they consider him as their benefactor, as it was by his means that the Indians got out of the interior of the earth. It was he, they believe, who by the appointment of the Great Spirit killed the deer which the Monsey found who first discovered the way to the surface of the earth, and which allured them to come out of their damp and dark residence. For that reason the wolf is to be honored and his name to be preserved forever among them.

"These animals' names, it is true, they all use as national badges, in order to distinguish their tribes from each other at home and abroad. In this point of view Mr. Pylæus was right in considering them as 'coats-of-arms.' The Turtle warrior draws, either with a coal or with paint, here and there on the trees along the war-path, the whole animal, carrying a gun with the muzzle projecting forward; and if he leaves a mark at the place where he has made a stroke on his enemy, it will be the picture of a Tortoise. Those of the Turkey tribe paint only one foot of a turkey, and the Wolf tribe sometimes a wolf at large with one foot and leg raised up to serve as a hand, in which the animal also carries a gun with the muzzle forward. They, however, do not generally use the word 'wolf' when speaking of their tribe, but call themselves P'auk-sit, which means round foot, that animal having a round foot, like a dog."

Indian Population in New Jersey.—It does not appear that the Indians inhabiting New Jersey were very numerous. In an old publication entitled "A Description of New Albion," and dated A.D. 1648, it is found stated that the native people in this section were governed by about twenty kings; but the insignificance of the power of those "kings" may be inferred from the accompanying statement that there were "twelve hundred [Indians] under the two Raritan kings on the north side, next to Hudson's River, and those came down to the ocean about Little Egg-bay and Sandy Barnegatte; and about the South Cape two small kings of forty men apiece, and a third reduced to fourteen men, at Roymont." From which it appears evident that the so-called "kings" were no more than ordinary chiefs, and that some of these scarcely had a following. Whitehead, in his "East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments," concludes, from the above-quoted statement, "that there were probably not more than two thousand [Indians] within the province while it was under the domination of the Dutch." And in a publication² bearing date fifty years later (1698) the statement is made that "the Dutch and Swedes inform us that they [the Indians] are greatly decreased in number to what they were when they came first into this country. And the Indians themselves say that two of them die to every one Christian that comes in here."

Conquest of the Lenni Lenapè by the Iroquois.

—Before the European explorers had penetrated to the territories of the Lenapè the power and prowess of the Iroquois had reduced the former nation to the condition of vassals. The attitude of the Iroquois, however, was not wholly that of conquerors over the Delawares, for they mingled, to some extent, the character of protectors with that of masters. It has been said of them that "the humiliation of tributary nations was to them [the Iroquois] tempered with a paternal regard for their interests in all negotiations with the whites, and care was taken that no trespasses should be committed on their rights, and that they should be justly dealt with." This means, simply, that the Mengwe would, so far as lay in their power, see that none others than themselves should be permitted to despoil the Lenapè. They exacted from them an annual tribute, an acknowledgment of their state of vassalage, and on this condition they were permitted to occupy their former hunting-grounds. Bands of the Five Nations, however, were interspersed among the Delawares,³ probably more as a sort of police, and for the purpose of keeping a watchful eye upon them, than for any other purpose.

The Delawares regarded their conquerors with feelings of inextinguishable hatred (though these were held in abeyance by fear), and they also pretended to a feeling of superiority on account of their more ancient lineage and their further removal from original barbarism, which latter claim was perhaps well grounded. On the part of the Iroquois, they maintained a feeling of haughty superiority towards their vassals, whom they spoke of as no longer men and warriors, but as women. There is no recorded instance in which unmeasured insult and stinging contempt were more wantonly and publicly heaped on a cowed and humiliated people than on the occasion of a treaty held in Philadelphia in 1742, when Connossatego, an old Iroquois chief, having been requested by the Governor to attend (really for the purpose of forcing the Delawares to yield up the rich lands of the Minisink), arose in the council, where whites and Delawares and Iroquois were convened, and in the name of all the deputies of his confederacy said to the Governor that the Delawares had been an unruly people and were altogether in the wrong, and that they should be removed from their lands; and then, turning superciliously towards the abashed Delawares, said to them, "You deserve to be taken by the hair of your heads and shaken until you recover your senses and become sober. We have seen a deed, signed by nine of your chiefs over fifty years ago, for this very land. But how came you to take it upon yourselves to sell lands at all? We conquered you; we made women of you! You know you are women and can no more sell lands than women. Nor is it fit that you should have power to sell lands, since you would abuse it. You have had clothes, meat, and drink, by the goods paid you for it, and now you want it again, like children, as you are. What makes you sell lands in the dark? Did you ever tell us you had sold this land? Did we ever receive any part, even to the value of a pipe-shank, from you for it? This is acting in the dark,—very differently from the conduct which our Six Nations observe in the sales of land. But we find you are none of our blood; you act a dishonest part in this as in other matters. Your ears are ever open to slanderous reports about your brethren. For all these reasons we charge you to remove instantly! We do not give you liberty to think about it. You are women! Take the advice of a wise man, and remove instantly! You may return to the other side of the river, where you came from, but we do not know whether, considering how you have demeaned yourselves, you will be permitted to live there, or whether you have not already swallowed that land down your throats, as well as the land on this side. You may go either to Wyoming or Shamokin, and then we shall have you under our eye and can see how you behave. Don't deliberate, but go, and take this belt of wampum." He then forbade them ever again to interfere in any matters between white man and Indian, or ever, under any pretext, to pretend to sell lands; and as they (the Iroquois), he said, had some business of importance to transact with the Englishmen, he commanded them to immediately leave the council, like children and women, as they were.

³ The same policy was pursued by the Five Nations towards the Shawanese, who had been expelled from the far Southwest by stronger tribes, and a portion of whom, traveling eastward as far as the country adjoining the Delawares, had been permitted to erect their lodges there, but were, like the Lenapè, held in a state of subjection by the Iroquois.

Dead, they put into the Ground with them some House Utensils and some Money (as tokens of their Love and Affection), with other Things, expecting they shall have Occasion for them in the other World."

Heckewelder, however, attempts to rescue the good name of the humbled Delawares by giving some of their explanations, intended to show that the epithet "women," as applied to them by the Iroquois, was originally a term of distinction rather than reproach, and "that the making women of the Delawares was not an act of compulsion, but the result of their own free will and consent." He gives the story, as it was narrated by the Delawares, substantially in this way: The Delawares were always too powerful for the Iroquois, so that the latter were at length convinced that if wars between them should continue, their own extirpation would become inevitable. They accordingly sent a message to the Delawares, representing that if continual wars were to be carried on between the nations, this would eventually work the ruin of the whole Indian race: that in order to prevent this it was necessary that one nation should lay down their arms and be called the woman, or mediator, with power to command the peace between the other nations who might be disposed to persist in hostilities against each other, and finally recommending that the part of the women should be assumed by the Delawares, as the most powerful of all the nations.

The Delawares, upon receiving this message, and not perceiving the treacherous intentions of the Iroquois, consented to the proposition. The Iroquois then appointed a council and feast, and invited the Delawares to it, when, in pursuance of the authority given, they made a solemn speech, containing three capital points. The first was that the Delawares be (and they were) declared women, in the following words:

"We dress you in a woman's long habit, reaching down to your feet, and adorn you with ear-rings," meaning that they should no more take up arms. The second point was thus expressed: "We hang a calabash filled with oil and medicine upon your arm. With the oil you shall cleanse the ears of other nations, that they may attend to good and not to bad words; and with the medicine you shall heal those who are walking in foolish ways, that they may return to their senses and incline their hearts to peace." The third point by which the Delawares were exhorted to make agriculture their future employment and means of subsistence, was thus worded: "We deliver into your hands a plant of Indian corn and a hoe." Each of these points was confirmed by delivering a belt of wampum, and these belts were carefully laid away, and their meaning frequently repeated.

"The Iroquois, on the contrary, assert that they conquered the Delawares, and that the latter were forced to adopt the defenseless state and appellation of a woman to avoid total ruin. Whether these different accounts be true or false, certain it is that the Delaware nation has ever since been looked to for the preservation of peace and intrusted with the charge of the great belt of peace and chain of friendship, which they must take care to preserve inviolate. According to the figurative explanation of the Indians, the middle of the chain of friendship is placed upon the shoulder of the Delawares, the rest of the Indian nations holding one end and the Europeans the other."¹

It was not a lack of bravery or military enterprise on the part of the Delawares which caused their overthrow; it was a mightier agent than courage or energy: it was the gunpowder and lead of the Iroquois, which they had procured from the trading Dutch on the Hudson almost immediately after the discovery of that river, which had wrought the downfall of the Lenapè. For them the conflict was a hopeless one, waged against immeasurable odds,—resistance to the irresistible. Under a reversal of conditions the Delawares must have been the victors and the Iroquois the vanquished, and no loss of honor could attach to a defeat under such circumstances. It is a pity that the tribes of the Lenapè should vainly have expended so much labor and ingenuity upon a tale which, for their own sake, had better never have been told, and in which even the sincere indorsement of Heckewelder and other missionaries has wholly failed to produce a general belief.

When the old Iroquois chief Connossatego, at the treaty council in Philadelphia, before referred to, commanded the Delawares instantly to leave the council-house, where their presence would no longer be tolerated, and to prepare to vacate their hunting-grounds on the Delaware and its tributaries, the outraged and insulted red men were completely crest-fallen and crushed, but they had no alternative and must obey. They at once left the presence of the Iroquois, returned to the homes which were now to be their homes no longer, and soon afterwards migrated to the country bordering the Susquehanna, and beyond that river.

The Indians were great sticklers for the common right which they held in the soil. They did not recognize even in their chiefs any right to convey it away without the general consent of the tribes, and often they refused to submit to treaties so made. Usually, treaties were made by their representatives chosen by the popular voice, who met the whites in council and for their respective tribes ratified the deed disposing of lands. In the first conveyances made to the Dutch in East Jersey, conveying the lands where Hoboken and Jersey City are situated, Arameauw, Tekwappo, Sackwomeek, Hikitoauw, and Aiarow represented themselves in the deeds as "inhabitants and joint-owners of the lands" named therein.

CHAPTER VI.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

THE first hostility of the Indians towards the Dutch was directed against their plantations on the Delaware, which they wholly destroyed. De Vries tells us that in the year 1630 thirty-two men were killed. In the year 1640, an expedition was fitted out against the Indians on the Raritan, who had been accused, though wrongfully, of committing theft and other trespasses. Some of the chiefs were so maltreated and abused that retaliatory measures were resorted to against the settlers on Staten Island, who were killed and their plantations broken up.¹

The outbreak of 1643 was induced by various causes. One cause was the exacting of a tribute from the Indians by Kieft, the Director-General, in 1639; another was the killing of a white man by an Indian in 1641, in retaliation for the robbery and murder of one of his tribe many years before. While the fort at New Amsterdam was being built in 1626, a Weckquaesgeek Indian, from the east of the Hudson River, with his nephew, then a young boy, and another Indian relative, came to sell his beaver-skins to the Dutch traders. Before he reached the fort he was met by some of the servants of Minuit, who robbed him of his peltries and murdered him. According to Indian custom, life must be taken for life, and the next of kin must be the avenger. He is the young boy who thus witnessed the wanton murder of his uncle. But he is a boy, and the execution of vengeance must be delayed till he should reach manhood. Years passed, but the outrage done his relative was not forgotten. In 1641 he appeared, now grown to manhood, to execute the behest of the unwritten law of his people, unheeding as to which of the pale-faces should be the victim of the deadly stroke of his tomahawk. It happened to be an inoffensive old man, Claes Cornelis Smits, a "raad maker," living near Canal Street. Pretending to desire to barter some beavers for duffels,² he watched his opportunity, killed Smits, robbed the house, and escaped with his booty.³ Satisfaction and the surrender of the savage were promptly demanded. But, as he had only acted in accordance with the custom of his race, the sachem refused to surrender him. Kieft wished to seize upon this occasion to punish the natives, but he did not dare to act independently of the people, who desired peace. He therefore called them together for consultation. They chose *twelve select men*⁴ to determine everything in connection with the Director and Council. This popular branch of the government stayed for a time the impetuosity of the executive and those immediately under his control, and for a brief period secured peace. But the air was full of rumors of Indian troubles. In 1642, De Vries, who had established a colony at Tappean, in passing through the woods towards Ackensack,⁵ met an Indian who said the whites had "sold to him brandy mixed with water" and had stolen his beaver-skin coat. He said he was going home for his bows and arrows, and would shoot one of the "roguish Swanekins," as the Indians called the Dutch. He was as good as his word, and shot Garret Jansen Van Vorst, who was roofing a house at Achter Kull. The chiefs being alarmed at what was done, offered to pay two hundred fathoms of wampum to Van Vorst's widow, in order to purchase their peace. But Kieft would accept of nothing but the surrender of the murderer. The chiefs would not agree to this; they said that he had gone two days' journey among the Tankiteks,¹ and that he was the son of a chief.

In 1643, Kieft espoused the cause of the Mohawks, who were at war with the Weckquaesgecks, Tankiteks, and Tappeans. In the depth of winter these fierce warriors swept down upon their enemies, killing seventeen and making prisoners of many women and children. "The remainder fled through a deep snow to the Christian houses on and around the Island of Manhattan. They were humanely received, being half dead of cold and hunger, and supported for fourteen days; even some of the Director's corn was sent to them." They did not suspect that the Director was secretly in league with their most dreaded and deadly foes, and that, although the people were friendly and hospitable and treated them with great kindness, the commander of the army of New Netherland was about to let loose upon them his ruthless soldiery to murder and slaughter them indiscriminately. But such was the fact. Being alarmed lest the Mohawks should fall upon them at Manhattan, they fled, most of them, to Pavonia, where the Hackensacks were bivouacked one thousand strong.² Says Mr. Winfield,—

"They came over to this side of the river on the 23d of February, 1643, and encamped on the westerly edge of Jan de Lacher's Hoeck, behind the settlement of Egbert Woutersen and adjoining the bouwerie of Jan Ewer-ten Bout. . . . The light of the 25th of February, 1643, was foggy, and the shadows of the black winter night were drawing over the beautiful bay. Huddled and shivering on the western slope of Jan de Lacher's Hoeck, under the protection of the Dutch, the unsuspecting Indians thought themselves safe from the fierce Mohawks. But while they drew around the camp-fires, or dreamed of their forsaken wigwams, Manhattan was all astir with the movement of troops and citizens. The noble-hearted De Vries stood beside the Director as the soldiers under Sergeant Rodolf passed by the fort on their way to Pavonia. 'Let this work alone,' said he; 'you will go to break the Indians' heads, but it is our nation you are going to murder.' 'The order has gone forth; it shall not be recalled,' was Kieft's dogged reply. The sergeant, with his eighty soldiers armed for slaughter, marched down to the river, and, embarking in boats prepared for the purpose, silently rowed towards the shores of Pavonia. Rounding the southerly point of Paulus Hoeck, under the guidance of Hans Stein, they pulled for the high point at the mouth of Mill Creek. Here they landed. Climbing the bank, they passed close to the house of Egbert Woutersen, and cautiously approached their sleeping victims. Suddenly the sound of musketry and the wild shrieks of the Indians rang out in the midnight. Even at this distance of time, 'the horrors of that night cause the flesh to creep as we ponder over them.' Captain De Vries, who, in contemplating the consequences of the expedition, could not sleep, says, 'I remained that night at the Governor's, and took a seat in the kitchen near the fire, and at midnight I heard loud shrieks. I went out to the parapets of the fort and looked towards Pavonia. I saw nothing but the flash of the guns, and heard nothing more of the yells and clamor of the Indians who were butchered during their sleep.' Neither age nor sex could stay the hands of the unrelenting soldiers. Sucklings were torn from their mothers' breasts, butchered in the presence of their parents, and their mangled limbs thrown into the fire or water. Others, 'while fastened to little boards,'—the rude cradle of the papoose,—were cut through, stabled, and miserably massacred. Some were thrown alive into the river, and when their fathers, obeying the promptings of nature, rushed in to save them, the soldiers prevented their coming to shore, and thus parents and children perished. . . . De Vries says, 'Some came running to us from the country having their hands cut off. Some, who had their legs cut off, were supporting their entrails with their arms, while others were mangled in other horrid ways, in part too shocking to be conceived; and these miserable wretches did not know, as well as some of our people did not know, but they had been attacked by the Mohawks.'"³

Such a warfare could not fail to exasperate the natives; and as soon as they became aware that these massacres were by the whites, they resolved upon a relentless war. To render their retaliation more effective, seven tribes entered into an alliance. They killed all the men they could find, dragged the women and children into captivity, burnt houses, barns, grain, hay-stacks, and laid waste the farms and plantations on every hand. From the Raritan to the Connecticut not a white person was safe from the murderous tomahawk and scalping-knife except those who clustered about Fort Amsterdam. The war continued in all its fury for several months. In March a peace was concluded, which, however, lasted only until October, when, three or four soldiers stationed at Pavonia for the protection of a family having been attacked, war was renewed; and so serious was its character that in March, 1644, the authorities of New Amsterdam proclaimed a solemn fast to placate the anger of Jehovah. Peace was permanently secured the following year.

"This day, being the 30th day of August, 1645, appeared in the Fort Amsterdam, before the Director and Council, in the presence of the whole community, the sachens or chiefs of the savages, as well in their own behalf as being authorized by the neighboring savages, namely: ONATANEY, chief of Aekikees-lackey (Hackensack), SASSERENICK and WILLIAM, chiefs of Tippean and Heekonsouank; PACCHAM and PENNEWINE (who were here yesterday and gave their power of attorney to the former, and also took upon themselves to answer for those of Onaney and the vicinity of Matjanetiminin, of Marchewick, of Nyock, and its neighborhood), and Aejjen, who personally appeared, speaking in behalf of Wippian, Wigneeskecks, Sintruck, and Kichtanous.

"FIRST. They agreed to conclude with us a solid and durable peace, which they promise to keep faithfully, as we also obligate ourselves to do on our part.

"SECOND. If it happen (which God in his mercy avert) that there arise some difficulty between us and them, no warfare shall ensue in consequence, but they shall complain to our Governor, and we shall complain to their sachens.

"If any person shall be killed or murdered, justice shall be directly administered upon the murderer, that we may henceforth live in peace and amity.

"THIRD. They are not to come on Manhattan Island, nor in the neighborhood of Christian dwellings, with their arms; neither will we approach their villages with our guns, except we are conducted thither by a savage to give them warning.

"FOURTH. And whereas there is yet among them an English girl, whom they promised to conduct to the English at Stamford, they still engage, if she is not already conducted there, to bring her there in safety, and we promise in return to pay them the ransom which has been promised by the English.

"All which is promised to be religiously performed throughout the whole of New Netherland.

"Done in Fort Amsterdam, in the open air, by the Director and Council to New Netherland, and the whole community, called together for this purpose, in the presence of the Maquas' ambassadors, who are solicited to assist in this negotiation as arbitrators, and Cornelius Anthonissen, their interpreter, and an arbitrator with them in this solemn affair. Done as above."

No further troubles appear to have occurred with the Indians under the Dutch rule until 1655. The nearest approach to it was in March, 1649, when Simon Walinges was found dead at Paulus Hoeck, having been, as was supposed from the arrows and wounds in his head, killed by the Indians. It was ascertained to have been done either by the Raritans or by some stranger from the south, and the local Indians hastened to renew their covenant of friendship. Governor Stuyvesant presented them with about twenty florins and some tobacco, and a gun to Oratamus. The Indians were delighted, reaffirmed the treaty, and returned to their homes.¹

In 1655, during the absence of Governor Stuyvesant to expel the Swedes from the Delaware, troubles again arose with the Indians which bore disastrously upon the settlements on the west side of the Hudson. Hendrick Van Dyck, having his orchard robbed of some of its tempting fruit by Indians who landed at night in their canoes on Manhattan, attempting to drive off the intruders, accidentally in the darkness shot an Indian girl. News of the outrage spread, and the Indians determined on signal vengeance. Without giving warning of their purpose, on the night of the 15th of September, sixty-four canoes, carrying five hundred armed warriors, landed at New Amsterdam. They searched through the town until they found Van Dyck at the house of a neighbor named Van Diegrist, whom they cut down with a tomahawk, and in the affray wounded Van Dyck in the breast with an arrow. The town and garrison being aroused, the Indians were driven to their canoes, and sought safety by flight to the west side of the river. In retaliation they set the houses on fire, and soon all Pavonia was in ashes. From thence they passed down to Staten Island and laid that waste. In this assault one hundred persons were killed, one hundred and fifty carried into captivity, and over three hundred deprived of their homes. The savages of Hackensack, Tappaen, Ahasimus, and others were present in this fearful devastation, and perpetrated inhuman barbarities, notwithstanding their solemn pledge to adhere to the terms of their treaty. When Governor Stuyvesant sought to bring them to terms, they hesitated and delayed, promised and failed to fulfill their pledges, in hopes to extort from the government a ransom for the prisoners. Finally, the Director wished to know how much they would take for "the prisoners en masse, or for each." "They replied, seventy-eight pounds of powder and forty staves of lead for twenty-eight persons." The ransom was paid, and an additional present made by the Governor. This proved the final settlement with the Indians, so far as the Dutch were concerned. During all these troubles most of the mischievous was done in that part of New Netherland included in the ancient territory of Bergen County.

The Pomptons and Minsies, having sold their lands, removed from New Jersey about 1737.

The Pompton Indians were engaged with the Delaware Minsies in the war of 1755, under Teedyescung. This war was waged on account of the deception practiced upon the Indians in procuring the lands in Northampton and Pike Counties, Pa., and was carried across the Delaware into New Jersey. During the year 1757 and the first part of 1758 the western borders of the province were in much alarm on account of the Indians raiding upon the settlers across the Delaware. From May, 1757, to June, 1758, twenty-seven murders were committed by the Indians in Sussex County.²

Final Disposal of the Delawares.—In June, 1758, Governor Bernard, of New Jersey, consulted with Gen. Forbes and Governor Denny, of Pennsylvania, as to the measures best calculated to put a stop to this unpleasant warfare; and, through Teedyescung, king of the Delawares, he obtained a conference with the Minisink and Pompton Indians, protection being assured them. . . . The conference took place at Burlington, Aug. 7, 1758. . . . The result was that the time was fixed for holding another conference at Easton, at the request of the Indians, that being, as they termed it, the place of the "old council-fire."

At the treaty of 1758 the entire remaining claim of the Delawares to lands in New Jersey was extinguished, except that there was reserved to them the right to fish in all the rivers and bays south of the Raritan, and to hunt on all uninclosed lands. A tract of three thousand acres of land was also purchased at Edge Pillock, in Burlington County, and on this the few remaining Delawares of New Jersey (about sixty in number) were collected and settled. They remained there until the year 1802, when they removed to New Stockbridge, near Oneida Lake, in the State of New York, where they joined their "grandsons," the Stockbridge tribe. Several years afterwards they again removed, and settled on a large tract of land on Fox River, Wis., which tract had been purchased for their use from the Menominee Indians. There, in conjunction with the Stockbridges, they engaged in agricultural pursuits, and formed a settlement which was named Statesburg. There, in the year 1832, there remained about forty of the Delawares, among whom was still kept alive the tradition that they were the owners of fishing and hunting privileges in New Jersey. They resolved to lay their claims before the Legislature of this State and request that a moderate sum (two thousand dollars) might be paid them for its relinquishment. The person selected to act for them in presenting the matter before the Legislature was one of their own nation, whom they called Shawuskukhkung (meaning "wilted grass"), but who was known among the white people as Bartholomew S. Calvin. He was born in 1756, and was educated at Princeton College, at the expense of the Scotch missionary society. At the breaking out of the Revolution he left his studies to join the patriot army under Washington, and he served with credit during the Revolutionary struggle. At the time when his red countrymen placed this business in his hands he was seventy-six years of age, yet he proceeded in the matter with all the energy of youth, and laid before the Legislature a petition in his favor signed by a large number of respectable citizens of New Jersey, together with a memorial, written by his own hand, as follows:

"My BRETHREN: I am old and weak and poor, and therefore a fit representative of my people. You are young and strong and rich, and therefore fit representatives of your people. But let me beg you for a moment to lay aside the recollections of your strength and of our weakness, that your minds may be prepared to examine with candor the subject of our claims.

"Our tradition informs us—and I believe it corresponds with your recollections—that the right of fishing in all the rivers and bays south of the Raritan, and of hunting in all uninclosed lands, was never relinquished, but, on the contrary, was expressly reserved in our last treaty, held at Crosswicks in 1758. Having myself been one of the parties to the sale, —I believe, in 1801,—I know that these rights were not sold or parted with.

"We now offer to sell these privileges to the State of New Jersey. They were once of great value to us, and we apprehend that neither time nor distance nor the non-use of our rights has at all affected them, but that the courts here would consider our claims valid were we to exercise them ourselves or delegate them to others. It is not, however, our wish thus to excite litigation. We consider the State Legislature the proper purchaser, and throw ourselves upon its benevolence and magnanimity, trusting that feelings of justice and liberality will induce you to give us what you deem a compensation. And, as we have ever looked up to the leading characters of the United States (and to the leading characters of this State in particular) as our fathers, protectors, and friends, we now look up to you as such, and humbly beg that you will look upon us with that eye of pity, as we have reason to think our poor untutored forefathers looked upon yours when they first arrived upon our then extensive but uncultivated dominions, and sold them their lands, in many instances for trifles, in comparison, as 'light as air.'

"From your humble petitioner,

"BARTHOLOMEW S. CALVIN,

"In behalf of himself and his red brethren."

In the Legislature the subject was referred to a committee, which, after patient hearing, reported favorably; whereupon the Legislature granted to the Delawares the sum of two thousand dollars—the full amount asked for—in consideration of this relinquishment of their last rights and claims in the State of New Jersey. Upon this result Mr. Calvin addressed to the Legislature a letter of thanks, which was read before the two houses in joint session and was received with repeated rounds of most enthusiastic applause.

PHYSICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE FEATURES.

SOME of the early descriptions of this county, including adjacent territory, are exceedingly quaint and graphic. The following is from a document put forth by the Dutch government in 1661:

"It is under the best clymate in the whole world; seed may bee thrown into the ground, except six weeks, all the yere long; there are five sorts of grapes which are very good and grow heere naturally, with divers other excellent fruits extraordinary good, and the fruits transplanted from Europe far surpasseth any there, as apples, pears, peaches, melons, etc. The land very fertile, producth a great increase of wheat and all other graine whatsoever; heere growth tobacco very good, it naturally abounds, with several sorts of dyes, furs of all sorts may bee had of the natives very reasonable; store of salt-petre; marvelous plenty of all kinds of food, excellent venison, elkes very great and large; all kind of land- and sea-fowle that are naturally in Europe are heere in great plenty; the mountenouse part of the country stored with severall sorts of mineralls; great profit to be derived from traffique with the natives (who are naturally a mild people, and very capable, and by the Grace of God) to be drawne out of their blind ignorance to the saving light of Jesus Christ. Heere may likewise be great profit made by fishing, whereby abundance of people may be employed with great and notable advantages."

This description, though designed to cover the whole territory between the Hudson and Delaware Rivers, was peculiarly applicable to the region bordering on Achter Kull, or Newark Bay, and its southern estuary. Daniel Denton, one of the original Elizabethtown Associates, writing in 1670, thus enthusiastically describes the country:

"I may say, and say truly, that if there be any terrestrial happiness to be had by people of all ranks, especially of an inferior rank, it must certainly be here. Here any one may furnish himself with Land and live rent free, yea, with such a quantity of Land that he may weary himself with walking over his fields of corn and all sorts of grain, and let his stock of Cattle amount to some hundreds he need not fear their want of Pasture in the Summer or Fodder in the Winter, the Woods affording a sufficient supply. For the Summer season, when you have grass as high as a man's knees, nay, as high as his waist, interlaced with Pea-vines and other weeds that cattle much delight in, as much as a man can pass through, and these Woods also, every mile or half mile, are furnished with fresh ponds, brooks, or rivers, where all sorts of Cattle, during the heat of the day, do quench their thirst and cool themselves. These brooks and rivers being environed on each side with several sorts of trees and Grapevines, the vines, Arbor-hill, interchanging places and crossing these rivers, does shade and shelter them from the scorching beams of Sol's fiery influence. And how prodigal, if I may so say, hath Nature been to furnish the Country with all sorts of wilde Beasts and Fowle, which every one hath an interest in, and may hunt at his pleasure; when besides the pleasure in hunting he may furnish his house with excellent fat Venison, Turkeys, Geese, Heath Hens, Cranes, Swans, Ducks, Pidgeons, and the like, and wearied with that he may go a fishing, where the rivers are so furnished that he may supply himself with Fish before he can leave off the Recreation; where besides the sweetness of the Air the Country itself sends forth such a fragrant smell that it may be perceived at sea before they can make the land; where no evil fog or vapour doth no sooner appear but a Northwest or Westerly wind doth immediately dissolve it and drive it away. I must needs say that if there be any terrestrial Canaan 'tis surely here, where the Land floweth with milk and honey."

Van Tienhoven, secretary of New Netherland, writing in 1650, says,—

"The district inhabited by a nation called Baritangs is situate on a fresh-water river that flows through the centre of the low land which the Indians Cultivate. This vacant territory lies between two high mountains, far distant the one from the other. This is the handsomest and pleasantest country that man can behold. It furnished the Indians with abundance of maize, beans, pumpkins, and other fruits."²

The land covered by this county, with a considerable extent beyond it, was granted by Governor Nicolls, in 1664, to the Elizabethtown Associates. The territory included in the patent extended from the mouth of the Raritan on the south to the mouth of the Passaic on the north, a distance in a straight line of not less than seventeen miles, and running back into the country twice this distance, or thirty-four miles. It embraced the towns of Woodbridge and Piscataway, the whole of the present Union County, part of the towns of Newark and Clinton, a small part of Morris County, and a considerable portion of Somerset, comprising about five hundred thousand acres, upland and meadow, in fair proportions, well watered by the Raritan, the Passaic, the Rahway, and Elizabeth Rivers, Thompson's, or Morse's Creek, and Bound Brook, diversified with level plains and ranges of hills of considerable elevation, ordinarily classified as mountains; the soil of the upland mostly red shale and clay loam, and a large part of it susceptible of a high state of cultivation.

The Elizabethtown purchase, at the time of its early settlement, was proverbial for the fine and stately oak-trees which covered much of its upland. The following, which may be regarded as a sort of local ordinance for the protection of this timber, passed by several of the proprietors, among whom was Governor Philip Carteret, in June, 1666, is among the rare documents which have been preserved. It reads as follows:

"Whereas I am informed by way of complaint from divers of the inhabitants of this Town that there are several persons that do presume to fell and cut down the best of timber-trees in and about this Town, without any license or leave from those that are or may come to be the owners thereof, converting them to their own private advantage and profit, to the great destruction of timber for building, and the Lords Proprietors Woods, and to the great discouragement of those that are already and that are to come to inhabit this Town: For the preventing thereof, and to avoid so great an inconvenience and destruction of this plantation as may come from permitting such disorderly proceedings, I have thought fit, and do by these presents, together with the advice of my Council, will and command that no person or persons whatsoever shall presume to cut down or fell any timber-trees that are useful either for building, fencing, or making of pipe-staves in any house-lots not properly belonging to themselves, nor within the compass of three miles of any home-lot belonging to this Town, without license first obtained from the Governor, or leave from the owners of the land, upon the penalty of forfeiting the sum of Five Pounds sterling for every such tree so fallen or cut down; Provided, that it may and shall be lawful for any of the inhabitants of this town to clear their own lot and other lands to plant upon, according to the act made the 20th day of April last past, and in so doing it shall and may be lawful for any of them to convert the wood and timber growing upon the same to their best use and advantage, and not otherwise.

Daniel Denton, of whom a brief account has already been given among the original purchasers of the Elizabethtown grant, wrote a book, which was published in London, England, in 1670. It is entitled "A Brief Description of New York, formerly called New Netherlands, with the Places thereunto Adjoining: Likewise a Brief Relation of the Customs of the Indians there, by Daniel Denton." This work has been called by the late Gabriel Furman,

Esq., one of the members of the New York Historical Society, and himself an accomplished historian, one of the gems of American history. It is the first printed description in the English language of the country now forming the States of New York and New Jersey. A new edition of it was published in London in 1701, and in 1845 a reprint was issued in New York by William Gowans, as the first of a series of American historical, biographical, and literary works, entitled, "Gowan's Bibliotheca Americana," with "An Introduction and Copious Historical Notes, by Gabriel Furman, member of the New York Historical Society."

Denton, soon after the purchase of the Elizabethtown grant, sold his share in the patent to Capt. John Baker, of New York, and John Ogden, of Northampton, and, it is believed, went to England some three or four years after. In March, 1665, he, together with Thomas Benedict, represented Jamaica in the General Assembly of deputies held at Hempstead, in pursuance of the requisition of Governor Nicolls, and by which Assembly was formed the first code of laws for the English colony of New York, known as the "Duke's Laws." At the same Assembly the deputies adopted an address to His Royal Highness James, Duke of York, in which, among other things, it is stated, "We do publicly and unanimously declare our cheerful submission to all such laws, statutes, and ordinances which are or shall be made by virtue of authority from your royal highness, your heirs and successors forever." The people of Long Island were displeased with this address, regarding it as too servile for freemen, and were exasperated to such a degree against the authors of it that the Court of Assizes, in order to save the deputies from abuse, if not from personal violence, thought it expedient, at their session in October, 1666, to declare that "whosoever shall hereafter in any way detract or speak against any of the deputies signing the Address to his Royal Highness at the general meeting at Hempstead, they shall be presented to the next Court of Sessions, and if the justices shall see cause, they shall from thence be bound over to the Assizes, there to answer for the slander upon plaint or information."

Denton's preface to his book is as follows, and shows a quaint and subtle humor in his style, of which we get frequent glimpses also in the body of the work:

"READER,—I Have here through the Instigation of divers Persons in England, and elsewhere, presented you with a Brief but true Relation of a known and unknown part of America. The known part which is either inhabited or lieth near the sea I have described to you, and I have writ nothing but what I have been an eye witness to all or the greater part of it. Neither can I safely say was I willing to exceed, but was rather willing the place itself should exceed my Commendation, which I question not will be owned by those that shall travel thither. For the unknown part, which is either some places lying to the Northward yet undiscovered by any English, or the Bowels of the earth not yet opened, though the natives tell us of Glittering Stones, Diamonds, or Pearl in the one, and the Dutch hath boasted of Gold and Silver in the other; yet I shall not feel your expectation with any thing of that nature; but leave it till a better discovery shall make way for such a Relation. In the mean time accept of this from him who desireth to deal impartially with every one."

The following are some of the descriptions given in his book:¹

"That Tract of Land, formerly called The New Netherlands, doth Contain all the Land which lieth in the North parts of America, betwixt New England and Maryland in Virginia, the length of which Northward into the country, as it hath not been fully discovered, so it is not certainly known. The breadth of it is about two hundred miles. The principal Rivers within this Tract are Hudson's River, Raritan River, and Delaware River. The chief Islands are the Manahatens Island, Long Island, and Staten Island."

"Within two leagues of New York lieth Staten Island, it bears from New York west something southerly. It is about twenty miles long, and four or five broad. It is, most of it, good land, full of timber, and produceth all such commodities as Long Island doth, besides tin and stone of iron-ore, and the Calumine stone is said likewise to be found there. There is but one town upon it consisting of English and French, but is capable of entertaining more inhabitants; betwixt this and Long Island is a large bay, and is the coming in for all ships and vessels out of the sea. On the north side of this Island After-skull River puts into the main land on the west side, whereof is two or three towns, but on the east side but one.² There is very great marshes or meadows on both sides of it, excellent good land, and good convenience for the settling of several towns; there grow black walnut and beech, as there doth in Virginia, with mighty tall, straight timber, as good as any in the north of America. It produceth any commodity Long Island doth."

"Westward of After-Skull River before mentioned, about eighteen or twenty miles, runs in Raritan River northward into the country some score of miles, both sides of which river is adorned with spacious meadows, enough to maintain thousands of cattle, the woodland is likewise very good for corn, stored with wild beets, as deer, and elk, and an innumerable multitude of fowl, as in other parts of the country. This river is thought very capable for the erecting of several towns and villages on each side of it, no place in the north of America having better convenience for the maintaining of all sorts of cattle for winter and summer food. Upon this river is a town called, but one at the mouth of it.³ Next this river westward is a place called Newasong, where is two or three towns and villages settled upon the seaside,⁴ but none betwixt that and the Delaware Bay, which is about sixty miles, all of which is rich champaign country, free from stones and indifferent level; store of excellent good timber and very well watered, having brooks or rivers ordinarily, one or more in every mile's travel."⁵

Denton's instructions to immigrants are well worth copying for the light they throw on the earliest method of obtaining lands and effecting settlements. He says,—

"To give some satisfaction to people that shall be desirous to transport themselves thither (the country being capable of entertaining many thousands), how and after what manner people live, and how land may be procured, etc., I shall answer that the usual way is for a company of people to join together, either enough to make a town, or a lesser number; these go with the consent of the Governor and view a tract of land, there being choice enough, and finding a place convenient for a town, they return to the Governor, who upon their desire admits them into a colony, and gives them a grant or patent for the said land, for themselves and associates. These persons being thus qualified, settle the place, and take in what inhabitants to themselves they shall see cause to admit of, till their town be full; these associates thus taken in have equal privileges with themselves, and they make a division of the land suitable to every man's occasions, no man being delarred of such quantities as he hath occasion for, the rest they let lie in common to the whole town."

¹ Denton's work was originally published in 1670; a new edition was issued in London in 1701.

² The last mentioned was Bergen, on the Neck, and the others Newark, Elizabethtown, and Woodbridge, these towns having all been founded previous to 1670.

³ What town was it?

⁴ What towns and villages?

⁵ Denton, pp. 14, 15.

All the earliest towns in Essex, Union, and Middlesex Counties—Newark, Elizabethtown, Woodbridge, and Piscataway—were patented and settled in the manner described, the Associates having two principal objects in view,—first neighborhood, and second protection from hostile Indians. By inducing their neighbors and acquaintances to join them in settling the new colony they could have congenial associates, and by their numbers and combined strength could better protect themselves against attacks from the savages, and overcome many of the obstacles of wilderness life which could hardly be successfully encountered by single individuals. During the earliest period most of the towns and settlements were built compactly together and fortified as a defense against the Indians, and it was made a condition that the settlers should provide themselves with arms and ammunition. This was properly the New England method of settlement, adopted first by the prudent and sagacious people of those colonies, and carried with them wherever they planted new settlements further westward. Wherever this mode was adopted in New Jersey, it was either wholly among New England people or by those who borrowed the idea from them. It will give some conception of the penetrating power of the now all but universal Yankee idea to say that this method of building towns in a solid, compact form to defend themselves against the Indians preceded their advent into New Jersey, and that the astute Dutch Governor Stuyvesant, in issuing proclamation for the erection of the compact and fortified town of Bergen in 1658, enforces his recommendation by quoting the example of the people of New England. Bergen was the first town of this sort erected in East Jersey, but the idea was a "Yankee notion" which had found its way among the Dutch.

The settlements we are to treat of in Union and Middlesex Counties were originally, to a very large extent, made by New England people. Such were the earliest settlers throughout all of Union County, who first planting themselves where the city of Elizabethtown now stands, spread northward and westward to and beyond the present county limits, and such were the earliest settlers of Woodbridge and Piscataway, which formed originally most of the county of Middlesex. The early settlers of Amboy were mostly Scotch and English, and the other towns were settled by a more composite class of inhabitants. Among the New England and English emigrants were many Friends or Quakers, who came at an early time, and whose excellent qualities of character and contributions to the general weal will not be overlooked in making up the award of history.

CHAPTER VIII.

GOVERNMENT OF PHILIP CARTERET.

ELIZABETH TOWN was the seat of the first English government in New Jersey. It must be borne in mind that the Duke of York in 1664 sold that portion of his possessions in America lying west of the Hudson River, to which the name of Nova Casarea, or New Jersey, was given, to John Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, two of the lords of the Privy Council of King Charles, and that upon the charter or constitution known as the "Concessions and Agreement" the Lords Proprietors established a government for the province, appointing Philip Carteret Governor, and sending him over with plenary authority to administer the civil affairs of the colony. It so happened that at the time of Carteret's arrival the enterprising Elizabethtown Associates had unwittingly prepared a capital for him in the wilderness by locating their town and making a promising beginning in the way of improvements. We quote the following from Mr. Hatfield's History:

"Scarcely has the new settlement got fairly under way, the ground about the creek been cleared, and the soil made ready for the sowing of the winter grain, when tidings reach them from New York of a serious change in their prospects. Word is brought that the Duke of York has sold the territory west of Hudson's River to two of the Lords of the Council, who have sent over a deputy to arrange the matter with Governor Nicolls, and take possession, in their name, of the newly-created province. As a matter of course the coming of the new Governor is awaited with no little anxiety.

"Early in the month of August, 1665, the town is stirred by the first exciting event in its history. The ship 'Philip,' having arrived at New York July 29th, now makes her appearance at the Point, or entrance of the creek on which the town is laid out. She brings Capt. Philip Carteret, a sprightly youth of six and twenty, with a company of emigrants from the Old World. Among them is a French gentleman, Robert Vauquelin, a surveyor by profession, with his wife. Capt. James Bollen, of New York, also is of the number. With these come also eighteen men of menial character, of the laboring class, possibly a few others, females probably, of whom no special mention is made, some thirty in all."

"The settlers gather about the landing to receive the new-comers, to learn who they are, and why their steps are directed hither. Capt. Carteret presently submits his credentials to Ogden and his townsmen. He comes accredited with papers from Governor Nicolls, and a Governor's commission from Lord John Berkeley, Baron of Stratton, Somerset County, England, and Sir George Carteret, Knight and Baronet, of Saltrun, in Devon (both of the Privy Council), to whom the Duke of York had granted the territory lying to the west of Hudson's River and east of the Delaware, to be known henceforward as Nova Casarea, or New Jersey. Mutual explanations follow. The Indian deed is produced and well considered. Governor Nicoll's grant is brought forward and explained.

"The settlers appear to have had a fair understanding with Carteret and his company, and to have procured a concession of their rights and titles as proprietors of the territory described in their deed. Tradition tells us—not a very reliable authority when not supported by collateral evidence, as it is in the present case—that Carteret, being informed of their right to the lands, 'approved of the same,' and readily and willingly consented to become an associate with them, and went up from the place of his landing with them, carrying a hoe on his shoulder, thereby intimating his intention of becoming a planter with them, glad, no doubt, to find so promising a beginning in the settlement of the unoccupied and unexplored territory over which he was to exercise authority."

"Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret were of the court of Charles II., a monarch of whom Bancroft truly says that his reign 'was not less remarkable for the rapacity of the courtiers than for the delinquency of the monarch.'³ In the conflict with the Parliamentarians they had both, being then in the full vigor of their faculties, adhered to the fortunes of their king, Charles I., and laid their royal master and his profligate sons, Charles and James, under no small obligations to them.

"Berkeley was the youngest son of Sir Maurice Berkeley. He was born in 1607, joined the army in the operations against the Scots in 1638, and was knighted (June 27th) the same year. In the Parliamentary war he served as commissary-general for the king, as Governor of Exeter, and general of the royal forces in Devon. After the king's death he went abroad with the royal family, and in 1652 was made Governor of the Duke of York's household. May 19, 1658, he was created by royal favor Baron Berkeley, of Stratton, and at the Restoration in 1660 he was sworn of the Privy Council.⁴

"Carteret was the eldest son of Helier Carteret, Deputy Governor of the Isle of Jersey, a descendant of the Lords of Carteret in the Duchy of Normandy, a family of great respectability, dating back to the time of William the Conqueror. Philip, eldest son of Helier Carteret, married Rachel Paulet and had six children,—Philip, Helier, Anne, Gideon, Rachel, and Judith. He was knighted by Queen Elizabeth, and lived to a great age. Sir Philip, the eldest son of Sir Philip, married Anne Dowse and had eleven children,—Philip, Peyton, Zouch, Gideon, Francis, Thomas, Edward, Margaret, Anne, Elizabeth, Dowse. Philip, the first born, died in 1662. Elizabeth (for whom this town was named) married her cousin, George Carteret. Her father, Philip, had (as above) three brothers. Helier, the second son of the first Sir Philip, married Elizabeth Dumaresque, and had two children, George and Philip. The latter was born in 1610, and died in 1665.

"George Carteret was born in 1599, married (as above) his cousin Elizabeth, and had three sons and five daughters. His sons were Philip, James, and George. The latter died unmarried in 1656. Philip, his eldest son, was knighted June 4, 1670, and killed in a naval battle May 28, 1672. George, the father, entered the navy at an early age. In 1626 he was appointed joint Governor of Jersey, and in 1640 commander of the royal navy. In 1642 the post of vice-admiral was offered him by Parliament, but declined in obedience to his royal master. He was knighted May 9, 1646, having rendered the king great service in the supply of ammunition. Withdrawing to his home in Jersey, his house, which he bravely defended as the last stronghold of the monarchy, became an asylum to the Prince of Wales and others of the party. He followed his sovereign to France in 1652, was imprisoned in the Bastille at the instance of Cromwell in 1657, and subsequently banished the kingdom. He repaired to Charles at Brussels in 1659, and was one of his escort when received by the city of London in 1660. He was appointed vice-chamberlain and treasurer of the navy, was sworn of the Privy Council, and in 1661 elected to Parliament for Portsmouth. As early as 1650, when the royal cause appeared quite hopeless, he is said to have obtained the grant of an island in Virginia, and to have fitted out a ship with all sorts of goods and tools, with many passengers, for the settlement of a plantation in the New World. It is thought that the project was abandoned on account of the vigilance of the Cromwellian party.⁵

"The trials through which the two lords had passed during the civil wars, in which circumstances had brought them into great familiarity with the royal leaders, Charles and James, gave them great influence at court after the Restoration. Lucrative offices were awarded them and about the royal household, and frequent opportunities given of promoting their purposes of wealth and aggrandizement. The New World beyond the flood was attracting numerous adventurers, and offering large inducements to colonists. The gifted Winthrop, on the occasion of his visit to England in 1661-62, to procure a new charter for Connecticut, had been received with great consideration at court, and by his representations of what had already been accomplished in New England had unwittingly excited the greed of many of the corrupt and wild parasites of the crown. Clarendon, Albemarle, Ashley, Colleton, Carteret, Craven, and the two Berkeleys, Lord John and Sir William, banded together and readily obtained in 1663 from the pleasure-loving monarch a grant of the vast territory in America, extending from the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude to the river Saint Mattheo, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as proprietors and lords, with almost absolute authority and the right of assignment or sale,—a most extraordinary grant of power; and all this on the plea of 'being excited with a laudable and pious zeal for the propagation of the gospel' among a 'barbarous people, who have no knowledge of God; hypocrites that they were!' 'Avarice,' says Bancroft, 'is the vice of declining years; most of the proprietaries were past middle life. They heged the country under pretence of a "pious zeal for the propagation of the gospel," and their sole object was the increase of their own wealth and dignity.'¹

'Not satisfied with their share in the lordship of such a vast domain, Berkeley and Carteret were eager to secure for themselves an investment in western lands still more promising if possible. The notorious Capt. Scott, who had created so much disturbance on Long Island and the Main, and of whom Governor Nicolls wrote that he "was borne to work mischief as far as hee is credited or his parts serve him," had sought of the crown a patent for Long Island; but not succeeding in his design, and conceiving that he had been wronged by the Duke of York, is reported to have induced Berkeley and Carteret to secure New Jersey for themselves, knowing, as Nicolls also declared, that it was the most valuable portion of the Duke's territory.'²

'The two lords readily caught the bait, and the duke, "for a competent sum of money," having by his patent from the king the right of sale as possession and rule, conveyed, June 24, 1664, the territory now known as New Jersey to Berkeley and Carteret "in as full and ample manner" as it had been conveyed to himself, transferring to these court favorites all his rights, titles, and authority to and over the land in question.

"In the course of the summer, as has been seen, the Dutch were dispossessed, and the country brought under the sway of the English crown. As soon as tidings came, in the latter part of October, that the conquest was complete, the two lords began their preparations for colonizing their new acquisitions. Guided, probably, by the terms of Winthrop's charter, and the concessions subsequently drawn up for the Carolinas, they prepared a plan for the government of the territory (that Carteret had honored with the name of his island home), which was completed and signed Feb. 10, 1665, and which they denominated, "The Concessions and Agreement of the Lords Proprietors of New-Caesars, or New-Jersey, to and with all and every of the adventurers, and all such as shall settle or plant there;" a document of which it must be admitted that while much may be said against it and properly, it nevertheless contained principles and conveyed privileges far in advance of the age, and much more accordant with democracy than with the imperialism of the Stuarts.³

"Capt. Philip Carteret, a distant relative of Sir George, was more than content to emigrate to the New World and become the Governor of the new territory for the proprietors. His commission and letters of instruction bear the same date as the concessions. Mr. Robert Vanquellin (Sieur des Prairie), of the city of Caen, in France, receives the same day an appointment as surveyor-general of the province."

On the 8th of September, 1665, Governor Carteret became a landed proprietor, in common with the Associates, by the purchase of the third-lot right of John Bailly, the deed being as follows:

"Indenture between John Bayles of Jamaica in Yorckshire upon Long Island of the one part and Philip Carteret, Esq^r, Governor of the Province of New Jersey upon the main land of America of the other part. For and in consideration of a valuable sum to him in hand paid by the said Philip Carteret, the said Bayles hath sold to Philip Carteret all and every any Lott or Lotts part or parts of a certaine piece of land situate lying and being on the Maies Continent of America commonly called or known by the Name of Arthur Cull or Emboyle, or what other Name or Names soever it hath been or now is Called by which said Parcell of Land hee the said John Bayles with severall others did Lawfully purchase from the Natives or Indians as by his said Bill of Sayle from the Indians bearing date the 28th day of October 1664 will more at large appear which was cofirmed by The Right Hon. Col. Richard Nicholl Governor of his Royall Highness Territories in America his Grant bearing date the first day of December, 1664. To have and to hold, &c."⁴

This interest of Carteret in the plantation was sold by him Feb. 10, 1668, to a new-comer by the name of William Pyles, from Piscataway, N. H. The lots lay on the south side of the creek. Again, in November, 1668, Carteret purchased the third-lot right of Capt. Robert Sealey, deceased, for £45.

The "Concessions and Agreement" proved, upon examination, very acceptable to the people. It was an instrument guaranteeing the utmost liberty of conscience consistent with the preservation of public peace and order in all things pertaining to civil and religious matters, and offering liberal terms to immigrants who would come and settle in the country. As to government, it committed the work of legislation and taxation to a Legislature, of which the popular branch should be chosen directly by the people. Thus it early established in this favored colony the doctrine for which, a century later, the colonies so strenuously and successfully contended, that representation should always accompany all demands of taxation on the part of a government, or the government should be thrown off as a tyranny and a usurpation to which no free people are bound to submit.

No general government or Legislature for the province of New Jersey was established under this instrument until nearly three years after the arrival of the Governor. His Excellency busied himself chiefly in setting in order the local affairs of the town which he had chosen as the seat of his government, and in attending to such minor executive duties as seemed to be most urgently demanded. John Ogden was commissioned Oct. 26, 1665, as justice of the peace, and on the 1st of November was appointed one of the Governor's Council. Capt. Thomas Young was also appointed a member of the Council Feb. 12, 1666. A military company was organized somewhat later for the defense of the town against the Indians. Of this company Luke Watson was made lieutenant and John Woodruff ensign. Watson was also appointed constable of the town.⁵

Among the many marriage licenses issued by the first Governor of New Jersey the following has been preserved among the East Jersey records. The parties were servants who had come over with the Governor, and afterwards settled on Staten Island. This marriage is thought to have been the first that ever occurred in the Elizabeth Town plantation:

An indenture is on record of the 7th of April, 1666, wherein Robert Gray binds himself as a servant for three years to Luke Watson, the latter to give him, at the end of the term, "a good cove." This is followed, on the 7th of the next month (May), with "a Hue and Cry" for a servant belonging to Mr. Luke Watson, who has "lately absented himselfe and runn away from his Master's service." A description of the fugitive is given in these words:

"His name, Robert graij, an Englishman bornd, about 20 yeares of age, a lusty bodied, portely fellow, light brownish haire, very little hairs on his face, a little demij Castor, a gray broad cloth suite the breeches tyed att the knees, and a red coate, besides a light gray graij colored Serge breeches, and a Snap hansumskell that he hath stolen awajie wth many other things. It is Supposed that hee is in Company wth one Ruderic Powell, a pitifull fellow, who hath also absented himselfe and runn awajie."

First Legislature of New Jersey.—In accordance with the provisions of the "Concessions and Agreement," Governor Carteret, premising that "by the infinite goodness, providence, and blessing of Almighty God the province of New Jersey is in a probable way of being populated," issued a proclamation April 7, 1668, requiring the freeholders in each of the several towns of the province to make choice of two of their number to meet in a General Assembly at Elizabeth Town, May 25, 1668,—

"For the making and constituting such wholesome laws as shall be most needful and necessary for the good government of the said province, and the maintaining of a religious communion and civil society, one with the other, as becometh Christians, without which it is impossible for any Body Politic to prosper or subsist."²

It is almost certain that up to this time the people of New Jersey, with the exception, perhaps, of the Dutch at Bergen, who had a court and a regular administration of justice, according to the laws of Holland, established among them as early as 1661, had lived under "the Duke's Laws," so called, which His Royal Highness had caused to be enacted by an Assembly convened at Hempstead, Long Island, under a warrant from Governor Nicolls, on the 28th of February, 1665. This code, according to instructions, was "collected out of the several laws then in force in his Majesties American Colonies and Plantations," but were chiefly such as were in authority in Connecticut, and some of them in the very words of the Connecticut code of 1650.³

The first General Assembly of New Jersey convened in accordance with the Governor's warrant at Elizabeth Town, and was constituted May 26, 1668. Three of the six members of the Council were residents of the town,—Robert Bond, Robert Vauquellin, and William Pardon; Bond and Pardon having been appointed, Jan. 2, 1668, and James Bollen, also of the town, being the secretary. The town had chosen John Ogden, Sr., and John Brackett to represent them in the House of Burgesses. The Legislature remained in session five days, and passed several acts or laws, by some denominated "the Elizabeth Town Code of Laws," of which it has been said that "Puritan austerity was so tempered by Dutch indifference that mercy itself could not have dictated a milder system." The laws were few and simple, scarcely worthy the name of a "Code," and were taken in almost every instance and nearly verbatim from the Hempstead Code, or the Connecticut Code of 1650. The Puritan laws, as well as the Puritan manners and customs, prevailed in the new settlement. Every possible precaution was taken to preserve the rights of property, to secure the orderly administration of justice, to regulate the intercourse of the sexes, to restrain the vicious within proper bounds, to make human life as sacred as possible, to prevent disrespect to parents, drunkenness, and profanity, and to enforce obedience to the constituted authorities.⁴

As an illustration of the strictness with which, at that early day, they watched over the morals of the rising generation, the following enactment is cited at length:

"For the better preventing disorders and misdemeanors in young persons and others, Be it also enacted by this present General Assembly, that if any person or persons shall be abroad from the usual place of their abode, and found in night-walking, Drinking in any tap-house, or any other house or place at unreasonable times, after nine of the clock at night, and not about their lawful occasions, or cannot give a good account of their being absent from their own place of abode at that time of the night, if required of them, shall be secured by the Constable or some other officer till the morning, to be brought before a Justice of the Peace or Magistrate, to be examined, and if they cannot give them a satisfactory account of their being out at such unreasonable times, he or they shall be bound over to the next Court, and receive such punishment as the Justice upon the Bench shall see cause to inflict upon them."⁵

Provision was made for an annual meeting of the General Assembly on the first Tuesday in November, and for the election of deputies on the 1st of January. The rates for the support of government were to be five pounds for each of the towns, to be paid into the hands of Jacob Mollins (Melyen), of Elizabeth Town, in country produce at the following prices:

"Winter wheat at five shillings a bushell; summer wheat at four shillings and sixpence; pease at three shillings and sixpence; Indian corn at three shillings; rye at four shillings; barley at four shillings; beef at two pence half-penny; pork at three pence half-penny a pound."

Capt. Bollen was to receive twenty pounds for his services as secretary. Little time, however, could be given, especially in the planting season, to matters of legislation. The full consideration of these enactments was referred by the Governor to the November session, "by reason of the week so near spent, and the resolution of some of the company to depart." The Assembly met here again by adjournment on Tuesday, Nov. 3, 1668. Jacob Mollins (Melyen) appeared among the burgesses in place of John Brackett, who had probably returned to New Haven. Mr. Ogden was appointed "to take cognizance of the country's charge and rates;" and Mr. Watson, of the town, was appointed, with Mr. Samuel Moore, of Woodbridge, to go to Middletown and Shrewsbury to collect their proportion of the rates levied on the towns. Mr. Melyen was to be one of the committee to treat with the Indians "for the preventing of future damages and wrongs that otherwise may accrue to the towns or inhabitants in reference to horses or cattle that may range up into the country, to the indangering the peace in respect to the Indians." Two men also were appointed "and sent to the Sachem of the Indians that killed the Indian boy at Elizabeth Town to demand the murderer to be surrendered to the Governor." A few other acts of not much importance were passed, and the Assembly was brought abruptly to an end.¹

A radical difference of opinion, which must have been foreseen, between the Governor and the people in respect to the rights of the people and the power of the Legislature was very soon in the course of the session developed. The deputies were disposed to exercise the right of originating measures for the good of the people without previous consultation with the Governor. The latter was jealous of his own prerogative, and sought to prescribe the course to be pursued by the deputies, as he was accustomed to do with the Council, who were creatures of his own will. On the fourth day of the session the deputies therefore sent a message to the Governor and his Council to this effect,—

"Honored Gentlemen,—We finding so many and great inconveniences by our not settling together, and your apprehensions so different to ours, and your expectations that things must go according to your opinions, though we see no reasons for, much less warrant from the Concessions, therefore we think it vain to spend much time of returning answers by writings that are so exceedingly dilatory, if not fruitless and endless, and therefore we think our way rather to break up our meeting, seeing the order of the concessions cannot be attended unto."²

Carteret received the message on Friday evening, and on the plea that it was "too late to-night to entertain so long a debate," asked them to send two of their number to discuss their differences on Saturday morning. "If not," he added, "you may do what you please, only we advise you to consider well of your resolutions before you break up." They did consider well, and so broke up on Saturday, the fifth day of the session.³ Carteret disregarded the express provision of the concessions, and refused to call an Assembly for the next two years, preferring to rule the province at his own pleasure by means of his complaisant Council.

CHAPTER IX.

Affairs in 1669.—In 1669 the affairs of the province were involved in much uncertainty on account of the trouble which had overtaken the Lords Proprietors at home. Berkeley had "been detected in the basest corruption" and deprived of his office. Carteret had long been under the accusation of Parliament of being a defaulter to a large amount as treasurer of the navy, and after a rigid investigation of his accounts by a Parliamentary committee he was expelled from the House of Commons in the autumn of 1669. These circumstances led to a renewal of the scheme of annexing New Jersey to the province of New York, in which Col. Nicoll had always been interested. He at the first had remonstrated with the duke against the grant of New Jersey to Berkeley and Carteret, and being now in England he renewed his remonstrance with still greater earnestness. Measures were accordingly taken by the duke for the recovery of his lost territory. Samuel Maverick, writing to Governor Winthrop, under date of Feb. 24, 1669, says,—

"The Lord Berkeley is under a Cloud and out of all his offices, and offers to surrender up the Patent of N. Jersey. Sir G. Carteret, his partner, is in Ireland, but it is thought he will likewise surrender, and then N. Yorke will be enlarged."

Later he writes,—

"New Jersey is returned to his Royal Highness by exchange for Delaware, as Sir George Carteret writes to his Cousin, the present Governor: some tract of land on this side of the river and on the other side to reach to Maryland bounds."⁴

At this time the Newark people were in evident perplexity:

"At a Town Meeting 28th July, 1669, the Town made choice of Mr. Crane and Mr. Treat to take the first opportunity to go over to York to advise with Colonel Lovelace Concerning our Standing, Whether we are designed to be part of the Duke's Colony or Not."⁵

Such were the negotiations for the transfer of New Jersey to the Duke of York's possession. Though so nearly consummated, they failed in the end. Berkeley was made lord lieutenant of Ireland, of which Carteret was already deputy treasurer. By some new turn of the political wheel the lords retained possession of their charter, and Elizabeth Town remained the seat of government of the province and the residence of the Governor and his officials.

Between Carteret, however, and the popular branch of the government there had grown up an irreconcilable difference. The Governor for more than two years refused to convene the Assembly or to recognize the legality of its proceedings. The Assembly met in 1670, and again on March 26, 1671, and held an adjourned meeting on the 14th of May following.

Deputies for Elizabeth Town, Newark, Bergen, Woodbridge, and Piscataway were in the Assembly or House of Burgesses, as it was then called. As the Governor refused to preside over the Assembly, either in person or by deputy, the members, as authorized by the Concessions, appointed Capt. James Carteret, the son of Sir George, who was then residing in Elizabeth Town, to preside over them. William Pardon, the secretary of the House, taking sides with the Governor, refused to deliver up the acts and proceedings of the Assembly, and these records were, by the authority of the Governor, destroyed. By virtue of his appointment as president of the Assembly, Capt. James Carteret issued the following warrant for the arrest of Pardon, addressed to the constable of Elizabeth Town or his deputy, May 25, 1672:

"These are in his Ma^{ties} Name to Will and require You to apprehend the body of William Pardon and him to keepe in Safe Custody until further order, or until he deliver up the Acts of Lanes made by the General Assembly at their Sett^{ing} the 26th of March Last the Which Laues the said Wm Pardon now refuseth to deliver."¹

Constable Meeker immediately made the arrest. Governor Carteret fled to Bergen. Pardon escaped Meeker's custody, and was with his associate members of the Council—Vauquellin, Edsall, Berry, Bishop, Andrus, and Pyke—convened by the Governor at Bergen on May 28th, when the following proclamation was issued:

"Whereas we are certibly informed of several Eregular and Illegal proceedings and Actions of several Persons styling themselves the Deputies or Repre-sentatives for the Country, in Attempting the making an Alteration in this Government by Ass-embliing together at Elizabeth Towne, the fourteenth day of May Last under the Denomination aforesaid, without writte from the Governor, or without the Knowledge, approbation or consent of the Governor and Council aforesaid, and by Electing a President for the Country and making Proclamation publicly to their these Illegal Actions, All which tends only to Mutiny and Rebellion, &c."

The document is too lengthy to be quoted in full. In it the Governor declared his purpose that unless the people should declare their submission within ten days, he should "proceed against them as Mutineers and Enemies to the Government." Pardon returned to read the proclamation before a town-meeting; an order was issued for his arrest; the constable, with a posse, broke into his house and carried away "all his moveables to Goodman Tomson's house, except his writing-desk and papers, which were carried to Capt. Carteret."

The Governor had already been advised by his Council to repair to England and lay the grievances of the province before the Lords Proprietors. He concluded to act upon this advice, and accordingly, in July, 1672, with his officials,—Bollen, Vanquellen, Samuel, Moore, the marshal, and Pardon,—he left the country and returned to England, leaving Capt. John Berry, Deputy Governor, in his place. Capt. James Carteret, however, occupied the government house at Elizabeth Town. On the 9th of July he issued a writ of attachment against the house and lands and all the estate of William Pardon, "escaping away for England."²

It appears that Capt. James Carteret arrived in Elizabeth Town in the summer of 1671, on his way to North Carolina to take possession of his newly acquired domain as landgrave. He was the son of Sir George Carteret, the lord proprietor of East Jersey, and probably had been instructed to call upon Governor Philip Carteret and confer with him in respect to the affairs of the province, then getting to be quite complicated. The fact that he was instructed by a council convened in New York in September, 1671, in connection with Governor Carteret, to "order a General Assembly to be called" in East Jersey for the purpose of prosecuting a war against the Indians on the Delaware shows that he must have had some kind of co-ordinate or supervisory authority with the Governor, either by commission or as the representative of his father.³ It is probable that his father, knowing the unfortunate state of affairs in the province, had intrusted him with all the authority which he exercised, and that at his suggestion, in order to conciliate the aggrieved planters, he had taken the popular side in the controversy with the Governor. At the time of his occupancy of the government house at Elizabeth Town he made frequent visits to New York, the result of which was his marriage, on the 15th of April, 1673, to Frances, daughter of Capt. Thomas Delaval, merchant and mayor of that city.

Capt. James Carteret had scarcely completed his honeymoon before he received by Capt. Bollen dispatches and instructions from his aged father, requiring him to retire from the scene of conflict in New Jersey and look after his patrimony in Carolina. He was now the only surviving son of his father, his elder brother, Sir Philip, having been slain in battle almost a year before, May 28, 1672. Bidding farewell, therefore, to the kind people of the town, he took passage with his wife early in July, 1673 (after nearly two years' sojourn in the town), on board of a sloop, Samuel Davis captain, bound for a Southern port. Samuel Hopkins, one of the planters of the town, accompanied them.

² Hatfield's Elizabeth, note to p. 141—"Great injustice has been done to the memory of Capt. James Carteret. The Bill in Chancery (p. 35) calls him 'a weak and dissolute youth.' He could scarcely have been less than 40 years old. Governor Philip was but 32. Wynne calls him 'a dissolute son of Sir G-orge' (i. 205). Chalmers speaks of him as 'a natural son of the Proprietor' (p. 616). Graham uses the same language (i. 466). Gordon describes him as 'a weak and dissolute natural son of Sir George' (p. 29). Whitehead makes him 'an illegitimate son of Sir George' 'a weak and dissipated young man' (p. 55). Mulford uses the same epithets (p. 152). That he was the lawful son of Sir George and his wife Elizabeth cannot be questioned. Dankers, the Labadist journalist, who knew and met with him at New York in 1679, calls him 'a person of quality,' and gives out the least intimation of his being other than the lawful son of Sir George, but much to the contrary Dankers' Journal, p. 139. Collins' Peerage (1745), iii. 329; iv. 327-8. His oswals at the time could not have been much worse than those which generally prevailed at court; they may have been better."

Capt. Berry signalized his brief authority by two or three bellicose proclamations. In one he forbade the people to purchase any of the estates to be sold by Constable Meeker; in another he called upon the "malcontents" to make their submission at the town of Bergen on the 10th day of June next, or after that to "expect no favors but what the law affords." In the third he declared that, in accordance with the declaration of the Lords Proprietors, no person or persons whatever shall be accounted a freeholder of the province, nor have any vote in electing, nor be capable of being elected for any office of trust, either civil or military, until he doth actually hold his or their lands by patent from them.

Governor Carteret returned from England in November, 1674. Meantime the Dutch had retaken the country, and had again surrendered it to the English. Berkeley had sold his half of the province to John Fenwick, and Sir George Carteret had become the sole proprietor of East Jersey by a new patent from the Duke of York. The same ship which brought over Carteret brought also Col. Edmund Andros, the newly-appointed Governor of New York. The latter became Governor of all the colonies, and in his attempt to extend his jurisdiction over New Jersey came into conflict with the government of Carteret, no less than with the desire and interest of the people, who now made common cause with their Governor against a formidable enemy, in which former animosities seemed for the time forgotten. Andros sent his writs to all the towns demanding the subjection of the people to his authority. In March, 1680, he notified Carteret that he intended to take military possession of the province and to erect a fort at Sandy Point. On the 20th Carteret replied as follows:

"If you intend to set a fort at Sandy Hook, I shall be constrained to endeavor to prevent the same, and shall be necessitated, if any force be used, to defend ourselves and families the best we can, which if any blood be shed it will be contrary to our desires, and the just and righteous God require it at your hands who are the causes thereof. And therefore we intreat you to forebear your threats or any other acts of hostility towards us until his Majesty decides this controversy, which we shall endeavor to have settled as soon as possible may be. The occasion that hinders this from being sent you sooner is the foulness of the weather hindering the council meeting, as also an alarm we had yesterday of your being come with your sloop and a considerable number of soldiers, which constrained us to put ourselves in a posture of defence."

The next scene in the drama is well described by Governor Carteret himself in a letter to Sir George, of whose decease Jan. 14, 1679-80, he had not yet heard:

"Sir Edmund Andros came hither on Wednesday the 7th instant, accompanied with several of his officers, councillors and merchants, to demand the government of this your honour's province, supposing to have gained it either by threats or flattery,—and having notice of it beforehand I had gotten together a matter of 150 men in arms to receive him, doubting he would have brought some offensive forces along with him but did not, and having leave with his train to come ashore, he came up to my house where after the civilities past, he began to show by what authority he had to lay claim to the government."

Both parties presented their documents and pleas, ending of course as they began:

"His last answer was that he had showed what authority he had, and according to his duty did require it in behalf of his master, and if we would not obey him, let it rest at our perils; for that we answered him we had sent away our appeal to his majesty, and should be ready to submit to what his Majesty should determine, and then we went to dinner, that done we accompanied him to his sloop, and so parted."

The conduct of Andros at this time was most disgraceful. Dankers, who was in the country at the time, and cognizant of the whole affair, says,—

"He sent boats several times to Achter Kull to demand the submission of the place to his authority, which the people of Achter Kull jeered at and disregarded, being ready to uphold the king and their own governor, whom they bound themselves to maintain. At night, and unseasonable hours, and by surprise, he took from New Jersey all the staves of the constables out of their houses, which was as much as to deprive them of the power to act. Seeing he could accomplish nothing by force, he declared the inhabitants released from their oaths to the Heer Carteret; they answered they could not acknowledge any release from their oaths," etc.

The capture of Carteret soon followed, in the same cowardly manner. The story is told by Dankers, as follows:

"At length he captured one of Carteret's domestics, for Carteret had no soldiers or fortifications, but resided in a country house only. He then equipped some yachts, and a ketch with soldiers, arms, and ammunition, and dispatched them to Achter Kol, in order to abduct Carteret in any manner it could be done. They entered his house, I know not how, at midnight, seized him, naked, dragged him through the window, struck and kicked him terribly, and even injured him internally. They threw him, all naked as he was, into a canoe, without any cap or hat on his head, and carried him in that condition to New York, where they furnished him clothes and shoes and stockings, and then conducted him to the fort and put him immediately in prison. When they seized him at Achter kol, the armed boats had gone home, and the seizure was accomplished through treachery. Two of the head men of Carteret (Bollen and Vauquellin) immediately took possession of his papers, such as were of importance to him, and travelled, one to Maryland, and the other, crossing the upper part of the North River, to Boston over land, and both to England, in order to remonstrate. The Governor (Andros) sent immediately to Achter kol, took possession of the place, posted up orders, and caused inquiries to be made for the man who had set Carteret's man (Bollen) over the river, but without success. While Carteret was in prison he was sick, very sick, they said, in regard to which there were various surmises."

On the 27th of May he was brought to trial before a special assize for presuming to exercise jurisdiction and government within the bounds of His Majesty's letters patent granted to his Royal Highness the Duke of York. The jury declared him "not guilty," and he was acquitted. But an order was appended to the judgment of the court requiring him to give security that he would not exercise jurisdiction, either civil or military, in the province of New Jersey. Carteret, thus released, as it were, upon parole, immediately returned to his home, drew up the necessary papers for an appeal to the home government, which he sent to England on the 9th of July, 1680.

On the 2d of June, only five days after the conclusion of Carteret's trial, Andros called a General Assembly to meet at Elizabeth Town. He presented himself personally before the deputies, unfolded the king's letters patent, bearing the great seal of England, and claimed to be the rightful and lawful Governor. He gained nothing, however, "but a tacit acquiescence on the part of the people in the existing state of things until the authorities in England could be heard from."¹

The deputies returned to him the following answer:

"As we are the Representatives of the Freeholders of this Province, we dare not grant his Majesty's Letters Patents, though under the Great Seal of England, to be our rule or joint safety for the Great Charter of England, alias Magna Charta, as [is] the only rule, privilege, and joint safety of every freeborn Englishman."

Carteret occupied the interval in the improvement of his estate, and in the erection of a new house, for which he had been making preparation. Says Dr. Hatfield,—

"He improved his leisure, also, in making some friendly visits, either to the city or to Long Island, resulting in his marriage, April, 1681, to Elizabeth, the widow of Capt. William Lawrence, of Tew's Neck, L. I., who had died in 1680, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. Mrs. Carteret was the daughter of Richard Smith, patentee of Smithtown, L. I., and brought with her to this town seven children,—Mary, Thomas, Joseph, Richard, Samuel, Sarah, and James. Samuel died Aug. 16, 1687, aged fifteen years, and Thomas, Oct. 26, 1687, aged nineteen years, and both were buried in the rear of the meeting-house. Their graves are now covered by the First Presbyterian Church, and their monuments adorn the rear wall of the building, being the most ancient stones in the cemetery. This was, in all probability, the Governor's first marriage, no allusion to any other having been discovered. He resumed office by proclamation March 2, 1681.

"The remainder of his administration was of short duration and uneventful. With the decease of Sir George Carteret, and the transfer of East Jersey to new proprietors, the necessity arose for a new administration. This was inaugurated under Thomas Rudyard, as the deputy of Governor Barclay, in 1682. Carteret continued to occupy the government house, which he claimed as his own property.² He survived his retirement from office only some four weeks, his will, made just before his death, bearing date Dec. 10, 1682. Of the cause, occasion, and circumstances of his death no record remains. It may have resulted from the injuries received at the time of his capture by Andros. However well qualified by gifts and attainments he may have been for the administration of the government of a newly-founded colony, he failed to secure the confidence and respect of the town and province. Living among, and associating daily with, a community in full sympathy with the men and manners and principles of the Commonwealth, he was ever exemplifying, asserting, and upholding the social and political (if not the ecclesiastical) principles of the Stuarts, and exacting a deference, as the representative of that aristocratic and vicious court, which the Puritan colonists of the town and province were among the very last to concede. Instead of identifying himself as much as possible with his townsmen, and seeking to conciliate them, he seems to have pursued a course, almost from the first, that he must have known would excite their prejudices and thwart their plans and purposes in founding a settlement in the wilderness. From the time of the first collision with the people in 1668 he persisted in excluding from his Council and confidence the very best men in the community, men of sterling integrity and of great moral worth, putting in office, and persistently retaining when notoriously rejected and despised for their sycophancy, such parasites as Bollen, Vauquellin, and Pardon. His administration must be regarded as a complete failure, opposed as it was almost from the beginning by the worthiest men of the colony. He seems to have had no party in the town outside of the clique that came with him and lived on his favor and patronage."³

CHAPTER X.

TITLE TO LANDS.

THE original Associates purchased their lands of the Indians, and obtained a patent therefor from Col. Richard Nicolls, Governor under the Duke of York. This was before the province had been sold to the Lords Proprietors, Berkeley and Carteret. These proprietors and their successors undertook to invalidate the title of the Associates granted by Governor Nicolls, and to compel the owners to take out new patents under the proprietors, and pay them the usual quit-rents. This controversy began in Philip Carteret's time, who, although he himself had become a purchaser under the Associates, and had repeatedly acknowledged the validity of their title, eventually took sides with the proprietors, causing the Associates great trouble and annoyance towards the close of his administration.

After the sale of West Jersey to John Fenwick, in trust for Edward Byllinge, of the Society of Friends, in March, 1674, Sir George Carteret, by a new patent

² Scott's Model of E. N. J., pp. 149, 150. The government house, built by Carteret just before his death, was subsequently known as the "White House," sometimes as "Schuyler's House," it having passed into the hands of Col. Peter Schuyler. It was converted into a public-house, and was kept by Mrs. Margaret Johnston, formerly the widow of William Williamson, and then of Mr. Chetwood, a daughter of Capt. Matthias Dellart, and sister of Mrs. Samuel Mann. It was then called "the Nag's Head Tavern." In 1766 it was offered for sale by Jonathan Hampton. In 1784 it was again advertised (by Col. Edward Thomas) for sale as "that large, commodious, and famous Brick House, known by the name of the White House, built in the strongest and best manner, by a former Governor of New Jersey, for the seat of government, beautifully situated on the river running through the town, on which is a very good wharf." It is thus fully identified as Carteret's house. In 1739, St. John's parsonage is described in the deed of sale as "on the South side of the said Elizabeth Town Creek, opposite to a large white house, now or late belonging to Mr. Peter Schuyler." This determines the locality. Weyman's N. Y. Gazette, No. 249. Holt's N. Y. Journal, No. 1214. Clark's St. John's Church, p. 186.

from the Duke of York, became the sole proprietor of East Jersey, the duke granting him the whole province in "as full and ample a manner as the same had been granted to himself." This latter clause was evidently designed to secure to Carteret the right to all the lands in the territory, not excepting the large tract which had been acknowledged to belong to the Elizabeth Town Associates. That such was the construction of the new patent very soon appeared. Philip Carteret, who had been absent in England more than two years, returned to his government in November, 1674. Conscious that he was about to take a decided stand against the Elizabeth Town people, and therefore ashamed to resume his old seat in that town, he proceeded to Bergen, where he called together his Council. With his new commission as Governor, dated July 31, 1674, the Concessions had been so modified as to give him entire control of the Legislature. Moreover, he had come with express instructions from Sir George Carteret to enforce his claim against the lands of the Associates, who had now been in possession of them about ten years. The instructions were to this effect:

"For such as pretend to a right of property to land and government within our Province, by virtue of any patents from Governor Col. Richard Nicolls, as they ignorantly assert, we utterly disown any such thing. But if such persons as have not already received patents of their land from us shall not within one year after notice to them given of this our pleasure therein desire and accept patents of the said land, we do hereby order our Governor and Council to dispose of such lands and tenements in whole or in part, for our best advantage to any other persons."

Thus if the Associates did not take out patents for their lands from Carteret within one year their estates were to be confiscated and sold, with the tenements thereon, to purchasers from the Governor and Council. The town held a meeting on March 11, 1675, and voted the following:

"We, the inhabitants of Elizabeth Town, are willing to pay the Lord Proprietor the sum of Twenty Pounds per annum, current pay of this country, in consideration of a Township eight miles square, to be divided according to our Agreement of first, second, and third lots, to be confirmed by Charter to us and our heirs forever, with all such privileges as any other towns in the Province have or shall have; which we do apprehend may be sufficient, in regard of the badness of the soil, which has deceived us all, and the half or more being but waste land. This was voted by all present on the 11th of March, 1675. Voted, Isaac Whitehead and George Ross to present this writing to the Governor and his Council.

"ISAAC WHITEHEAD, Clerk."

The Governor and Council, determined not to abate a jot of their exactions, returned the following answer, indorsed upon the back of the petition March 15th:

"There cannot be granted any variation or alteration from the Proclamation dated 11th December, 1674; but, accordingly, the Surveyor is required to attend at the time appointed, and it's expected that suitable persons be provided for his assistance, according to the said Proclamation.

"By order of the Governor and Council,

"JAMES BOLLEN, Secretary."

"Finding no prospect of securing their rights, with no means of redress at hand, and threatened by their imperious rulers with a confiscation of their lands and improvements," one after another of the embarrassed planters applied for surveys, and warrants were given them by the Governor. We give below a list of those who had surveys made to them, with the dates and number of acres surveyed to each, as found upon the records:

These surveys were made under the Governor's warrant, without any intention on the part of the Associates of abandoning the rightfulness of their title under the Nicolls patent. This act, however, as well as the petition for the purchase of a township, was so construed by the opposition. We find it asserted that "the Associates, in the year 1675, or soon after, laid aside a pretension by Indian purchase and Nicolls' grant, and continued peaceable and quiet inhabitants until the death of Carteret and until the year 1699, except that in the year 1684 John Baker and some others of the Associates endeavored to impose upon Governor Laurie at his first arrival in the country." This, so far from being true, as Dr. Hatfield has shown, was a matter of as strenuous controversy under the Quaker rule as it had been previously. Barclay said, in 1684, "And we do hereby declare that we will not enter into any treaty on this side with those people who 'claim by Colonel Nicolls Patent,' nor with any others that challenge land by patents from the late Governor Carteret." . . . At this date the same claims were put forth by the town as had been in former days. "The old planters," says Dr. Hatfield, "never wavered in their conviction of the lawfulness and equity of their title, and never shrank from avowing and maintaining it. A second generation were now coming forward, in whom the conviction had 'grown with their growth and strengthened with their strength.' If possible, they were even more resolute than their fathers."

It is said that Governor Laurie, so far from troubling the settlers about their Indian title on his coming into the country, "he asked old Isaac Whitehead and Capt. John Baker (divers others of the principal men of Elizabeth Town being present) how they held their lands, who answered him by Nicholl's grant and an Indian Purchase;" and that then he asked them to show him the bounds of their lands so purchased and granted, "saying he had a Mind to make a Purchase of some Lands Lying Westward of their Purchase." It is further said that Stephen Osborn was sent by the town to call the Indian sagamores together to mark out the bounds, with whom Laurie and others had a conference at the house of Capt. John Baker; also that a few days afterwards Richard Clarke, Jr., Capt. John Baker, Jonas Wood, Stephen Osborn, Joseph Meeker, and Joseph Wilson, with two lads, Richard Baker and John Cromwell (who went to see the woods), set out with the Indian Wewanapo (cousin of one of the sagamores that sold the land originally) to mark the western bounds of the town.

Instructed by the old Indian chief, they went, "on or about the 16th day of July, 1684, to a plain back of Piscataway, to a marked tree with some stones about it, and a stake by the tree," and thence "forward towards the Green River, near where it comes out of the mountain, and lodged by the river-side that night; and the next day they made a circle or compass along the foot of the mountain, by the directions of the Indian, till they came to the Minisink path, and then came down to Elizabeth Town." It was affirmed, however, that it was confessed by the Indian chief that this compass included only a part of the town lands.

In this conference it is said that "Capt. Baker was the Dutch interpreter, and an Indian interpreted the Indian language into Dutch to said Capt. Baker, who again interpreted into English." It is also said that an Indian who had been at sea and knew the use of the compass was of the exploring party.

This transaction, however, became the source of a serious litigation. Baker was charged with having prevailed on the Indians to include a much larger tract within the bounds than the town had originally purchased, and so with having contravened the act of February, 1683, forbidding private purchases from the Indians; on which charge he was indicted, Aug. 12, 1684, and on the 28th was tried, found guilty, fined ten pounds, and bound to good behavior for a year.

Laurie is also said to have bought, Oct. 30, 1684, of the Indians Seweckroneck, Mindowaskein, Canundus, and Wewonapee, a large tract about Green Brook and the Blue Hills, supposed to be to the west of the Elizabeth Town purchase, on which several of the most considerable Scotch immigrants presently were located with their imported Presbyterian servants of humble condition. This purchase served greatly to complicate in after-days the question of land titles, a portion of the feritory thus acquired, if not the whole of it, lying within what were subsequently claimed as the bounds of the original purchase of 1664, and therefore distributed by allotment to the Associates, their heirs or assigns.¹

First Litigation of the Land Controversy.—During the long controversy respecting the land titles of the town no regular judicial investigation of the points at issue had been undertaken until 1695. Hamilton having been reinstated in the proprietary government had returned from England, and the affairs of the province having been settled in favor of the proprietors, they determined to bring the matter in dispute between them and the Associates into the courts, confident that, as the courts were chiefly under their control and the judges and juries mainly their partisans, the case would be decided in their favor, and the planters be compelled to pay the arrearages of quit-rents from 1670 or be dispossessed of their plantations with all the improvements made upon them.

The Fullerton brothers—Thomas, Robert, and James—came to the province in 1684, and settled on Cedar Brook on the plot bought by Governor Laurie of the Indians, but previously claimed by the Elizabeth Town people under the Nicolls grant. Jeffry Jones, one of the Associates, had by conveyance from Laurie come into possession of land there on which James Fullerton had settled, "upon which the said Jeffry Jones did enter and oust him." This was in 1693.

Fullerton, in September of that year, brought an action of trespass and ejectment against Jones, and issue was joined. The case came to trial in the Court of Common Pleas at Perth Amboy in May, 1695. The whole merits of the case were brought out before the judges and jury on both sides. The events were then recent, the documentary evidence was ample and well preserved, the first Elizabeth Town Book was in the hands of Samuel Whitehead, the town clerk, and was perfectly accessible, so that the facts were fully before the court or within their reach.

A special verdict was agreed upon, but the jury gave a general verdict for Jones. The court, however, pronounced judgment, May 14th, on the special verdict against Jones, who thereupon appealed the case to the King in Council. In the court at Kensington both parties again were fully heard, William Nicoll, Esq., being attorney for Jones. The Committee of the Privy Council—Lord Chief Justice Holt, Sir Philip Williamson, and Sir Henry Goodrich—offered their opinion to his Majesty in Council that the judgment be reversed; and his Majesty in Council, Feb. 25, 1697, reversed and repealed the said judgment, and also declared all issues thereupon null and void. Nicoll afterwards declared on oath that in the Council

"The sole dispute was, Whether Col. Richard Nicholls, as Governor under the King of England in those parts, might not grant License to any of the Subjects of England to purchase Lands from the native Pagans? and if, upon such License and Purchase, the English Subjects should gain a Property in the Lands so bought? all which was resolved in the Affirmative, and the Judgment given to the Contrary accordingly reversed."

William Nicoll was an eminent lawyer of New York. Shortly after this trial he obtained a third-lot right in Elizabeth Town, but never resided there. As the Associates made common cause with Jones in defense of his title, it is thought that this right was given to Nicoll for his services in defending the suit.

The period immediately subsequent to the decision of the Jones case in 1695 was one of much confusion and excitement. Great indignation of course was manifested by the town party against the proprietors and their anomalous government. Restive as they had been under it from the first, they could no longer restrain the expression of their dissatisfaction. The reversal by the king and his Council in 1697 of the adverse judgment of 1695, confirming as it did unquestionably the validity of their titles, emboldened them still more in their opposition to proprietary rule and in the determination to be rid of it and come under the immediate government of the king, whom they had learned to trust.

The surrender of the right of jurisdiction to the crown on the part of the proprietors in 1702 made no change in respect to the contest growing out of the conflicting titles to lands in the Elizabeth Town grant. No suit at law involving the issue between the proprietors and the Associates occurred for at least twelve years. In the first year of George I. a series of prosecutions was commenced by the proprietary interest to test once more the validity of the Nicolls grant, subjecting for a long term of years the Associate settlers to vexatious annoyances, great disquietude, and no small expense. We will mention one of these cases, as it has a special bearing on the interests of the whole town and the settlements now composing Union County.

James Emott had obtained in 1686 of the proprietors a patent for three hundred acres of land on the west side of Rahway River, and claimed by the Associates as part of their lands in common. In the division of 1699-1700 lot No. 148, containing one hundred acres, surveyed to John Harriman, Jr., and the town committee, was assigned to Joseph Woodruff. In 1714 it came into the hands of Rev. Edward Vaughan, rector of St. John's Church, by his marriage with Mary Lawrence, the step-daughter first of Governor Carteret, and then of Col. Townley. At the November term of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, Mr. Vaughan brought an action of ejectment against Joseph Woodruff. The cause came to trial in May, 1716, the judges being, as was alleged, in the proprietary interest. A special verdict was found, and for several terms the case was argued at length on both sides, resulting in May, 1718, in a judgment by the court in favor of Vaughan. Thereupon, by writ of error, Woodruff carried the case before the Governor and Council. But the Governor and Council would never be prevailed upon to render a judgment, and after ten or twelve years of great expense the case was dropped without being decided.¹

About the time of this judgment and appeal, the old town books, in which the proceedings of the various town-meetings from the beginning of the settlement for more than fifty years, and the various surveys ordered by vote of the town, had been regularly recorded, to the irreparable loss of the town history, disappeared, and have never since been recovered. The earliest statement of the loss is found in the initial entry of Town Book B. (which happily has been preserved), under date of Aug. 2, 1720, and which is as follows:

"Whereas, The Books of Record, Belonging To The said Elizabeth Town, wherein The Important affairs of The same Towne were Recorded from the beginning Thereof; have Been privately Taken Away from him unto whose Care and Custody They were Committed; And Are not Likely To be Again Obtained; It is now Therefore, By A free And unanimous Agreement of the freeholders aforesaid Concluded and Resolved; That This present Book Now Is And Shall Be Improved To be, A book of Records, for the use and behoof of the freeholders of Elizabeth Town aforesaid, And for no Other use whatsoever."

In a document prepared with much care, and signed Nov. 18, 1729, by one hundred and eleven Associates, with their seals affixed, the story of the lost books is thus recited:

"But it so happened that the said Books wherein the said Surveys or the greater Number of them were Entered by Some One or more Designing ¹ Elizabeth Town Bill, pp. 46, 122. Also answer to do., p. 32.

Person or persons were Craftily and Maliciously Stole and (as there is no Small reason to believe) were burnt or otherwise destroy'd, So that the benefit thereby intended to the parties aforesaid and their Assigns became Wholly frustrate and Void; Yet not as but the like Good Effect may be hoped for, from something of a like Nature since the original Surveys aforesaid are as Yet Existing as appears Not Only by the Oath of the Officer who was Surveyor, but by divers Other concurring Circumstances to the Satisfaction of the Parties aforesaid.¹

The town made common cause with the defendants in these litigations, and appointed annually their committee of seven select men to act and do for them and in their name and behalf, by themselves or their learned counsel, whatever seemed meet and proper in all things touching the settlement of their rights and properties, as they claimed by force of grant and purchase under Governor Richard Nicolls.¹ At the May term of the Supreme Court, 1731, actions of ejectment were brought against John Robinson, Henry Clarke, Andrew Craig, Joshua Marsh, and others, occupants of a tract of land held under the Nicolls grant west of the Rahway River. The cases came to trial at the May term, 1734, when a general verdict was found by a Middlesex jury for the defendants. This gave encouragement to the Associates, and many of them put themselves under bonds to the town committee or trustees to pay (not exceeding ten pounds proclamation money) such sums as should be duly assessed upon them by the said trustees towards defraying the charges and expenses of maintaining the title to their common lands. Not only this, but a large majority at a town-meeting convened on July 1, 1734, voted to empower the committee of seven to dispose of

"All that Tract of Land or any part or parcel Thereof Beginning at Cedar Brook where Essex Line Crosses the said Brook and from Thence Running west six miles and from Thence the Nearest Course to the mountain from Thence as the soil mountain Runs to the hundred acres Lots formerly surveyed according to the Town order and agreement and from Thence to the first mentioned place to the said Cedar Brook. (Also) To Dispose of what money, shall arise from the Sale of The said Lands, or any part Thereof for the General Intrust of the said Associates and freeholders. In Defending Them or any of Them In The possession of Their property or In disposing any That shall unjustly Intrude upon any part of the aforesaid purchase and Grant."²

In 1741 a tract of three hundred acres of upland lying near Ash Swamp was voted to defray the expenses of a suit between William Penn, Thomas Penn, and others vs. Chambers and Alcorn, tried at Amboy, Aug. 14-16, 1741, wherein a verdict was rendered for the plaintiffs, on the ground that the lands in question were not included in the Elizabeth Town purchase. The case of Cooper vs. Moss came to trial in August, 1742, resulting also in a verdict for the plaintiff, brought in by a Morris County jury. Other actions were brought of a similar character, some of which were compromised and withdrawn, others went to trial with like results. To enumerate them all would require more space than we have at command.

A petition signed by three hundred and four proprietors, freeholders, and inhabitants of a tract of land called Elizabeth Town, setting forth their rights under the Nicolls grant, and the difficulties of obtaining impartial justice in the local and provincial courts, was prepared and forwarded to his Most Excellent Majesty George II. in 1744, probably by Messrs. Stephen Crane and Matthias Halfeld, the committee chosen, which petition was read in council July 19, 1744, referred to the Lords of the Committee of Council for Plantation Affairs, and by them, August 21st, to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations. It is not known what final disposition was made of it.

Meantime excitement ran to a high pitch. Parties began to eject proprietary tenants by force. In an affidavit made by Solomon Boyle, May 13, 1747, an account is given of the breaking into the house of Mr. Dalrymple and the expulsion of his wife and children, on the 8th of April, by persons armed with clubs. The affidavit is drawn out at great length, showing that the people of Turkey (New Providence), claiming by the Elizabeth Town right, had taken the law into their own hands, and were determined to drive off all other claimants. This is not so much to be wondered at when their enemies were so frequently gaining verdicts against them in the courts, and that in a manner which seemed to them wholly unjust.

The Bill in Chancery.—For several years prior to the events mentioned above the proprietary party had been busily engaged in preparing, at great pains and expense, a complete and labored argument in defense of their long-litigated pretensions to the soil of the Elizabeth Town patent, based on the grant of the Duke of York to Sir George Carteret. Like most lawyers' documents, the bill had a special purpose to answer, and must, therefore, be taken with some allowance as to the accuracy of its history. It bears the following imposing title:

"A Bill in the Chancery of New Jersey, at the Suit of John Earl of Stair, and others, Proprietors of the Eastern-Division of New-Jersey; Against Benjamin Bond, and some other Persons of Elizabeth-Town, distinguished by the name of the Clicker Lot Right Men. With Three large Maps, done upon Copper-Plates. To which is added; The Publications of the Council of Proprietors of East New-Jersey, and Mr. Nevill's Speeches to the General Assembly, concerning The Rots committed in New-Jersey, and The Pretences of the Roters and their Seducers. These Papers will give a better Light into the History and Constitution of New-Jersey, than anything hitherto published; the Matters whereof have been chiefly collected from Records. Published by Subscription. Printed by James Parker, in New-York, 1747; and a few copies are to be sold by him and Benjamin Franklin, in Philadelphia; Price bound, and Maps coloured, Three Pounds; plain and stitched only, Fifty shillings, Proclamation Money."

This famous bill purports to have been filed April 13, 1745. The proprietors employed the best lawyers the country could furnish, viz.: James Alexander, previously surveyor-general of New Jersey, then at the head of the New York bar, and Joseph Murray, one of the first lawyers of the land.³ The bill was undoubtedly prepared by the former. His familiarity with New Jersey records and with the transactions of the land-offices both of East and West Jersey gave him great facilities for the work. It was written on about fifteen hundred folios. The printing was finished July 21, 1747, the form of the book being a folio, in double columns, with one hundred and twenty-four pages, besides the maps and an appendix of forty pages. So plausible is the plea that nearly all the historians of the State have relied almost implicitly on its statements, and in many cases have thus been led into error. It is a special and one-sided plea, and, as in all such cases, is to be received with caution, and its statements of facts are to be subjected to a rigid scrutiny.¹

Answer to the Bill.—The preparation of an answer to this formidable bill was intrusted by the town committee to William Livingston and William Smith, Jr., as their counsel. Livingston was the pupil of Alexander, and if employed, as is likely, in 1750, was only in the twenty-seventh year of his age, but he had already acquired a high reputation at the bar in New York. The interest that he took in this case was probably one of the reasons that induced him a few years later to become a resident of Elizabeth Town. Smith was still younger, in his twenty-third year. Yet he was associated that same year, November, 1750, with others in preparing the first digest of the colonial laws of New York. He wrote the history of the province, and after the Revolution was made chief justice of Canada.

The answer was read in town-meeting, Aug. 27, 1751, and filed a few days afterwards. It was put in print the following year, 1752, in similar form with the bill itself (but contains only forty-eight pages), with the following title:

"An Answer to a Bill in the Chancery of New Jersey. At the Suit of John Earl of Stair, and others, commonly called Proprietors of the Eastern Division of New Jersey, Against Benjamin Bond, and others claiming under the original Proprietors and Associates of Elizabeth Town. To which is added; Nothing either of The Publications of the Council of Proprietors of East New-Jersey, or of The Pretences of the Rioters, and their Seducers; Except so far As the Persons meant by Rioters, pretend Title Against The Parties to the above Answer; But a great Deal of the Controversy, Though much less of the History and Constitution of New-Jersey, than the said Bill. Audi alteram partem. Published by Subscription. New York: Printed and Sold by James Parker, at the New P.inting-Office, in Beaver-Street. 1752."

It professes to be "The joint and several Answer" of four hundred and forty-nine freeholders and inhabitants of Elizabeth Town, recorded in alphabetical order.

The town committee, on whom was devolved the responsibility of conducting the defense, were, for 1750, Messrs. John Crane, Andrew Craige, William Miller, John Halsted, Stephen Crane, Thomas Clarke, and John Chandler.

At the time of the preparation and the filing of the bill in chancery Lewis Morris was Governor of the province. He had long been conversant with the matters in litigation, and was deeply interested in the issue of this most important case, holding, as he did, a large part of his property in New Jersey by proprietary rights. Governor Morris had presumed, without, as was alleged, due authority, to erect a Court of Chancery, and to exercise the prerogatives of chancellor. It was feared from the well-known proclivities of Governor Morris that as chancellor he would be likely to give judgment upon the bill in favor of the plaintiffs. But that apprehension was removed by the death of Governor Morris in May, 1746, and matters took a favorable turn for the defendants by the accession of Jonathan Belcher, who was a New Englander, and in hearty sympathy, both in his civil and religious principles, with the people of the town. He entered upon his office as Governor of New Jersey in August, 1747. Before the answer to the bill was printed Governor Belcher became a resident of Elizabeth Town, and immediately identified himself with the religious and social interests of the place, joining the church of which most of the defendants scattered over the township were members,—the Presbyterian Church,—and thus bringing himself into a closer bond of sympathy with them. For this reason, probably, among others, Governor Belcher did not adjudicate the case. Alexander, who had the principal management of the bill, died April 2, 1756; Murray died April 2, 1757, before the death of Governor Belcher; the French war succeeded; then came the Stamp Act excitement, followed by the Revolution. No place was found for the Elizabeth Town bill. It died from neglect, until it was too late for a resuscitation. Such was the end of this famous struggle, continued for a whole century, and resulting in the vindication, together with the triumph, of popular rights throughout the colonies, of the original purchasers of the soil and the defeat of their opponents.

CHAPTER XI.

BEGINNING OF THE REVOLUTIONARY STRUGGLE.

THE territory embraced in the present county of Union was the theatre of stirring events both preceding and during the war of the Revolution. These events began to develop themselves at Elizabeth Town immediately upon the passage of the Stamp Act in 1765, or as soon as intelligence of that oppressive measure of Parliament had reached the province.

The General Assembly, being in session at Burlington, received on the 20th of June a communication from the General Court of Massachusetts, recommending them, together with the representative bodies of the other colonies, to send delegates to a General Congress to convene in New York on the first Tuesday in October following. Robert Ogden, of Elizabeth Town, was Speaker of the House. It was the last day of the session, some members having left, and others being anxious to return to their homes. It was, therefore, upon a hurried conference, deemed advisable to take no immediate action upon the communication, and the Assembly adjourned. Mr. Ogden, who had been a member of the House by consecutive elections since 1751, and Speaker since 1763, was made to bear the chief responsibility for this action. He shortly after called a meeting of the representatives at Amboy, who proceeded to elect the delegates to the Congress at New York. Hendrick Fisher, of Somerset, Joseph Borden, of Burlington, and himself were chosen. It was in this body that Mr. Ogden gave offense to his countrymen, not by any act that in the least impaired the sterling integrity and patriotism of which he had always been a conspicuous example, but by a mere difference of opinion as to methods, which it seemed difficult for the people in that moment of excitement to tolerate, or ever after wholly to overlook. "A Declaration of Rights and Grievances" had been drawn up, with an address to the king and a petition to each of the Houses of Parliament, all admirably and skillfully prepared, and well calculated, it was thought, to procure the repeal of the obnoxious law. All the members voted for sending the documents immediately to the Court of England, with the sanction only of the body whence it emanated, except Timothy Ruggles, of Massachusetts, the presiding officer of Congress, and Mr. Ogden. "These gentlemen maintained that the proceedings should be submitted to the Assemblies of the respective colonies, and, if sanctioned by them, forwarded as their own acts," a position very reasonable certainly, since emanating from the regularly-constituted Legislature rather than from a body unknown to the English government, the petitions would have been much more likely to be favorably received and to accomplish their object. This was probably the view taken by Mr. Ogden and his associate, the president of Congress, who were both undoubtedly conscientious in maintaining their position, but popular feeling was too much excited to do them even this justice. So high did it run in New Jersey that Mr. Ogden was burnt in effigy. Feeling the indignity and injury very sensibly, he resigned his position and membership in the Legislature, Nov. 27, 1765. The people of his town, however, still honored him with their confidence, and when the time came for earnest action in 1776 he was made chairman of the Elizabeth Town Committee of Safety.

In the election to fill the vacancy in the Assembly Stephen Crane was chosen, and became Speaker of the House in 1771.

The manner in which the Stamp Act was treated in this locality may be inferred from the following notice, which appeared in a New York newspaper Feb. 27, 1766:

"A large gallows was erected in Elizabeth Town, last Week, with a Rope ready fixed thereto, and the Inhabitants there vow and declare that the first person that either distrains or takes out a Stamped Paper shall be hung thereon without Judge or Jury."

A very summary process, but probably never called into requisition. At the same date the editor says,—

"We have certain Intelligence from Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey, that the Magistrates and Lawyers carry on their Business in the Law as usual without Stamps."

With the repeal of the Stamp Act, March 18, 1766, much of the excitement and alarm of the people came to an end. A series of measures was subsequently adopted, however, well fitted to excite the fears and provoke the resentment of the colonists.

The non-importation agreements were renewed, and all trade with the mother-country was brought to a stand. The people of this town and vicinity entered with all their heart into the measures of the day.

The colony of New Jersey broke out in a simultaneous blaze of indignation from Sussex to Cape May, and immediate measures were taken to organize the various counties into a combination of the friends of liberty which should secure promptitude and unity of action throughout the province.

As early as June 1, 1774, a "General Committee of Correspondence" had been formed, which was self constituting indeed, inasmuch as it did not derive its existence or its powers directly from the people; but, nevertheless, it was actively engaged in consultation and correspondence with influential men in all the counties, with a view to a concerted plan of action. This committee, which consisted of nine members, met at New Brunswick June 1, 1774, and the meeting is thus described in a letter dated June 2, 1774, which has been preserved, and which was written by one of the members of the House of Assembly, who was also one of the committee: "I returned yesterday from New-Brunswick, where six of our committee met. We answered the Boston letters, informing them that we look on New-Jersey as eventually in the same predicament with Boston, and that we will do everything which may be generally agreed on. We have signed a request to the Governor to call the General Assembly, to meet at such time as his Excellency may think proper before the first of August.² Our committee is well disposed in the cause of American freedom."—Am. Archives, vol. i., 380.

Immediately after the meeting of this committee at New Brunswick, and undoubtedly inspired by it, a series of meetings of the people of the several counties was called by prominent men therein, to take steps for the more perfect organization of the friends of freedom in the colony, and more particularly to provide for the selection of deputies to represent the province in the Continental Congress in September following.

On the 7th of June the following call was posted in various public places in the county of Essex, and was also published in one of the New York papers:

"ESSEX COUNTY, N. J., 7th June, 1774.

"All the Inhabitants of the County of Essex, in New Jersey, friends to the Constitution, the liberties and properties of America, are hereby notified and desired to meet at the court-house, in Newark, on Saturday, the 11th of June, instant, at two of the clock in the afternoon, to consult and deliberate, and finally resolve up on the most prudent and salutary measures to secure and maintain the constitutional rights of his Majesty's subjects in America. It is, therefore, hoped that from the importance of the subject the meeting will be general.

"Signed by order, at a meeting of a number of the freeholders of the County of Essex, the 7th day of June, 1774.

"JOHN DEHART,
"ISAAC OGDEN."

² This request Governor Franklin refused to comply with, for the reason, as assigned in a letter to the Earl of Dartmouth, dated June 18, 1774, "that there is no public business of the province which can make such a meeting necessary."—Forster's Am. Archives, vol. i., 428, 429.

At the time and place designated in this call a meeting was held, of which the following is the record:

"At a Meeting of the Freeholders and Inhabitants of the County of Essex, in the Province of New Jersey, at Newark, in the said county, on Saturday, the 11th day of June, 1774.

"This meeting taking into serious consideration some late alarming measures adopted by the British Parliament for depriving his Majesty's American subjects of their undoubted and constitutional rights and principles; and particularly the Act for blockading the port of Boston, which appears to them pregnant with the most dangerous consequences to all his Majesty's Dominions in America, do unanimously resolve and agree:

"1. That under the enjoyment of our constitutional privileges and immunities we will ever cheerfully render all due obedience to the Crown of Great Britain, as well as full faith and allegiance to his most gracious Majesty, King George the Third, and do esteem a firm dependence on the mother country essential to our political security and happiness.

"2. That the late Act of Parliament relative to Boston, which so absolutely destroys every idea of safety and confidence, appears to us big with the most dangerous and alarming consequences; especially as subversive of that very dependence which we should earnestly wish to continue as our best and securest protection: And that we conceive every well-wisher to Great Britain and her Colonies is now loudly called upon to exert his utmost abilities in promoting every legal and prudent measure towards obtaining a repeal of the said Act of Parliament; and all others subversive of the undoubted rights and liberties of his Majesty's American subjects.

"3. That it is our unanimous opinion that it would conduce to the restoration of the liberties of America should the Colonies enter into a joint agreement not to purchase or use any articles of British manufacture, and especially any commodities imported from the East Indies, under such restrictions as may be agreed upon by a general Congress of the said Colonies hereafter to be appointed.

"4. That this county will most readily and cheerfully join their brethren of the other counties in this Province in promoting such Congress of Deputies to be sent from each of the Colonies, in order to form a general plan of union, so that the measures to be pursued for the important ends in view may be uniform and firm; to which plan, when concluded upon, we do agree faithfully to adhere. And do now declare ourselves ready to send a committee to meet with those from the other counties, at such time and place as by them may be agreed upon, in order to elect proper persons to represent this Province in the said general Congress.

"5. That the freeholders and inhabitants of the other counties in this Province be requested speedily to convene themselves together to consider the present distressing state of our public affairs, and to correspond and consult with such other committees as may be appointed, as well as with our committee, who are hereby directed to correspond and consult with such other committees, as also with those of any other province, particularly to meet with the said County Committees, in order to nominate and appoint Deputies to represent this Province in general Congress.

"6. We do hereby unanimously request the following gentlemen to accept of that trust, and accordingly do appoint them our committee for the purposes aforesaid, viz.: Stephen Crane, Henry Garritte, Joseph Riggs, Willm Am Livingston, William P. Smith, John De-Hart, John Chetwood, Isaac Ogden, and Elias Boudinot, Esquires."—Am. Arch., vol. i, 403, 404.

Of this committee, Mr. Garritte was of Acquackanonk, Messrs. Riggs and Ogden were of Newark, and the remainder, two thirds, of Elizabeth Town.

The several county committees elected in accordance with these suggestions, and with a circular letter issued by the Essex committee, met at New Brunswick July 21, 1774, and appointed Stephen Crane to preside over their deliberations. They made choice of James Kinsey, William Livingston, John DeHart, Stephen Crane, and Richard Smith delegates to a General Congress. A standing Committee of Correspondence, ten in number (of whom two, William Peartree Smith, chairman, and John Chetwood were of Elizabeth Town), was appointed to look after the interests of the country.

The several county committees also "agreed to promote collections in their respective counties for the relief of such of the unhappy inhabitants of the town of Boston as may be now reduced to extremity and want." On the 28th of July, William Peartree Smith, as chairman of the Committee of Correspondence, addressed a letter of sympathy to the Boston Committee of Correspondence, asking them also to advise in what way their necessities could best be answered.¹

The results of the deliberations of the General Congress that met at Philadelphia in September and October being published, new energy was imparted to the people in their determination to resist the oppressive measures of the British ministry. The Essex County Committee of Correspondence issued a call for town-meetings to organize the respective towns for the more vigorous prosecution of the measures recommended by Congress. In compliance with this call, the freeholders of Elizabeth Town met at the court-house on Tuesday, Dec. 6, 1774, Stephen Crane, Esq., in the chair, when a large committee was chosen for the above-mentioned purpose, viz.: Jonathan Hampton, Matthias Williamson, Elias Dayton, Isaac Woodruff, William Barnett, William Herriman, Oliver Spencer, George Ross, Edward Thomas, Cornelius Hetfield, John Blanchard, Ephraim Tyrell, Abraham Clarke, Robert Ogden, Jr., Jeremiah Smith, Richard Townley, Jr., Samuel Shotwell, David Miller, Thomas Woodruff, John Clawson, Jonathan Dayton, Ephraim Marsh, Recompense Stanbury, Jedediah Swan, William Parsons, Samuel Potter, William Bott, Jonathan Williams, Christopher Marsh, Isaac Wynants, Daniel Halsey.

Stephen Crane, John De Hart, William Livingston, William P. Smith, Elias Boudinot, and John Chetwood, Esqs., were unanimously re-elected for the borough of Elizabeth on the Essex County Committee of Correspondence. It was then

"Voted, That two certain Pamphlets lately published, the one entitled 'A Friendly Address,' etc., and the other under the signature of 'A Farmer,' as containing many notorious falsehoods, evidently calculated to sow the seeds of dissension among the good people of America, grossly misrepresenting the principles of the present opposition to Parliamentary taxation, vilifying the late Congress, and intended to facilitate the scheme of the British Ministry for enslaving the Colonies, be publicly burnt, in detestation and abhorrence of such infamous publications.

"And the same were accordingly committed to the flames before the Court-House, with the universal approbation of a numerous concourse of people."²

² Am. Archives, 4th S., l. 1009-1010, 1012-1013. The former of these pamphlets was entitled "A Friendly Address to all Reasonable Americans, on the subject of our political confusions. In which the necessary consequences of violently opposing the King's troops and of a general non-importation, are fairly stated." Dr. Hawtkins attributes it to the Rev. Dr. T. B. Chandler, of Elizabeth Town, N. J., but erroneously. It was the production of the Rev. Myles Cooper, D.D., President of King's College, N. Y. Such was the popular indignation against him that his house was sacked, May 10, 1775, and he, barely escaping the hands of the mob, took refuge on board a ship of war, and fled to England. His Majesty gave him a pension of £200 per year. The latter pamphlet was entitled "Free thoughts on the proceedings of the Continental Congress

The Committee of Observation thus appointed were not idle. As the town had denounced the two pamphlets just mentioned, they called the attention of the people, Dec. 19, 1774, to the dangerous character of Rivington's Royal Gazetteer, published at New York, declared their determination individually to patronize it no longer, and called upon all the people to follow their example and banish it from their habitations. The article was signed by "Jonathan Hampton, Chairman."¹

This was followed, Feb. 13, 1775, by the following interdict:

"Whereas the inhabitants of Staten Island have manifested an unfriendly disposition towards the liberties of America, and among other things have neglected to join in the General Association proposed by the Continental Congress, and entered into by most of the Townships in America, and in no instance have acceded thereto, The Committee of Observation for this Town, taking the same into consideration, are of opinion that the inhabitants of their District ought, and by the aforesaid Association are bound, to break off all trade, commerce, dealings, and intercourse whatsoever with the inhabitants of said Island, until they shall join in the General Association aforesaid; and do Resolve that all trade, commerce, dealings, and intercourse whatsoever be suspended accordingly, which suspension is hereby notified and recommended to the inhabitants of this District to be by them universally observed and adopted.

"GEORGE ROSS, Clerk."²

A day or two afterwards an oyster-boat belonging to James Johnson, of Staten Island, came up the creek to the stone bridge, and the owner endeavored to make sale of his freight. But a pair of horses were speedily attached to the boat by the indignant people, and the poor craft was hauled up the street to the court-house. Johnson was advised by James Arnet to seek redress from Jonathan Hampton, chairman of the Committee of Observation, who was also a magistrate. Hampton was found in conference with Joseph Tooker at Samuel Smith's tavern, next to the court-house. Hampton gave him a protection, allowed him to sell his oysters, and in the evening, with his skiff, to return to the island.

Effect of the Battle of Lexington.—The first blood of the war was shed at Lexington, Mass., on Wednesday, April 19, 1775. News of the event reached New York on Sunday, the 23d, and the city rose in its strength to sustain the common cause. Indeed, the whole country was aroused within a very few days, as the tidings spread from East to West, and soon became known in every habitation throughout the colonies. This act put an end to all hope of further pacification. "It roused the sleepers; it fired the populace; it united the people as one man to resist unto blood the tyranny of the Lords and Commons of Britain. Loyalty was at a discount. The Tory faction, till then exultant and defiant, were palsied with dismay. The die was cast. Nothing remained now but the sword, and he who would not gird it on in his country's need was a traitor worse than Judas."

The excitement of the time, of course, took a deep hold in this locality, where there were many veteran patriots nurtured in conflict with oppression, and many a young man who saw that his hour had come for action.

Aaron Burr in his childhood was an Elizabeth Town boy. His mother's brother, Timothy, the eldest son of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, had married, Sept. 25, 1760, Rhoda, daughter of Robert Ogden, Esq., and granddaughter of Matthias Hatfield, Esq., of this town, "and made a home in Elizabeth Town for the family." Mr. Edwards resided here, highly respected and influential, from 1760 to 1771. Burr and his sister, left orphans in 1758, were received into their uncle Edwards' family, the former in his fifth year. Here the lad grew up, and was fitted for Princeton College under the instruction of Tapping Reeve, teacher of the grammar school, who soon after married Burr's sister. Mrs. Edwards was the sister of Matthias and Aaron Ogden, the latter being of Burr's age, and the former nearly two years older. They grew up together as children of the same family, and Matthias became Burr's bosom companion. In 1772 young Burr graduated, and in 1774 began to study law with his brother-in-law at Litchfield, Conn.³

In his retirement among the hills of Connecticut he heard the cry of Lexington, and immediately wrote to Ogden to come on and accompany him to the tented field. Ogden caught the infection, and rested not until he obtained his father's leave to go. He was then in his twenty-first year, and Burr a little more than nineteen. They were boys in years, but men in spirit, types of numerous others, their townsmen and associates, who panted to join the patriot army and fight their country's battles. Nothing could exceed the martial ardor that pervaded all classes of the community. It was not safe to breathe a word against the patriot cause.⁴

The Continental Congress were to meet at Philadelphia, May 10, 1775. As the delegates from Massachusetts, joined on their way by their brethren from Connecticut, drew near to New York, on Saturday, May 6th, they were met three miles from the city by a vast concourse of military and citizens, and escorted to their lodgings with ringing of bells and loud huzzas. On Monday, with a part of the delegation from New York, they were escorted to Newark, where held at Phila., 5 Sept. 1774, by A. Farmer." It was written by Isaac Wilkins, subsequently the Rev. Dr. Wilkins, of Westchester County, N. Y. He wrote also "The Congress Canvassed; or an Examination into the Conduct of the Delegates." It may have been this last to which the vote of censure refers. He too fled to England, in May, 1775, but returned the next year. N. Y. Col. Documents, viii, 297, 569, 581. Sabine's Loyalists, 1st Ed., pp. 692-705.

Three of President Edwards' children were married here: Timothy, his eldest son, as noticed above; Eunice was married here, January, 1764, to Thomas Pollock, and after his death, about 1780, to Robert Hunt, of this place; Pierpont married, May, 1769, Frances, the eldest daughter of Moses and Mary (Cozzens) Ogden, and sister of Nancy, the second and surviving wife of Col. Francis Barber, all of this town.

they dined; thence they "were escorted to Elizabeth Town, and on their way they were met by the gentlemen and militia of that place." Such was the enthusiasm of the people.¹

The Provincial Congress of New Jersey met at Trenton, May 23d. This town was represented by William Peartree Smith, John Stites, John Chetwood, Abraham Clark, and Elias Boudinot. Smith and Boudinot were sent to Philadelphia on the 25th to confer with Congress on some joint plan of action, and returned on the 30th.

The combat thickened. British reinforcements arrived at Boston. The cry "To Arms!" had brought together considerable numbers of patriot soldiers. Congress was loudly summoned to create an army. They assumed the charge of the New England recruits, and chose George Washington, June 15th, as general-in-chief of the Continental army. The effect of these measures was electric. Hope was invigorated, confidence inspired. The battle of Bunker Hill followed two days after, June 17th. That Americans would fight was no longer doubtful. That British regulars were not invincible was certain. The yeomanry took heart at once. The people everywhere flew to arms. Even cowards were brave.

Ammunition was greatly needed. But for this Bunker Hill would have been a greater triumph. Powder was in demand, in the army and everywhere. The committee of this town deeply interested themselves in procuring and furnishing the needed supply. On the 17th of July they forwarded, by way of Dobbs' Ferry, fifty-two quarter casks just received from Philadelphia. On the same day they

The whole stock of powder at Washington's command August 13th for the use of the army around Boston was about ninety barrels only, "not more than nine rounds a man;" they had "but thirty-two barrels in store." The destitution continued "a fortnight or more, till the Jersey Committee of Elizabeth Town, upon receiving the alarming news, sent on a few tons, which they were obliged to do with the greatest privacy, lest the fears of their own people, had it been known, should have stopt it for their own use in case of an emergency." On the 20th of August, Washington acknowledges the receipt of "six tons and a half of powder from the southward."³

At the same meeting of the committee, July 17th, the following action was taken:

"The chairman of this Committee having received a letter from Mr. Richard Lawrence, a Delegate of Richmond County for the Provincial Congress of the Colony of New York, informing that the inhabitants of said County had, in general, signed the Association recommended by the Committee of New York, this Committee are therefore of opinion that the inhabitants of said County be restored to their commercial privileges with the inhabitants of this town."⁴

The martial spirit that prevailed in the town may be seen from the following item:

"Elizabeth Town, October 4, 1775. Yesterday sixteen Companies of Foot, and one of Horse, belonging to this Borough, were reviewed on the Parade, went through their Military Exercises with Alertness and Regularity, and made a very handsome Appearance."⁵

The following pleasant incident occurred nearly two months later:

"Dec. 4, 1775. Wednesday evening last [Nov. 29], arrived at Newark, in their way to the Provincial Camp at Cambridge, the Lady of his Excellency General Washington, the Lady of Adjutant General Gates, John Custis, Esq., and his Lady and Warren Lewis, Esq.; They were escorted from Elizabeth Town by the Company of Light Horse, and most of the principal Gentlemen of that Borough. On Thursday morning they departed for Dobbs Ferry, escorted by a party of the Elizabeth Town Light Horse, and a great Number of Gentlemen and Ladies from Newark."

Mrs. Washington accomplished the whole distance from Virginia to Cambridge, Mass., in her own conveyance, "a chariot and four, with black postillions in scarlet and white liveries," traveling by easy stages.⁶

At the close of November, by order of Congress, a recruiting agency was established here, and the town was made the headquarters of the First New Jersey Regiment of regulars, under the command of William Alexander, (titular) Earl of Stirling. He had been for several years a resident of Basking Ridge, had recently been chosen colonel of a Somerset County militia regiment, and had carried many of them with him into the Continental service. He took care that all vessels coming from foreign countries to New York should (on account of restrictions laid on the commerce of that port by Capt. Hyde Parker, of the "Phoenix" man-of-war in the harbor) enter at Amboy or Elizabeth Town, and at the latter place if possible. Apprehensive, therefore, of a visit from some of the armed boats of the "Phoenix," he urged Congress, Dec. 19, 1775, to furnish the town with "an immediate supply of ammunition, and, if possible, half a dozen field-pieces, with some round, grape, and canister shot;" and soon after, Jan. 6, 1776, he wrote to the President of Congress,—

"I have the pleasure to inform you that several vessels with valuable cargoes from foreign ports have arrived in this Province, and, under the protection I have afforded them, have landed their cargoes. Among the rest are some hundred barrels of gunpowder."⁷

On the recommendation of Lord Stirling, William Barnet, Jr., was appointed by Congress surgeon of the First Jersey Battalion, and Matthias Halstead quartermaster. Four companies of the battalion were stationed here, such of them as could not be accommodated in the barracks finding quarters among the people. Some weeks elapsed before they were fully equipped.¹

An opportunity soon occurred for calling into requisition the martial ardor and energy of the town. The occurrence is related at length by Robert Ogden, Esq. (who had now succeeded Jonathan Hampton as chairman of the town committee), in a letter to John Hancock, President of Congress, dated E. Town, Feb. 10, 1776:

"Sir,—I am ordered by the Committee of Elizabeth Town to acquaint the Congress of the Capture and state of the ship 'Blue-Mountain-Valley,' now lying at Elizabeth-Town Point, and to desire particular directions from the Congress what is to be done with the said ship, cargo, officers, and seamen.

"On Monday, the 22d of January, between eleven and twelve o'clock, Lord Stirling, with about thirty men of his regiment, being near all that were then armed at this place, the rest being at Long Island,² set out for Amboy on a serious enterprise. In the evening of the same day an express arrived in this town with a letter directed to Lord Stirling, and, in his absence, to the Chairman of the Committee of this place, informing that an armed vessel, with a detachment of marines and seamen, was sent off from New York that day from the ships of war in New York, and to the transport ship.

"On the Chairman's receipt of this letter, he immediately called the Committee, which met about six o'clock in the evening, and from the letter and express collected and concluded that Lord Stirling left this place with an intention to procure a vessel at Amboy and go in quest of the transport-ship, which he then thought was in a defenseless condition, not knowing of the reinforcement sent from New York, and that if intelligence should reach him that night, he would not be able to procure vessels and assistance in season at Amboy to secure success, and might be repulsed with loss. On which the Committee resolved to send a detachment of one hundred volunteers in three or four boats, by the way of the Narrows, to take or assist Lord Stirling to take the armed vessel or transport of which they immediately notified Lord Stirling by an express, and to encourage volunteers to enter assured them they should share of the prize or prizes, according to the regulations that were or should be made by the Continental Congress. Volunteers were soon procured, and furnished by the Committee with ammunition, provision, and what arms were wanting, of the townsmen about eighty, and of the Continental troops about thirty. The Committee also procured three boats, and fitted them in the best manner the night and hurry would admit of. Between twelve and one o'clock at night the armament was ready to sail, but on account of the tide and ice³ they could not proceed by the way of the Narrows; they therefore set out with a fair wind by the way of Amboy, where they stopped, and called upon Lord Stirling, who, with a boat procured by him for the purpose, and about forty of his regiment, set out with them in quest of the ship and armed vessel. At sunrise from the mast-head they descried the ship at sea, stood for her, and boarded her without opposition at ten o'clock in the morning; they found her to be a transport from London, with coals, porter, potatoes, hogs, and horse-beans, designed for the Ministerial troops at Boston, commanded by John H. Denpatrick, brother to George Denpatrick, member of Parliament for Dundee, etc., in Scotland. But the armed vessel, by great good fortune, saved herself by returning to New York, not having discovered the ship, to the great disappointment of our people. Lord Stirling gave the command of the ship to Mr. Rogers, a sea-captain, with orders to proceed for this place, but being detained by tide and contrary winds on Wednesday near Amboy, the Committee being apprehensive of an attempt by the man-of-war to retake her, on Wednesday evening sent a reinforcement of about eighty men to secure her against any such attempt, and on Friday she arrived in safety at Elizabeth-Town Point, where she remained under the command of Lord Stirling, guarded by some of the troops under his command, until Tuesday last, when he and his troops were ordered to New York, since which time she hath been, and now is, under the care of the Committee. By order of Lord Stirling and the Committee, the porter and beans are stored, the sails and rigging are taken on shore. The potatoes, which are chiefly rotten, and coal remain on board the ship. The Captain and seamen remain prisoners at large in this town. The Committee expected Lord Stirling would have, before this time, procured the particular directions of the Congress for the disposition of the ship and cargo, but in this they are disappointed, and everything respecting the ship is in suspense. The hogs remaining being only seven (out of eighty) and the remaining potatoes they have concluded to sell. The coal is in great demand for making of arms, and is liable to be destroyed with the ship by an armed force which may be dispatched privately in the night from New York, which is but about fourteen miles' distance. The seamen, who are boarded out by the Committee, are uneasy and soliciting the Committee for their wages, which, they say, were promised by Lord Stirling. The Captain is anxious to know how long he is to be detained, and the Committee are desirous that he may be soon dismissed, and be at liberty to return home and inform his friends and countrymen of the usage he has received from the Americans. This, sir, is the state of affairs relating to the store-ship called the 'Blue-Mountain-Valley,' and brought to this place."

Appended to this statement is a list of the officers and crew,—a captain, three mates, a carpenter, a boat-swain, a steward, seven seamen, and two apprentices. Their bill for wages was £123 3s. 7d., of which £23 6s. 7d. had been paid.

The manifest is also given, dated Sept. 30, 1775, showing 107½ chaldrons of coal, 30 bundles of hoops, 100 butts of porter, branded "Calvert," 225 bags of beans, 156 sacks of potatoes, 10 casks sour-kROUT, 80 live hogs, and 35 empty puncheons for water, shipped by Mure, Son & Atkinson, of London, by order of the Right Hon. the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury. The vessel had sailed from London Oct. 13, 1775.

"The above is a true list, to the best of my knowledge and belief,

"ELIZABETH-TOWN, Feb. 9, 1776."

Several of the men whose names are included in this list afterwards became decided loyalists and some of them malignant Tories, but the vast majority of them continued true to their country, and several of them became highly distinguished for their military services. The names of a few are not familiar. These were of the Continentals from the back country.

In his "Life of Lord Stirling," Judge Duer gives the credit of this affair to Stirling, as having "planned and executed" the enterprise, overlooking the fact that the town committee undertook, of their own motion, without even a suggestion from Stirling, by far the heaviest part of the work. Lord Stirling's letter to Congress also, dated Jan. 24, 1776, is given incorrectly. It should read,—

"I immediately set out for Ansbay, and there seized a pilot-boat, and with forty men was just pushing out about two yesterday morning, when I was joined by three other boats from Elizabeth Town, with about forty men each, many of them gentlemen from Elizabeth Town, who voluntarily came on this service, under the command of Col. Dayton and Lieut. Col. Thomas."²

He describes the vessel as "a ship of about one hundred feet, from stem to stern above, capable of making a ship of war of twenty six-pounders and ten three-pounders."

On the Monday following, 29th, Lord Stirling's letters having been read in Congress, it was

"Resolved, That the alertness, activity, and good conduct of Lord Stirling, and the forwardness and spirit of the gentlemen and others from Elizabeth Town who voluntarily assisted him in taking the ship Blue-Mountain-Valley, were laudable and exemplary, and that his lordship be directed to secure the capture until the further order of Congress, and that in the mean time he cause such part of the lading as would otherwise perish to be disposed of by sale."³

Lord Stirling received orders from Gen. Lee, Feb. 4, 1776, to transfer his regiment to New York, and the next morning he marched, with the four companies stationed here, to the North River, and having been detained by the ice on the following day arrived at New York. On the 9th he received and transmitted from Congress the vote of thanks, and sent orders to Mr. John Blanchard to take charge of the cargo of the transport, with a request to Brig.-Gen. Livingston, and John DeHart, Esq., to aid him in the management of the affair. At the same time he took the opportunity of requesting Mr. Ogden to give his best thanks to the committee of Elizabeth Town for their readiness at all times to assist him in carrying on the service under his direction, and to the inhabitants in general for the many instances of confidence and friendship received from them.³

Finally the Provincial Congress of New Jersey ordered, March 2, 1776, the vessel and cargo to be confiscated, a commission to be appointed for the sale of the ship and its contents, and the proceeds to be distributed among the captors. John Blanchard excused himself, March 2d, from serving on the committee, because he was so much occupied in building a powder-mill, and on his recommendation his son Cornelius was, March 8th, appointed in his place.⁴

Col. Stirling having been appointed, March 1st, a brigadier-general, Robert Ogden wrote him, March 4th, a letter of congratulation, and took occasion to add,—

"There are many fire-arms lost, or at least at present missing, that were lent (by the inhabitants of the town) to furnish Capt. Meeker and the parties under him to assist your lordship in taking the ship 'Blue-Mountain-Valley.' He has been applied to for the arms, but says he knows nothing about them, who had them, nor where to be found. His ignorance and high temper makes it difficult to treat with him."⁵

Stirling wrote March 1st to Blanchard, authorizing him to deliver thirty-four chaldrons of the coal to Moses Ogden at the market price, Ogden having a contract with the government for iron-work. The remainder of the cargo, with the ship and its appurtenances, was sold at auction by order of the committee of Elizabeth Town, March 18th. A gratuity was allowed the seamen, who, with the officers, were set at liberty, and the proceeds of the sale were divided among the captors.

By order of the Provincial Congress, February 2d, Edward Thomas and Isaac Woodruff, barrack-masters, were authorized to dispose of at their estimated value, for the use of the Continental troop, the blankets belonging to the Elizabeth Town barracks. On the 3d, Abraham Ogden was appointed lieutenant-colonel, and William Barnet major of the regiment of light-horse in the eastern division of the State. On the 23d, Edward Thomas was appointed colonel, Jeremiah Smith lieutenant-colonel, and Oliver Spencer first major of the first regiment of Essex militia. On the 6th of March, Elias Dayton was appointed by Congress colonel, and Francis Barber major of the Third Battalion of New Jersey Continentals, and on the requisition of Lord Stirling, at New York, six thousand cartridges were furnished him by the Elizabeth Town committee.⁶

Gen. Clinton arrived at New York from Boston February 4th, in the ship of war "Mercury," in company with a transport brig with two hundred marines, on his way to the South. Shortly afterwards the vessels weighed anchor, and fell down to the watering-place near Staten Island. On the evening of Saturday, 10th, word was brought to this town that the marines were intending to make a raid on Staten Island and carry off the live-stock. Gen. Livingston, who had been put in charge on Stirling's transfer to New York, called out three hundred of the militia, sent out a part to reconnoitre the south side of the island, and marched with the troops at three in the morning. At Ward's, in sight of the light-house, they were joined by Capt. Blanchard and his company of light-horse. Learning here that the vessels had left Sandy Hook the day before, a squad under the command of Col. Edward Thomas were left to guard the coast, for fear of a feint, and the remainder were ordered home. The militia were highly commended for the alacrity with which they responded to the call of their commander on this occasion.¹

Owing to the commotions of the times, and the close connection of the town with New York, the place was visited by many strangers, some of whom rendered themselves liable to suspicion as unfriendly to the cause of the country. The committee of the town therefore represented the case, February 12th, to the Provincial Congress, then in session, who passed an ordinance requiring, among other things,

"That all suspected persons removing into the colony should be immediately returned to the place whence they came, unless their detention as delinquents should be proper, or unless they produced certificates from the committee of the precinct from which they came that they had signed the Association recommended by Congress, and had not subsequently contravened it."²

Thus, gradually but surely, the lines of demarcation between the patriots and the loyalists were becoming more and more distinct, and the people were compelled to show their colors as friends or foes to Congress and the country.

On the 14th, William Livingston and John De Hart, of this town, were re-elected by the Provincial Congress of New Jersey members of the General Congress, which had continued in session till this time.³

Fears were entertained that the British army at Boston were about to be transferred to New York, of which Lord Stirling received intimation, March 13th, from Gen. Washington. Stirling immediately called upon each of several adjacent counties in New Jersey to send forward immediately three or four hundred men to aid in fortifying the city and harbor. Lewis Ogden, chairman of the Newark Committee, replied on the 14th that they would send one hundred and fifty men: "We also sent a Deputation from our Board to the Committee at Elizabeth Town to inform them what we had done and request that they would furnish 150 more: they have agreed to do it."

Stephen Crane, who had succeeded Robert Ogden as chairman of the Elizabeth Town Committee, wrote to Stirling also on the 14th, to the effect that they had no right to send a detachment out of the province, urged the desperate state of the colony, and said,—

"The Arming the two battalions in the Continental Service hath drained us of our best Arms, and in case a Decent should be made at New York, we should be liable to continual excursions of the enemy."

William Burnet, chairman of the Essex County Committee, wrote on the 15th that a copy of Crane's letter had been sent to him, "from which we are afraid no men will come from Elizabeth Town; . . . however we shall Endeavour to prevail with them to furnish their quota, and hope we shall succeed." The next day he writes that "the confusion is owing to your writing to the Township and not the County Committee."

Two days after Stirling acknowledgés the services of Burnet and the Newark people, informs him of his intention to fortify East Jersey, and says,—

"I shall send to explain my designs to you and to engage the people of Elizabeth Town to carry them into execution, which according to my plan they will be able to do with two or Three hundred men in a few days. Some Entrenching tools will be necessary, and it will be proper to have them Collected as soon as possible at Newark or Elizabeth Town."

And so the men were kept at home to work on their own fortifications. Stirling knew the people too well to believe that they were wanting in patriotism. One of the staunchest patriots of the town, Abraham Clark, the signer, wrote to the Committee of Safety at this very time, March 15th, in reference to a resolution of the Provincial Congress calling for arms to equip a battalion for Canada: "If all the Congresses upon the Continent required us to disarm ourselves at present, unless we are deemed dangerous to liberty, I would not obey." The situation of the town was becoming exceedingly critical, and they needed to husband all their resources.⁴

Col. Dayton, in command of the Third Continental Regiment, stationed at Elizabeth Town, in the mean time had received, March 10th, orders from Stirling to put his regiment in marching trim. On the 14th he writes that "the companies of Cpts. Bloomfield, Dickinson, and Potter have passed muster," and that the others are nearly full. He refers to the scarcity of arms, and says, "The militia are now more than ever unwilling to part with their Arms;" and adds that he and Maj. Barber had been to Congress at Philadelphia about it, but without success. On the 23d he received orders to march forthwith to New York.⁵

In accordance with the intimations in the letter to Burnet, Lord Stirling came over on the 22d to this town, to survey the ground and lay out a line of fortifications at the Point. After conference with Gen. Livingston in relation to the plan, he returned to the city on the 24th, to procure engineers to be employed on these works under the direction of Gen. William Thompson.

Boston was evacuated by the British army March

17th, and as it was naturally inferred that they would make a vigorous effort to establish their headquarters at New York, the American army was, in the course of a few weeks, mostly transferred to this section of the country. Gen. Washington arrived and took command at New York on Saturday, April 13th. The work of erecting and strengthening fortifications at exposed points was renewed and carried on with great vigor.

The Provincial Congress of New Jersey, chosen on the fourth Monday in May, met at Burlington on the 10th of June; and John De Hart having been permitted to resign his seat in Congress, Abraham Clark, also of this town, who had served for some time as secretary of the New Jersey Committee of Safety, was chosen, June 22d, in his place. William Livingston, another member from this town, having been appointed commander-in-chief of the New Jersey militia, resigned his membership, and established his headquarters at Elizabeth Town Point, while his own family and others retired into less exposed portions of the country, in anticipation of the near approach of the British army and the full realities of war.

CHAPTER XII.

WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

THE decisive step in the progress of the events to be narrated in this chapter was the measure submitted to the General Congress June 7, 1776, by Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, to wit:

"That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved."

After full discussion this measure was adopted on the 4th of July, 1776. An eloquent writer, speaking of its adoption, says,—

"The die was now cast, the state of vassalage was terminated. The house of Hanover was dethroned, royalty was abolished. All dependence on Britain was abjured. A republic was inaugurated, a nation was born. The struggle ceased to be a civil war. Rebels were now patriots, the British were foreign foes. The war was henceforth to be waged by rival nations. Loyalists were now traitors, and to be treated as foes to their country. Neutrality could no longer be tolerated. King or Congress must rule. Sides must be taken; every man must be a friend or foe, for or against his country: he could not be neither."

ABRAHAM CLARK, whose name appears among the immortal signers of the Declaration, was a citizen of Elizabeth Town. Four days after the signatures were attached, on August 6th, he wrote the following, in a letter to Col. Elias Dayton, then on service at German Flats:

"As to my title, I know not yet whether it will be honourable or dishonourable; the issue of the war must settle it. Perhaps our Congress will be exalted on a high gallows. We were truly brought to the case of the three lepers. If we continued in the state we were in it was evident we must perish; if we declare Independence we might be saved, we could not perish. I assure you, sir, I see, I feel, the danger we are in. I am far from exulting in our imaginary happiness; nothing short of the almighty power of God can save us. It is not in our numbers, our union, nor valour I dare trust. I think an interposing Providence hath been evident in all the events that necessarily led us to what we are,—I mean independent States,—but for what purpose, whether to make us a great empire, or to make our ruin more complete, the issue only can determine."

While the representatives of the United Colonies were adopting this great measure at Philadelphia the British were gathering their military and naval forces at New York. Washington wrote from that city, June 29th, to Gen. Livingston, commanding at Elizabeth Town:

"I have received certain information from the Hook that about forty of the enemy's fleet have arrived there, and others are now in sight, and that there cannot be a doubt but the whole fleet will be in this day and to-morrow. I beg not a moment's time may be lost in sending forward such parts of the militia as Col. Reed shall mention. We are so very weak at this post that I must beg you to order the three companies which I mentioned in my last for Staten Island immediately to this city."¹

These ships were the British fleet from Halifax, under the command of Admiral Shulldham, with the British army under Gen. Howe, recently driven out of Boston, with six transports filled with Highlanders just sent over. Orders were immediately issued for the removal of the live-stock from Staten Island, and the people of Elizabeth Town were called upon to aid in this movement. Washington writes from New York, July 3d, to the President of Congress,—

"I am this minute informed by a gentleman that the Committee of Elizabeth Town sent their Company of Light Horse on Monday to effect it, and that some of their militia was to give their aid yesterday (Tuesday)." Heads that he was credibly told last night by part of the militia coming to this place that yesterday they saw a good deal of stock driving off the island and crossing to the Jerseys.²

We condense the following from Dr. Hatfield's "History of Elizabeth": "The Staten Islanders had made profession of patriotism, and so were allowed to resume trade with this town. The value of their professions may be seen from the report of Governor Tryon, of New York, to Lord George Germain, dated 'Duchess of Gordon, off Staten Island, 8th July, 1776':"

"General Howe disembarked the troops under his command on Staten Island the 2d Instant without opposition, on which occasion the inhabitants of the island came down to welcome the arrival of their deliverers, & have since afforded the army every supply & accumulation in their power. On Saturday last (6th) I received the militia of the Island at Richmond Town, where near four hundred appeared, who cheerfully, on my Recommendation, took the Oath of Allegiance & fidelity to his Majesty. To-morrow I am to have another muster for the enlistment of Volunteers to form a Provincial Corps for the defence of the Island."³

By this defection and the occupation of the island by the British, Elizabeth Town was brought into the very forefront of the field of conflict, and so continued throughout the war. Staten Island became thenceforward not only a British post, but a nest of Tories, and the common resort of the "Loyalists" in their flight from East Jersey.

The day after their landing the enemy made their appearance on the western shore of the island, opposite Elizabeth Town Point.

"As soon as the troops lauded (says a correspondent) they paraded the north shore, and on Wednesday morning (3d) made their appearance near Elizabeth-Town point: but the country being soon alarmed, they retreated, took up the floor of the drawbridge in the salt meadows, and immediately threw up some works. Their near approach to Elizabeth-Town point greatly alarmed the inhabitants of Essex county, and particularly the people of Elizabeth-Town and Newark; but they are now in a condition to receive them whenever they may think proper to approach. Two young men from Elizabeth-Town crossed the river in a canoe last Thursday (4th) and fired upon the regulars; but a number of them rushing out of the woods, they were obliged to retreat and cross the river again."¹

Livingston writes to Washington on the 4th that they had "Thrown up a couple of small breastworks on the causeway leading from the Point over the Salt Meadow. We have between four and five hundred at the Point who have thrown up a line from the Point House eastward to answer as a cover. We have two field-pieces, with a part of the Company of Artillery of this Province (Capt. N-ill's). He adds, Our men are raw and inexperienced, our officers mostly absent, want of discipline is inevitable, while we are greatly exposed for the distance of twelve or fourteen miles."²

He makes an urgent appeal for troops to defend the town against the disciplined troops on the island, from whom an invasion was constantly expected. Washington thereupon writes on the 5th to the President of Congress,—

"General Mercer arrived here on Tuesday, and the next morning was ordered to Paulus Hook to make some arrangements of the militia as they came in, and the best disposition he could to prevent the enemy's crossing from Staten Island if they should have any such views. The distressed situation of the inhabitants of Elizabeth Town and Newark has since induced me, upon their application, to give up all the militia from the Jerseys, except those engaged for six months. I am hopeful they will be able to repel any incursions that may be attempted."³

He writes to Livingston the next day, 6th,—

"Gen. Mercer has just set off for Jersey. In his experience and judgment you may repose great confidence. He will proceed to Amboy after conferring with you. You will please to keep me constantly informed of the proceedings of the enemy, and be assured of every assistance and attention."⁴

In the same letter he writes, in answer to one from Livingston of the same date, as follows:

"The known disaffection of the people of Amboy, and the treachery of those of Staten Island, who, after the fairest professions, have shown themselves our most inveterate enemies, have induced me to give directions that all persons of known enmity or doubtful character should be removed from places where they might enter into a correspondence with the enemy and aid them in their schemes. For this end Gen. Heald (of Woodbridge) has directions to apprehend such persons as from their conduct have shown themselves inimical, or whose situation, connections, or offices have given just cause of suspicion."⁵

This order had a very salutary effect, resulting in the apprehension of a considerable number of suspected persons in this town and vicinity, but more particularly in Amboy. Maj. Duyckinck, of the Middlesex militia, had arrested nine of the principal inhabitants of Amboy, and sent them here to Gen. Livingston, giving occasion to Livingston's letter to Washington.⁶

A Philadelphia paper of August 10th relates the following:

"On the late alarm at Elizabeth Town, when an immediate attack of the regulars was expected (July 3d), and every man capable of bearing arms was summoned to defend it, there were three or four young men (brothers) going out from one house, when an elderly lady, mother or grandmother to the young men, without betraying the least signs of timidity, with a resolute calmness, encouraged and assisted them to arm. When they were ready to go, and just setting out, she addressed them thus:

"My children, I have a few words to say to you: You are going out in a just cause to fight for the rights and liberties of your country. You have my blessing and prayers that God will protect and assist you. But if you fall, His will be done. Let me beg of you, my children, that if you fall it may be like men, and that your wounds may not be in your back parts."⁷

The two field-pieces of which mention has been made very soon gave a good account of themselves. Under date of July 4, 1776, twelve o'clock at night, it is said,—

"One of the enemy's armed sloops of fourteen guns having this evening run up near Elizabeth Point, was attacked from the shore with two twelve-pounders, a great number of her men killed, she set on fire and entirely destroyed."⁸

As this occurred just about the time that the Declaration of Independence was adopted by Congress, or within two or three hours of that event, it was probably the first military exploit of the new-born nation, and an auspicious omen of its career.

"About one hundred and thirty sail," as Washington informs Gen. Schuyler on the 11th, had now arrived from Halifax, and the British army on the island numbered "between nine and ten thousand." The next day several ships of the line arrived, and among them the admiral's ship, who had been daily expected. The utmost vigilance now became necessary, the more so as two British men-of-war had the same afternoon run up Hudson's River and taken possession of Tappan Bay. Livingston, in command of the militia here, and Mercer in charge of the Flying Camp at Amboy, kept their eye on the opposite shore of the Sound, and prevented all forging incursions from the enemy on the island. Livingston found himself very much in need of military stores. In a letter to the Provincial Congress, July 6th, he says,—

"The number of men that are now in the service here loudly call for more ample supplies of almost every necessary (except provisions) than can be obtained here, such as ammunition, flints, arms, and indeed stores of every kind, an attention to which I cannot give in the manner I could choose in the present exigency."⁹

The following incidents, taken from letters written in the camp at Elizabeth Town, show that the troops were kept continually on the alert:

"Last Wednesday noon [10th] a soldier belonging to one of the regiments on Staten Island, being in liquor, and having wandered from his companions, got upon the meadows near Elizabeth Town Point, which being observed by Col. Smith, who had the command that day at the Point, he sent over a party of men, who took him prisoner.

"Yesterday nine of our Riflemen crossed the river [Sound] in order to harass some Regulars who were throwing up a kind of breastwork on a bridge for their enemies, who kept firing on our men for some time without doing any execution, till one of the brave fellows went within a few yards of the enemy and desired them to surrender. At that instant he received a ball through his head, which killed him on the spot. The Colonel sent over a flag of truce to the commanding officer on the Island, desiring leave to bring off his man, which the officer very politely agreed to, and let him take man, rifle and all his accoutrements."¹

A few days before this Gen. Mercer had come on here from Amboy in order to surprise the enemy on Staten Island. He planned an invasion for the night of the 18th, purposing to cross the Sound from the mouth of Thompson's Creek, a little below the Point, to the Blazing Star. Maj. Knowlton was to head the Continental troops. The first division marched to the creek by nine o'clock in the evening. The Pennsylvania troops attached to the Flying Camp were to follow,—in all about thirteen hundred men. But the Pennsylvanians had marched that day from New Brunswick, and were completely exhausted on their arrival. A tremendous thunder-storm also came on, making it impracticable to cross the Sound, and the expedition was reluctantly abandoned.²

Abraham Clark, in the letter to Col. Dayton, August 6th, referred to above, in giving him local information, says of the militia,—

"They form a chain from Elizabeth Town Point, where strong works are erected at an amazing expense of labour, chiefly effected by our Militia before the Pennsylvanians arrived to their assistance. He adds: Elizabeth Town was in great contemplation upon General Howe's taking possession of the Island, but at present I believe they are very easy. I formerly informed you that Mrs. Dayton had sent the chief of her goods into Springfield. Many that moved away from Elizabeth Town have since returned.

"Our election for Council and Assembly, Sheriffs, &c., comes on next Tuesday in all the Counties of New Jersey. I now feel the want of you in Elizabeth Town. I sat down to consider to whom I might venture to write on politics, and have none that I dare speak plainly to. Had you or my much esteemed friend, Mr. Caldwell, been there, I should have been at a loss. I have none like-minded. I have friends, it is true, but none there now that I dare speak with freedom to."³

The war, brought thus to their very doors, had wrought a great change in the society of the town. A large number of the best men of the place had taken up arms either in the militia or in the service of Congress, and so were of uncertain residence. Intercourse between families had become much more reserved, as no one knew at what time he might be betrayed to the one or the other party nor which party might presently be in the ascendant. With the vast host of disciplined troops on Staten Island, the very flower of the British army, and daily increasing in numbers by the arrival of reinforcements, the Tories had great reason to expect to be shortly restored to their homes and estates, and in turn to vex and dispossess their patriot neighbors.

Notwithstanding the failure of Gen. Mercer's attempt to invade the island on the 18th of July, Washington wrote on the 27th that he was hoping still to "make some efforts to annoy them" from this direction. But on the 29th he informs Congress that

"By the advice of Gen. Mercer and other officers at Amboy it will be impracticable to do anything upon a large scale for want of craft, as the enemy have the entire command of the water all round the island. I have desired Gen. Mercer to have nine or ten flat-bottomed boats built at Newark Bay and Elizabeth Town, with a design principally to keep up the communication across Hackensack and Passaic Rivers."

The plan alluded to contemplated an attack from the Point with a force of three thousand nine hundred men, but boats could not be procured to transport half that number across the Sound, and so it was abandoned.⁴

The militia from Pennsylvania, attached to the Flying Camp and stationed at the Point and its vicinity, soon became so disaffected with the service that "many were daily returning home without orders," adding greatly to the gathering gloom that was settling over the town. It became necessary for Washington to make, August 8th, an earnest appeal to their patriotism in order to arrest the movement, representing to them "that the fate of our country depends, in all human probability, on the exertion of a few weeks."⁵

The First Battalion of Philadelphia and the Pennsylvania rifle battalions were at this time stationed in the town and at the Point. A writer at New York, August 26th, says, "Our people at Elizabeth-Town and the enemy on Staten Island cannonaded each other yesterday afternoon [Sunday], without doing any damage except disturbing the congregation."⁶

The foreign mercenaries from Waldeck, Hesse-Cassel, and Brunswick were now arriving by thousands, their numbers being greatly exaggerated in the reports that were alarmingly spread over the country. Governor Tryon wrote from Staten Island, August 14th, to Lord Germain,—

"The whole armament destined for this part of America, except the last division of the Hessians, being now assembled here, I expect, by the courage and strength of this noble Army, tyranny will be crushed and legal government restored. (15th Aug.) Yesterday evening, St Peter Parker brought into the Hook a Fleet of Twenty-five Sail from the Southward."⁷

These last were the forces that had been ineffectually employed against Charleston, S. C. They numbered three thousand troops, and were under the command of Lord Cornwallis.⁸

the night before, who had returned in safety and reported that twenty thousand men had embarked to make a descent on Long Island and ascend the Hudson; that fifteen thousand Hessians were to make at the same time a diversion at Bergen Point, Elizabeth Town, and Amboy. Owing to a terrific thunder-storm that came up the same evening the movement was postponed to Thursday morning, 22d, when nine thousand British soldiers under Sir Henry Clinton effected a landing at Gravesend, Long Island, without opposition. Others followed subsequently, and the disastrous battle of Long Island was fought at and near Flatbush on the 27th, compelling the American army to evacuate the island on the night of the 29th.¹

At this date and before the real nature of the disaster to the army was fully known to him, Livingston wrote to William Hooper, of North Carolina, in Congress, from the "Camp at Elizabeth Town Point," as follows:

"I removed my quarters from the town hither to be with the men, and to ensure them to discipline, which by my distance from the camp before, considering what several unwarlike officers we are ever like to have while they are in the appointment of the mobility, I found it impossible to induce. And the worst men (was there a degree above the superlative) would be still perjured by having been fellow-soldiers with that discipline-hating, good-living-loving, 'to eternal fame damn'd,' cock-combed crew we lately had here from Philadelphia. My ancient corporal fabric is almost rotting under the fatigue I have lately undergone, constantly rising at 2 o'clock in the morning to examine our lines, till daybreak, and from that time till eleven in giving orders, sending dispatches, and doing the proper business of quartermaster, colonel, commissary, and I know not what."²

The disastrous campaign on Long Island was followed by the abandonment, on the part of the American army, of the city of New York, on Sunday, September 15th, and its occupation by the British. A large portion of its inhabitants fled into the interior, and many of them into New Jersey, while the Tories of this section many of them made their way as speedily as possible to the captured city. More and more it was becoming doubtful whether the Whigs or Tories would prevail. It was in this gloomy period of apprehension that the following letter was written by the Hon. Robert Ogden, of this town, to his son-in-law, Maj. Francis Barber, in service with Col. Dayton at German Flats, N. Y.:

"ELIZABETH TOWN, Oct. 6, 1776, Sunday Even 8 o'clock.

"MY DEAR SON, MR. BARBER.

"Through divine good our family are all in the land of the living, and we still continue in the old habitation [on the Point Road] though almost surrounded by the regulars. They have long been on Staten Island, about a month on Long Island, three weeks had the possession of New York, which by the way is nearly one-fifth of the city burnt to the ground; who set it on fire is unknown, but the regulars charge it to the Whigs, and 'tis said have put several to death on that account, whether just or unjust the great day will decide."

He then gives some account of the battle of Long Island, and the battle near the Blue Bell; says that he has been sick, and adds,—

"Through divine goodness the fever has now left me, but in a continual hurry, having much more business than a man of my years ought to do, but don't at present know how to avoid it."

"In the beginning of my letter I told you we were almost surrounded—began at Staten Island, and led you round by Long Island, N. Y., and Blue Bell. But now come to a very serious part of the story, our troops yesterday evacuated Bergen, carried off the stores and artillery, moved off as many of the inhabitants as they could get away, drew the wheat and other grain together, and 50 men were left to set fire to it, and last night it was set on fire, the flames were soon here."

"Your mother³ still seems undetermined whether to stay here by the stuff or remove up to Sussex. A few days will determine her, but perhaps in a few days it may be too late to determine a matter of this importance. Your uncle David [Ogden] and mother's maxim is, 'They that live by faith won't die with fear.' It has been a sickly, dying time in this town for a month past. Stephen Crane has lost his wife [Aug. 17, 1776], Daniel Williams his, John Harris his, Benjamin Winans his, Timothy Woodruff his, Sister Ogden, Hannah Ogden [wife of David] has lost her son Samuel, Mr. Stubbs is dead, Mr. Noel,⁴ and last night [Oct. Dayton's father [Jonathan] died suddenly in his chair, beside a great many children. Also Aunt Betty. Mother Hatfield has been very sick, but is recovered. Robert is and has been very poorly this fall, and his wife and children are moved up to Morris Town, and most of our country are gone off. Matthias' wife [Hannah, daughter of Col. El as Dayton] and her granny Thompson are moved up to Springfield. Friends in general well. Hannah, his daughter, at 15] has been sick, but is got well, and is grown considerable this summer, lives at Dact. Caleb Hatfield's [his brother-in-law] with her aunt [Mary, wife of Job] Stockton. "Your mother has been lying for a month past—the old sore ankle—but the sore is now healed up. Maj. Morris Hatfield was taken prisoner on Montross's [Montross's] Island, and is sent down to New York to be cured of his wound, as he was shot through the cheek."

"It is said Maj. Hatfield fought valiantly, that he fired his musket 9 times, and the last account of him by our men was, a grenadier was coming up to him with bayonet fixed to run him through, and they saw the major fire, and the grenadier drop at his feet! I have now done with my story for this time, having wrote as I generally tell my stories, in a laudering, unconnected way. . . .

"Your mother joins me in tenderest affectionate regards to you, and all the family desire to be remembered to you and to all my friends."

"I am yours, affectionately,

"ROBERT OGDEN."

On the 31st of August Gen. Livingston was chosen the first Governor of the State of New Jersey. Presently after he resigned his military command and entered upon his executive duties. The command of the post at Elizabeth Town Point devolved upon his friend and townsman, Col. Matthias Williamson, who received a few days after from the Legislature a commission appointing him brigadier-general of the New Jersey militia.

On Tuesday, September 24th, four transports arrived at Elizabeth Town with four hundred and twenty American soldiers taken prisoners at Quebec the previous winter. They had been liberated on parole. From a representation made by Governor Livingston to Congress, it appears that while he was in command of this post so many prisoners were sent to him from the army that the town jail could not contain them, and he was obliged to send them to Millstone, Somerset County. In all its dire aspects the people of the town were brought to know by experience the intense excitements and the awful horrors of war. In the hospitals here eighty-two were reported, November 1st, as sick, of whom twenty-five were from Canada.⁵

Campaign Transferred to New Jersey.—The battle of White Plains was fought on the 28th of October; Fort Washington was taken on the 16th of November, and Fort Lee evacuated on the 18th. The campaign was now transferred to the soil of New Jersey. Washington, with the fragment of an army, reduced by the expiration of militia enlistments, and the consequent scattering of his forces to their homes, and utterly unable to obtain new recruits or levies, was compelled to retire before the vastly superior troops of the enemy. A slight diversion had been made by Gen. Williamson from the Point on Staten Island, Sunday, October 13th, but it amounted to nothing. The very next day Col. Slough's battalion of Pennsylvania Associators, which had been stationed here, was discharged to return home, with the thanks of the general for their decent and orderly behavior while at the Point and during the excursion of the day before. Thus in every quarter the patriot army was melting away.¹

In anticipation of the invasion of New Jersey by the enemy, Gen. Washington wrote from White Plains, November 7th, to Governor Livingston, urging the importance of placing the Jersey militia on the very best footing, and to forward him new recruits. He then adds,—

"The inhabitants contiguous to the water should be prepared to remove their stock, grain, effects, and carriages upon the earliest notice. If they are not so the calamities which they will suffer will be beyond all description, and the advantages derived by the enemy immensely great. They have treated all here without discrimination; the distinction of Whig and Tory has been lost in one general scene of ravage and desolation. The article of forage is of great importance to them, and not a blade should remain for their use. What cannot be removed with convenience should be consumed without the least hesitation."

He urges also that the barracks here, at Amboy, and at Brunswick be put in order "to cover our troops." He informs Congress, November 14th, that the army has left the other side of Hudson's River, and that he intends to quarter them at Brunswick, Amboy, Elizabeth Town, Newark, and Hackensack. Fort Washington had not then been taken.²

Gen. Williamson at once wrote, November 26th (on hearing of the capture of Forts Washington and Lee), to the brave and patriotic Col. Jacob Ford, Jr., of Morristown, in the most urgent terms:

"You are ordered to bring out all the militia in your county immediately, and march them down to Elizabeth Town, and see that each man is furnished with a gun, and all his accoutrements, blanket, and four days' provision, and when they arrive to join their respective companies and regiments."³

Washington had fallen back through Hackensack upon Aquackanonck, on the right bank of the Passaic River, November 21st, and the next day he fell down to Newark, where his army remained unmolested for six days. The interval was improved by the people of Newark and Elizabeth Town in removing their families and effects beyond the Newark Mountains and the Short Hills into the more inaccessible interior. The distress and consternation that prevailed all along the expected route of the two armies can better be conceived than described. It is not known that a record of it remains. On Thursday morning, November 28th, Washington with the wreck of his army, not more than three thousand five hundred in number, entered the almost deserted town by the old road from Newark, the advanced guard of Lord Cornwallis entering the latter town as the rear of the American army left it. Pushing on to secure an encampment on the right bank of the Raritan, so as to be ready to oppose any troops that might be sent by way of Staten Island to Amboy for cutting off his retreat, he reached New Brunswick on Friday, remaining there but two days, and then on Sunday, December 1st, he took up the line of march for Trenton, arriving there on Monday morning. Writing from Brunswick on Saturday, the 30th, he says,—

"From intelligence received this morning, one division of the enemy was advanced last night as far as Elizabeth Town, and some of their quarter-masters had proceeded about four or five miles on this side to provide barns for their accommodation. Other accounts say another division, composed of Hessians, are on the road through Springfield, and are reported to have reached that place last night."⁴

The people at Aquackanonck retarded the enemy by cutting down the bridge over the Passaic.

Col. Huntington writes, December 2d, from Ramapo to Col. Heath, that not more than a hundred of the enemy remained at Hackensack, and that their main body was at Elizabeth Town. A field-officer in the British army on the same day wrote to a friend in London,—

"The troops under Gen. Lord Cornwallis, after driving the rebels from Fort Lee, or Fort Constitution, in New Jersey, proceeded from Hackensack to Newark, and from Newark to Elizabeth Town, where they found great quantities of stores, among which are twenty tons of musket-bullets. The rebels continue flying before our army."⁵

On the approach of the enemy, Gen. Williamson, with the militia under his command, retired up the country. Writing from Brunswick on the 1st to Gov. Livingston, Washington says,—

"I have not, including Gen. Williamson's militia, more than four thousand men. I wrote to Gen. Williamson last night, and pressed him to exert himself; but I have reason to believe he has not the confidence of the people so much as could be wished."

Gen. Williamson writes from Morristown, December 8th, in defense of his apparent inefficiency, as follows:

"Very few of the counties of Essex and Bergen joined my command. I have it from good intelligence that many who bore the character of warm Whigs have been foremost in seeking protection from Gen. Howe and forsaking the American cause. Col. Thomas, of Essex County, is with us, but has no command of men. . . . I can declare before God I have worried myself to the heart in endeavoring to serve my country to the extent of my power. Gen. Mercer is knowing to many difficulties I labored under to keep the militia together while he had the command at Elizabethtown. Upon the whole, I am so entirely disabled from doing my duty in the brigade by my lameness that I have wrote to Governor Livingston to request his acceptance of my resignation."¹

The difficulties with which he had to contend were not exaggerated. The most disheartening was the defection of so many professed patriots. Washington wrote on the 5th to Congress,—

"By my last advices, the enemy are still at Brunswick; and the account adds that Gen. Howe was expected at Elizabeth Town with a reinforcement to erect the king's standard and demand a submission of this State."

The next day, 6th, he writes,—

"By a letter of the 14th ultimo from a Mr. Caldwell, a clergyman, and a staunch friend to the cause, who has fled from Elizabeth Town and taken refuge in the mountains about ten miles from hence [thence?], I am informed that General or Lord Howe was expected in that town to publish pardon and peace. His words are, 'I have not seen his proclamation, but can only say he gives sixty days of grace, and pardons from the Congress down to the Committee. No one man in the continent is to be denied his mercy.' In the language of this good man, 'The Lord deliver us from his mercy.'"²

The proclamation by the brothers Howe was issued on Saturday, November 30th, the day after the British occupation of this town. It commanded all persons who had taken up arms against his Majesty to disband and return home, and offered to all who should within sixty days subscribe a declaration that they would be peaceable subjects, neither taking up arms themselves nor encouraging others so to do, a free and full pardon for the past. Care was taken to give every possible publicity to this document, and means not always gentle were used to induce subscriptions.³

The people had witnessed but a day or two before to what a sad plight the army of Washington, "the grand army" that so recently confronted the British forces, was reduced as in tattered array it fled before the enemy to the Raritan. They were at that moment surrounded by the well-caparisoned troops of Cornwallis, whose squadrons were spreading themselves over the whole land, and, unresisted, occupying every town and hamlet. The patriot cause appeared to be utterly hopeless. It seemed impossible for Congress to retrieve the disasters that since the fatal field of Flatbush had come upon the country. The "Declaration of Independence" seemed now but an idle boast. It was regarded as certain that the authority of King George would soon be re-established in all the States. Such was the confident expectation and boasts of the loyalists at New York, on Long Island, on Staten Island, and in every place occupied by the British troops. Even the most sanguine of patriots spoke and wrote in the most despondent terms.⁴

In these circumstances it is scarcely to be wondered at that the artifice of Lord Howe and his brother met with very considerable success, as intimated in Gen. Williamson's letter. Dr. Ashbel Green observes,—

"I heard a man of some shrewdness once say that when the British troops overran the State of New Jersey, in the closing part of the year 1776, the whole population could have been bought for eighteen pence a head."⁵

The main body of the British army was pushed forward beyond the Raritan towards the Delaware. But a considerable detachment remained to occupy this post and to guard against any surprise from the militia of the interior. Gen. Charles Lee, with reinforcements for Washington, reached Chatham from Peekskill on the 8th of December, and on the 11th, from Morristown, wrote to Gen. Heath, on his way from Peekskill, that at Springfield, seven miles west of Elizabeth Town, . . . "about one thousand Militia are collected to watch the motions of the enemy." These were Col. Ford's troops. They were stationed at the Short Hills, just back of Springfield, from which point every movement of the enemy on the plains below could readily be seen. An eighteen-pounder was planted subsequently on the heights near the residence (in after-days) of Bishop Hobart, to give the alarm in case of the enemy's approach. A tar-barrel was fixed at the top of a lofty pole near by, to be set on fire when the alarm-gun was discharged. These could be heard and seen over a great extent of country.⁶

The Rev. Mr. Caldwell had found an asylum for himself and family at Turkey (New Providence), where he soon put himself in communication with Col. Ford. His experience the previous summer and autumn at the North as chaplain of Col. Dayton's regiment enabled him now to be of great service to his country. Hearing of the arrival of Gen. Lee, he wrote him on the 12th as follows:

"DEAR SIR,—I thank you for your favour from Baskingridge of this morning, and intended to do myself the honour to wait upon you, and set out for the purpose, but found my horse would not perform the journey with sufficient expedition, and cannot procure another horse. And indeed I find this the best place to observe the enemy's motions. From sundry persons who have been upon the road between Brunswick and Princeton, I learn the army has very generally marched forward; indeed, all except guards of the several posts. Yesterday they sent a reinforcement to Elizabeth Town from Amboy of near one thousand. Some say the whole at Elizabeth Town are about one thousand; others say fifteen hundred. They are carrying off the hay from Elizabeth Town to New York. . . . I believe Elizabeth Town is their strongest post, as they were afraid of our militia, who have taken off many of the most active Tories, made some prisoners, and among others shot their English forage-master, so that he is mortally or very illly wounded. A company of our militia went last night to Woodbridge, and brought off the drove of stock the enemy had collected there, consisting of about four hundred cattle and two hundred sheep. Most of these cattle are only fit for stock. . . . They are driven up the country to be out of the enemy's way."

"At a Council of the Field Officers this morning, a majority of them advised to remove the brigade of Militia back again to Chatham, for which they assign these reasons. Many of the Militia, rather fond of plunder and adventure, kept a continual scouting, which kept out so many detached parties that the body was weakened; and the enemy being now stronger at Elizabeth Town than they are, they thought they would better serve the cause by lying at Chatham till the expected army approaches for their support."⁷

The next morning, 13th, Gen. Lee was captured by a surprise party of the enemy.¹

Gen. Heath having reached Hackensack, wrote to Washington on the 15th, in respect to the enemy, "Several thousands landed at Elizabeth Town on yesterday or the day before." The movement of the troops under Lee and Heath and the posting of the militia under Ford at the Short Hills had not escaped the eye of Cornwallis. A portion of his forces, as appears from the following correspondence, were ordered to retrace their steps and look after these Americans. In the night of the 17th, Ford writes from Chatham to Heath by express, and says,—

"We have since sunset had a brush with the enemy, four miles below this, in which we have suffered, and our Militia much disheartened. They are all retreated to this place, and will, in all probability, be attacked by daybreak. The enemy, we have reason to believe, are double our numbers. If in your wisdom you can assist us, we may possibly beat them yet, but without your aid we can't stand. They are encamped (say one thousand British troops) at Springfield, and will be joined by four hundred and fifty Waldeckers from Elizabeth Town by the next morning's light."

The next day he again writes to Heath,—

"I have certain intelligence that the troops we engaged last night were General Leslie's brigade, who marched some few days since from Elizabeth Town to the southward. They received an order to counter-march to the same place. The brigade is in twelve to thirteen hundred strong, and the Waldeckers upwards of four hundred. At Spunktown [Radway], six miles to the southward of Elizabeth Town, there is five hundred British troops. This is all the enemy you have to combat in this country at present. We are not certain whether the enemy who attacked us have or have not yet returned to Elizabeth Town."²

Col. Symmes, in a sketch of Col. Oliver Spencer, of this town, gives a much more detailed account of this transaction:

"On the approach of Gen. Lesley's troops towards Springfield they were discovered by Maj. Spencer's videts stationed on the western road. Maj. Spencer instantly dispatched a light-horseman on full speed four miles to Chatham, to notify the Colonel commanding that the enemy in considerable force were within two miles of Springfield. The brigade were already under arms, and were ordered instantly to march towards Springfield to sustain Maj. Spencer; meantime the Major prudently abandoned Springfield, and retreated towards Chatham, he met the brigade at Briant's tavern. After Major Spencer had communicated to the Colonel commanding the position of the enemy then occupying Springfield, the brigade advanced to the attack. Capt. Brookfield, who commanded the flanking party on the left, made the first onset on the right of the enemy extending from the Church up the Vauxhall road. Capt. Seely, who commanded the flanking party on the right, made a warm attack upon the left of the enemy spread along the Westfield road. The centre of the enemy occupied the ground in front of and the main body behind Woodhuff's tavern. The Colonel commanding the militia, supported by Col. Lindsay on the left, and Maj. Spencer, who now commanded the Essex regiment, on the right, brought the centre of the brigade, retreating their fire until within pistol-shot of the enemy; the conflict continued about an hour, when the darkness forbade a longer contest at that time, and the firing seemed mutually to cease on both sides. On this occasion Major Spencer displayed by his conduct the calm but intrepid soldier; his horse was shot under him, when with a smile on his countenance and a pistol in each hand he came up to the Colonel commanding to inform him that he had been dismounted by the death of his horse. The brigade fell back that evening only one mile to Briant's tavern, struck up fires, and by all night on their arms, intending to make a second attack in the morning. But in the morning the enemy was not to be found; he had withdrawn in the night with all possible silence, taking off his dead and wounded in wagons. The militia pursued him to Westfield, but could not come up with him. This was the first instance in the State of New Jersey when the British troops turned their backs and fled from those they called rebels, and this success, small as the affair was, taught the Jersey militia that the foe was not invincible."³

Leslie's brigade entered Newark on the morning after the "brush." Col. Ford, four days afterwards, found his forces so much scattered that only about two hundred remained. Previous to this affair he had done good service, harassing the enemy, "surprising the guards, and taking their wagons, stores," etc. Ford was so much exposed and exhausted by this short campaign that soon after he was seized with peri-pneumonia, and died on the 11th, at Morristown, in the fortieth year of his age, eight days before his father, Col. Jacob Ford, Sr.⁴

Washington, learning that "about eight hundred militia had collected" near Morristown, sent, on the 20th of December, Gen. Maxwell "to take the command of them, and, if to be done, to harass and annoy the enemy in their quarters and cut off their convoys." Gen. McDougall was also detailed for the same purpose. The state of affairs the same day at Elizabeth Town is thus reported from Chatham:

"John Halsted left Elizabeth Town this morning at eight o'clock. Says there is no troops in Elizabeth Town but Waldeckers, the same that has been there for two weeks past. Says the drums beat this morning about daybreak, and he understood they were to have marched, but that they did not, and the reason why, as he understood, was the badness of the weather. Knows not which way they were to march, but it is said they were to have a little march out of town; that he thinks six or seven hundred British troops went through town the day before yesterday, near twelve o'clock, towards Newark, and that they have not as yet returned."⁵

On the morning of Thursday, the 26th of December, Washington surprised and captured nine hundred and eighteen Hessians at Trenton, parts of Anspach's, Rahl's, and Knyphausen's regiments, with the loss of only four wounded. This brilliant manoeuvre completely turned the tide of affairs. The British, who believed themselves masters of the country and scouted the idea of any opposition, were painfully roused from their reveries and began to be alarmed for their safety. The Americans, on the other hand, were electrified with delight and inspired with new life.

On the 30th, at Trenton, Washington wrote to Maxwell to collect as large a force as possible at Chatham, "and after gaining the proper intelligence, endeavor to strike a stroke upon Elizabeth Town or that neighborhood," instructions that Maxwell prepared at once to carry out.

Following up his advantages, Washington once more crossed the Delaware, passed around the British at Trenton, marched forward by night, surprised and captured Princeton on the morning of Jan. 3, 1777, and then took post for two or three days at Pluckemin, in Somerset County, a few miles below Basking Ridge, thus compelling the British commander to evacuate all his posts beyond New Brunswick, and provide, by a concentration of his forces, for the safety of his stores at the latter place. On Monday, the 6th, Washington removed to Morristown, to give his wearied troops some rest and to watch the panic-stricken foe.¹

Gen. Sir William Howe writes from New York, Jan. 5, 1777, that "Lord Cornwallis returned with his whole force to Brunswick, and the troops at the right being assembled at Elizabethtown, Maj.-Gen. Vaughan has that command."²

Taking advantage of the consternation of the enemy and the advance of the American army, Gen. Maxwell, with the militia under his command, came down from the Short Hills, compelled the British to evacuate Newark, had a brush with them at Springfield, drove them out of Elizabeth Town, and fought them at Spank Town (Rahway) a couple of hours. Of these movements a meagre record only is preserved. Washington writes to Congress on the 7th, from Morristown,—

"There have been two or three little skirmishes between their parties and some detachments of the militia, in which the latter have been successful and made a few prisoners. The most considerable was on Sunday morning [5th], when eight or ten Waldeckers were killed and wounded, and the remainder of the party, thirty-one or forty, made prisoners, with the officers, by a force not superior in number and without receiving the least damage."³

This was at Springfield. The troops were led by Maj. Oliver Spencer, and for his bravery on this occasion he was presently after promoted to a colonelcy. Three days later (8th) our forces recovered possession of this post:

"Philadelphia, Jan. 16, 1777. Our army marched from Pluckemio and arrived at Morris Town on the sixth. Gen. Maxwell, with a considerable body of Continental troops and militia, having marched towards Elizabeth Town, sent back for reinforcement, which having joined him, he advanced and took possession of the town, and made prisoners fifty Waldeckers and forty Highlanders, who were quartered there, and made prize of a schooner with baggage and some blankets on board. About the same time one thousand bushels of salt were secured by our troops at a place called Spank Town, about five miles from Woodbridge, where a party of our men attacked the enemy at that place; they sent for a reinforcement to Woodbridge, but the Hessians absolutely refused to march, having heard we were very numerous in that quarter. The English troops at Elizabeth Town would not suffer the Waldeckers to stand steady at the outpost, several of them having deserted and come over to us."⁴

Another account, dated Trenton, January 9th, says,—

"A regiment of British troops at Spank Town, six miles below Elizabeth Town, was attacked on Sunday by a party of Jersey militia; the encounter continued about two hours. Two regiments marched up from Woodbridge and Amboy to reinforce the enemy, and thus saved them."⁵

Still another account says, January 9th,—

"The enemy have abandoned Elizabeth Town. Our people have entered it and taken thirty Waldeckers and fifty Highlanders, and about thirty baggage waggons fully loaded. The enemy, who had all the Jerseys, are now only in possession of Amboy and Brunswick."⁶

Gen. Sir William Howe writes on the 17th from New York,—

"The enemy still continuing in force at Morris Town, and in that neighborhood, and receiving daily reinforcements from the eastern militia, Maj.-Gen. Vaughan, with the corps he had at Elizabeth Town, is removed to Amboy."⁶

In Congress, March 23, 1778, it was "Ordered, That a warrant issue on the treasurer in favor of James Norris for 1527⁹/₁₀₀ dollars, in full payment of his capture from the enemy on the 9th of January, 1777, at Elizabeth-town, in New Jersey, which was disposed of to the army of the United States."⁷

At this time occurred the following: It is related of Capt. Eliakim Littell, of this town, "a partisan of great merit," and of "remarkably fine and imposing personal appearance:"

"On the day that the British force abandoned Newark, which they had occupied as a garrison, and marched to Elizabeth Town, a company of Waldeckers was dispatched on some particular service towards the Connecticut Farms. Littell and his followers speedily discovered and followed them. Dividing his small force into two bodies, he placed one embush in the rear, and appearing in front with the other, demanded an immediate surrender. The Germans wished to re-engage, but meeting with the party expressly concealed to impede their retreat, and briskly assailed in front, surrendered without firing a gun. The British general, exasperated by their capture, ordered out a body of Hessians to revenge the affront; but the superior knowledge of Littell and his associates enabling them to post the enemy at various points with spirited attacks, without any great degree of exposure, they were also driven into a swamp and compelled to surrender to inferior numbers. Mortified beyond measure at this second discomfiture, a troop of horse were ordered out; but they in turn were routed, and were only more fortunate than those that preceded them by being able, by the rapid movement of their horses, to escape pursuit. A Tory, to whom a considerable reward was offered for the performance of the service, now led 300 men to the house of Capt. Littell, who, believing he was securely pent up within, commenced a heavy discharge of musketry upon it from all sides. The captain, however, was not to be so easily entrapped, and while they were making preparations to storm the deserted dwelling they were attacked in the rear, being previously joined by another body of volunteers, and driven with precipitation from the field. Littell in the interim, with a part of his force, had formed an ambuscade along a fence side, and perceiving the enemy slowly approaching, leveled and discharged his piece, and the commander fell. The British, unable, from the darkness of the night, to make any calculation with regard to the number of their opposers, were intimidated, and sought safety in flight."⁸

Some allowance should be made for rhetorical embellishments in these statements. The numbers, it is quite likely, are somewhat exaggerated. Yet this may be taken as a specimen of the kind of warfare that for several months at this period was prosecuted by the militia of this town and vicinity. At this period, it will be borne in mind, the town included nearly the whole of the present Union County, the towns of Union, Springfield, New Providence, Westfield, Plainfield, Rahway, Linden, and Clark, having since been organized out of the ancient territorial domain of Elizabeth Town.

When Mr. Caldwell and his people returned to their homes, the second week of January, 1777, from their exile of six weeks they found everything in ruins, their houses plundered, their fences broken down and consumed, their gardens laid waste, their fields an open common, and their records, both private and public, destroyed. The outrages committed by the ruthless foe, British and Hessian both, during this short occupation were a disgrace to human nature. Foremost among those who wreaked their vengeance upon the patriots were their former Tory neighbors. Many of these had a twelvemonth before consulted their own safety by taking refuge on Staten Island, and subsequently at New York. When the town was occupied, November 30th, by the British army the most of these Tories returned to their old homes, and took every opportunity to assert their importance, to retaliate upon the opposite party the injuries that they had endured, and to single out the Whigs as marks of brutal indignities and violence.¹

It was the deep sense of these grievous wrongs that roused the whole population against their brutal invaders, so that although Washington at Morristown found great difficulty in gathering an enlisted army, the British on the Raritan were so hemmed in that they could not obtain forage for their horses and cattle, and supplies for their army only at the point of the bayonet. Every foraging party venturing but a few miles into the country on either side of their lines was sure to be attacked by some partisan leader like Capt. Littell and his band, or by the brave Maxwell with his militia, and seldom returned to camp without loss. Washington says, January 20th, "Within a month past, in several engagements with the enemy, we have killed, wounded, and taken prisoners between two and three thousand men."²

The timid souls who had taken protection from the British general now found themselves in a position of great difficulty. Gen. Maxwell, the post commandant, in accordance with Gen. Washington's proclamation, required all who would not take the oath of allegiance to take themselves and their families off immediately to the enemy. They demanded the privilege of remaining till the thirty days were expired. Maxwell wrote for further instructions. Washington replied on the 12th of February as follows:

"These fellows at Elizabeth Town, as well as all others who wish to remain with us till the expiration of the thirty days, or for no other purpose than to convey intelligence to the enemy and poison our people's minds, must and shall be compelled to withdraw immediately within the enemy's lines; others who are hesitating which side to take, and behave friendly to us till they determine, must be treated with lenity. Such as go over to the enemy are not to take with them anything but their clothing and furniture. Their horses, cattle, and forage must be left behind. Such as incline to share our fate are to have every assistance afforded them that can be granted with safety. Neither wagons nor horses must be too much hazarded in doing this business. The effects of all persons in arms against us must be seized and secured."³

The lines were now effectually drawn, and every man was compelled to show his colors. The young men, or "fellows," as Washington calls them, most probably went over to the enemy, and became partisan soldiers of the most malignant type, spies, scouts, and guides to the British, inflicting subsequently no small injury upon their kindred and former friends. It was a hard case, as the line ran in some instances between parents and their children, as well as between brothers and sisters.⁴

The enemy had been driven out of the town on the 8th of January, but they remained still in the neighborhood. They occupied Perth Amboy, and ranged at will over the greater part of Woodbridge, separated from this town only by the Rahway River. The situation of the inhabitants, therefore, during the first half of the year 1777 was exciting enough. They lived continually in the midst of alarms. Gen. Sullivan was in command below the range of hills on the west, while Maxwell held the town. Their troops were continually moving from Chatham and Springfield, or from Westfield and Scotch Plains, watching for opportunities to cut off the foraging parties or pick up the scouts of the enemy. Skirmishes more or less severe were of almost daily occurrence.

Several actions took place in January, February, and March, just beyond the southern line of this town, a few miles only to the south, and in the most of them the soldiers of this post participated. The people here had their full share during this period of "the pomp and circumstance of war," and were not without considerable apprehension constantly of having the war brought once more to their very doors.⁵

The following notices are copied from a Tory journal:

"Last Thursday Week (February 27th), Major Tympany crossed from Staten Island to Elizabeth Town with about sixty men, when he was attacked by a Body of the Rebels, two or three of whom were killed on the spot, and four or five taken prisoners. The Major returned safe, without having a man hurt, and brought with him ten head of cattle.

"Last Friday (June 13th) a Party of about twelve Men went from Staten Island to Elizabeth Town Point, when they were fired upon by the Rebels, but they soon put them to flight, killed one and wounded three more, and brought off a new flat-bottomed Boat sufficient to hold a hundred men. By one of our People's Pieces going off through Carelessness, Peter Kingsland was shot in the Head, of which wound he died immediately."⁶

The campaign in East Jersey was brought to a close on the 30th of June. The British evacuated New Brunswick on Sunday, the 22d of June, retiring to Perth Amboy. On Thursday morning, 26th, they advanced in force from Amboy as far as Westfield, under the command of Sir William Howe and Lord

Cornwallis. On the way the advance of the latter fell in with Col. Daniel Morgan's corps of rangers at Woodbridge, with whom a hot contest was kept up for half an hour, at the expense of a considerable number of men. At Scotch Plains a severe engagement ensued with the troops under Lord Stirling, who were obliged, being greatly inferior in numbers, to fall back to the heights in the rear, with the loss of a few men and three cannon. At Westfield, perceiving the passes on the left of Washington's camp to be strongly guarded, and no prospect of getting into his rear, as was contemplated, the enemy encamped for the night after a burning hot day. Here they remained until three o'clock P.M. of Friday, when they marched to Rahway, closely followed and assailed in the rear and on the flanks by Scott's light-horse and Morgan's Rangers. The next day they returned to Amboy, still followed as on the previous day. Here they rested on the Sabbath, and the next day, Monday, June 30th, they left, a part crossing over to Staten Island on a bridge of boats, and another part embarking on board of two hundred and seventy transports which filled the harbor, and sailed away on the 23d of July.¹

Thus, after seven months' occupation and a vast expenditure of resources, after a vain attempt to penetrate to Philadelphia and to bring the war to a speedy end, the great army of invasion, having been for nearly six months restricted to the line of the Raritan River, was compelled wholly to evacuate the State, to the disgrace and chagrin of their leaders, and the bitter disappointment of the whole Tory faction.

Raids from Staten Island.—The enemy being still in force on Staten Island, it became necessary to be constantly on the watch and to keep up a competent force to patrol and guard every accessible avenue along the opposite Jersey shore. The "New Jersey Volunteers," or the refugees who had enlisted in the brigade of Gen. Cortlandt Skinner, were also on the island. A detachment of this brigade, consisting of sixty-three men, was under the command of Maj. Richard V. Stockton, a son-in-law of Joseph Hatfield, of Elizabeth Town. Stockton was captured at Lawrence's Island, Feb. 18, 1777. The refugees from Elizabeth Town were connected mostly with Skinner's brigade, and were, in the progress of the war, a source of great annoyance to their patriotic kinsmen and former neighbors.

The necessity of vigilance appears from such notices as the following, written Aug. 18, 1777 :

"Last Thursday Evening [14th] a Party of the New Jersey Volunteers went over to Cran's Ferry, near Elizabeth Town Point, and brought off three of the Militia without firing a Gun."²

Measures were devised by Col. Matthias Ogden, the officer in command at Elizabeth Town, in conjunction with Gen. Sullivan, who had been left by Washington in command of a Continental force beyond the Short Hills, to punish these renegade disturbers of the peace. Col. Dayton's regiment from Newark was called in to take part in the enterprise, with a hundred militia of the town. Sullivan selected from Smallwood's and De Borre's brigades one thousand men, and marched at two o'clock P.M. on Thursday, the 21st of August, from Hanovertown, fourteen miles, to Elizabeth Town, arriving in the evening, when they halted a short time for rest. At ten o'clock P.M. they moved down to Haledon's Point, near the mouth of Morse's Creek, where they crossed over to the island. Dayton and Ogden, with their commands, and Col. Field, with the militia, crossed at the Old Blazing Star. The New Jersey Volunteers were posted in small detachments along the shore of the island from Decker's Ferry to the point opposite Amboy, about fifteen miles. Ogden and Dayton fully and successfully carried out their part of the programme. Lieut.-Cols. Lawrence and Barton were captured, with one hundred and thirty privates, also a British shallop, in which the prisoners were sent over to this side. But Sullivan's command, having been deceived by their guide, lost heavily, in consequence of the rear detachments being disappointed in obtaining boats to return by the Old Star Ferry. These losses more than compensated the advantages obtained by Cols. Ogden and Dayton.³

Immediately after, Sullivan, with the troops under his command, was ordered to join the main army at Wilmington, Del. A small force only was left in this quarter to guard the long line of coast exposed to the depredations of the enemy.

An invasion of the State by Clinton at Elizabeth Town Point and other places, September 12th, showed the necessity of keeping here a large body of troops, to be ready for such emergencies. Gen. Dickinson writes to Washington from this town, Sept. 20th,—

"Your Excellency will be much surprised to hear that there are not more than one thousand of our militia now embodied, all of which are at this post. I shall order all the guards called in to-morrow, and march with the utmost expedition the routes directed. I have ordered General Wines to collect and march his brigade to this post with all despatch."⁴

Four days after, on Thursday, September 24th, a reinforcement of about three thousand British and foreign troops from Europe arrived at New York. Dickinson was then on his way to join Washington in the vicinity of Philadelphia; but this event compelled him to retrace his steps with a part of his troops, sending on the remainder, six hundred, in command of Gen. Forman, and once more take post at this town. Writing to Washington from this place November 1st, he informs him that there are not more than one hundred militia from West Jersey at this post, that the reports of his intended march to Red Bank on the Delaware had lessened the number of his troops, and that Gen. Winds, who had gone on an expedition to New Windsor on the North River, had not yet returned. He suggests an expedition against Staten Island, and says, "I have boats now ready to transport five hundred men at a time, and could increase my present numbers (about six hundred men) to twelve hundred men upon such an occasion."¹

The Americans at this time were in high spirits. Tidings had come nine or ten days before of Gates' victory, October 7th, at Stillwater, near Saratoga, and of the surrender of Burgoyne's army, October 17th. The news created a great and joyful excitement in this town; salutes were fired, bonfires kindled, and, as Rivington's lying chronicle reports, "rum was given to the rabble."²

Gaines says, Nov. 24, 1777,—

"We hear that orders have been sent to a Place called Westfield, a few miles from Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey, for the Inhabitants of that place to prepare Quarters for a large Body of Men, and to cut down five hundred Cords of Fire Wood. . . . On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday last (18-21) Parties of Rebels landed on Staten Island from Elizabeth Town, but were as often beaten off."³

These "Parties" were probably employed in this way to keep the enemy from learning the object of the encampment at Westfield. Dickinson, having obtained the consent of Washington, was preparing for an invasion of Staten Island. Volunteers were called in and a force gathered (with those on duty at this post) of fourteen hundred men. He designed, if possible, to surprise Skinner's corps of provincials, stationed along the western shore of the island, and capture them. For this purpose, early in the morning of Thursday, November 27th, he embarked at Halstead's Point, effected a landing in three divisions on the opposite shore, and marched seven miles to a rendezvous, hoping to get in the rear of the provincials and cut them off. The utmost secrecy had been observed, his own officers not having been apprised of the object until eight o'clock of the evening before. Skinner, however, got word of it at three o'clock in the morning and made good his retreat. On arriving at the rendezvous the Americans found Gen.

Campbell in force with artillery and two war vessels to cover the fortifications. Disappointed in his plans, Dickinson returned in good order, five or six of the Tory brigade having been slain and twenty-four taken prisoners. The troops were eight hours on the island. In the skirmish they lost three men taken prisoners, and fourteen were slightly wounded. With this exception, they got back "without the loss of man, horse, or boat."⁴

A few days before this occurrence (20th), Abraham Clark and Elias Boudinot were elected to Congress. Mr. Boudinot had served, since his appointment by Congress, June 6, 1777, as commissary-general of prisoners. This town thus became, during the greater part of the war, the headquarters for negotiations respecting the exchange of prisoners, and hither large numbers, officers and men, from both sides were sent for this purpose. Mr. Boudinot, however, continued in service until his successor, Maj. John Beatty, was appointed, May 28, 1778, and did not take his seat in Congress until July 7, 1778.⁵

Through the instigation and artifices principally of the refugees, some of their old neighbors and associates, who still retained their residence and property in the town, were induced to carry on an illicit trade with Staten Island, of which Governor Livingston, who had been re-elected November 1st, writing to Washington, Nov. 21, 1777, uses this forcible and indignant language:

"This evil, instead of being checked, has grown to so enormous a height that the enemy, as I am informed, is plentifully supplied with fresh provisions, and such a quantity of British manufactures brought back in exchange as to enable the persons concerned to set up shops to retail them. The people are outrageous, and many of our officers threaten to resign their commissions."⁶

This traffic was called "London trading," and all who engaged in it were regarded as enemies of their country, and when discovered subjected to severe penalties. It was carried on mostly by night, and so secretly as almost always to evade detection. The possession of British gold was looked upon as prima facie evidence of complicity in the contraband business.

The extent to which private property in the town, especially in the absence of the owners, had suffered by military occupation appears from what one of Governor Livingston's daughters wrote, Nov. 29, 1777:

"Kate has been at Eliz.-Town; found our house in a most ruinous situation. Gen. Dickinson had stationed a captain with his artillery company in it, and after that it was kept for a bullock's guard. Kate waited on the general, and he ordered the troops removed the next day, but then the mischief was done; every thing is carried off that mamma had collected for her accommodation, so that it is impossible for her to go down to have the grapes and other things secured; the very hinges, locks, and panes of glass are taken away."⁷

The year 1778 was unusually barren of incident so far as the history of this town is concerned. The people were permitted to dwell at home, undisturbed by the visits of the hated and dreaded foe. The military occupation was continued throughout the year, and the utmost vigilance was required in guarding against invasion from Staten Island. During a portion of the winter one-half of the male adults were required to be always on duty, and ready at a moment's warning to take the field.¹

It was reported in New York, June 3, 1778, that "great numbers of flat-bottomed boats" were then building and old ones repairing at Bound Brook, Elizabeth Town, and Newark, in New Jersey. A few days after Gaines published the following:

"The Rebels made an attempt on the Piquet Guard on Staten Island last Tuesday night (June 9th), but were baffled off, the Particulars of which are as follows, viz.:

"About one o'clock the Rebels began a heavy Cannonade from their Works at Elizabeth Town Fort, and soon after attempted to land in a number of Flat Boats upon Staten Island, between the Blazing Star and Burnt Island; but finding the Provincial Troops stationed at that Place were alarmed and prepared to give them a proper Reception, they returned to the Jersey shore and remained quiet till about four o'clock the same Morning, when they again made their Appearance in ten Boats, each supposed to contain one hundred Men, and attempted to land at the same Place under cover of the Fire from their Batteries, and a continued Discharge of Small Arms from the Boats; but they were so vigorously opposed by General Skinner's Brigade, that they were obliged to make a final and disgraceful Retreat."²

The New Jersey Gazette gives an entirely different version of the affair in reply to Gaines' article. The ten boats with a hundred men in each dwindle down to three boats with about fifty men; but one landing was made or attempted; they marched half a mile into the interior, when they were discovered, on which they fired and the provincials ran away. The party then returned to their boats, and when they had nearly reached this side were fired upon. So conflicting were the statements in respect to these incursions it is often perplexing to arrive at the exact truth.³

Occasional encounters with the enemy were occurring, of which the following, as related by a Tory paper of the 29th, is a specimen:

"Last Wednesday Night (24th), Captain Randle, from Elizabeth Town, came over to Staten Island with a Party of about fourteen Men and fired upon some of the militia that were on Guard, wounded Mr. Richard Connor in the Arm, and one Ashlar Tappen in the Leg, but neither dangerously. The Militia pursued the Party, but they got into their Boat in a great Hurry, and made for the Jersey shore with all expedition."⁴

The next Sunday, 28th, the battle of Monmouth was fought, in which the Jersey Brigade under Maxwell and the militia under Dickinson did signal service, having previously been detached to annoy the rear and flanks of the British on their route through New Jersey. In this action Lieut.-Col. Barber (who had received the appointment in April of brigade inspector, and on the 24th of March had been married "to Miss Nancy Ogden, of Elizabeth Town, a Lady of beauty and merit") was wounded by a musket-ball, which passed through the right of his body, but, happily, not mortally. The British after their defeat made good their escape by Sandy Hook on the 5th of July, whence they were distributed in three divisions, one on Staten Island, one on Long Island, and the other in New York.

The presence of so large a force on Staten Island compelled Washington, in the arrangement of his forces, to order the Jersey Brigade under Gen. Maxwell "to take post in the neighborhood of Elizabeth Town," to guard against invasion and foraging.⁵

Again this post became headquarters for flag-boats and exchanges. A large number of prisoners had been captured from the British on their route through the State. "Thursday last," 16th, says Rivington, "upwards of seven hundred Rebel prisoners were sent from here [New York] to Elizabeth Town, to be exchanged for an equal number of British and Hessians." A corresponding notice appears on the 15th in the New Jersey Gazette, also on the 21st of August, 20th of October, and 8th of November. Col. Ethan Allen was sent here in May previously for the same purpose.⁶

A corporal and a private who had ventured over to Staten Island from this post were captured July 21st; and by way of reprisal, a party from this town went over to the island on the night of the 5th of August, and carried off Mr. Bunnell, barrack-master, who was released on parole four days afterwards.⁷

Measures long contemplated, but for prudential reasons deferred, were now taken looking to the confiscation of the property of those who had deserted their country and espoused the cause of the Royalists. Several had gone over during the spring and summer of 1778. The following advertisement was not made public until November 14th, on which day it was dated at Elizabeth Town:

"At an inferior court of Common Pleas held for the county of Essex, on the 15th day of September last, were returned inquisitions for joining the army of the King of Great Britain, and other treasonable practices, found against Cavilear Jewitt, Ichabod Best Barret, William Luce, John Smith Hetfield, Job Hetfield, Abel Hetfield, Broughton Reynolds, Richard Miller, John Willis, Jacob Tooker, James Hetfield, James Frazee, Samuel Oliver, James Moore, Jonathan Oliver, Samuel Smith, John Stites, Jun., Daniel Moore, John Morse, Isaac Stanbury, Thomas Burrows, and John Folker."

At a later date, Feb. 17, 1779, final judgment was entered against all of these persons except Job and Abel Hetfield, Jacob Tooker, and John Stites, Jr., and their estates sold at auction.⁸

Gaines says, October 5th,—

"We learn that the Militia of New Jersey was collecting fast, there being in and about Elizabeth Town and Woodbridge not less than two thousand Men under the command of General Maxwell.

"Last Friday (24) a large Body of Militia and some Continental Troops marched from Woodbridge, Elizabeth Town, &c., under the command of the Generals Maxwell and Heard for Hackinsack."¹

These movements were occasioned by a feint of the enemy and an invasion of Bergen County. Lord Stirling at Aquackanonk on the 13th sends word to Col. Elias Dayton that "the moving off of the British troops enables him to order Col. Dayton with his two regiments to march to Elizabeth Town the next morning." Two days afterwards, on the 15th, Lord Stirling himself repaired to this town, and made it his headquarters for the remainder of the year.²

The following order was issued Oct. 28, 1778:

"No Flag from the enemy shall be received at any post or place within this State, except at Elizabeth Town Point, without a special permission for that purpose from the Governor or commanding officer of the troops of the United States in New Jersey."³

On this subject Washington says, Jan. 11, 1779,—

"It was absolutely necessary that the open and free intercourse with New York which I found prevailing on my arrival at Elizabeth Town, the 1st of December, should be restrained, and I gave positive orders to Gen. Maxwell to suffer no person to pass unless permission should be previously obtained from the Governors of the respective States, or myself, and I requested Governors Livingston and Reed to fix on the first day of every month for this purpose, to which they readily acceded."⁴

In his reply to this request of Washington, Livingston says, December 21st,—

"Of all those who have applied to me for recommendations to the commanding officer at Elizabeth Town to go to Staten Island or New York, not above one in twenty appeared entitled to that indulgence, and many of them were as venacious Tories as any in this country. It is either from a vain curiosity (extremely predominant in women), cloaked with the pretence of securing their debts or effects, in which they seldom if ever succeed, or for the sake of buying tea and trinkets (for which they would as soon forfeit a second Paradise, as Eve did the first, for the forbidden fruit), that they are perpetually prompted to those idle rambles. . . . The men are still more seriously mischievous, and go with commercial motives, and to secure capital quantities of British merchandise."⁵

Livingston had again been chosen, October 27th, Governor of the State, greatly to the annoyance of the loyalists, who regarded him as an incorrigible rebel. James Humphreys, Jr., writing from New York, Nov. 23, 1778, to Galloway, in London, says,—

"Livingston is reappointed Governor of New Jersey, and more wantonly pursuing his career of barbarity and wickedness than ever."⁶

Isaac Ogden, a refugee from Newark, writing also to Galloway from New York the day before (22d), says,—

"Livingston is re-elected Governor, an attempt was intended to be made to supersede him, but the dissenting Parsons getting knowledge of it exerted themselves in such a manner that his opponents were deter'd from making the Experiment. You know the Man, & will with Me pity the poor People that fall under his displeasure."

Most cordially was the Governor hated by every Tory in the State, and with still greater cordiality, if possible, was he loved and trusted by every friend of the country. His well-known connection with the Presbyterian Church of this town accounts for the story about "the dissenting Parsons." In the same letter Ogden speaks of this town and its vicinity as "a Rebellious country,"—a good testimony this to the patriotism of the town. In closing the letter he introduces some family allusions:

"Remember me to Doctor's Chandler and Cooper. Tell Doct. Chandler that Mrs. Chandler & his Daughter Polly with Miss Ricketts, are now in York with a Flag for a few days. His son Bille I saw last week, at Staten Island, who has recovered from his Illness, he intends sailing for England in a short time in the Amazon."⁷

In arranging the winter-quarters of the army, Gen. Washington made choice of Middlebrook (Bound Brook), Somerset Co., N. J., for his own headquarters with seven brigades, detailing the Jersey Brigade to occupy Elizabeth Town, as the advanced post of the army. This brought him, on the 1st of December, to this town, where he remained until the morning of the 5th. In honor of his visit a festive entertainment was given him on the 4th.⁸

Attempt to Capture Livingston's and Maxwell's Brigades.—A practical illustration of the fear and hatred entertained by the British, and especially the Tories, towards Governor Livingston was given near the close of the winter of 1779–80. A plan was devised by the authorities at New York to surprise and capture both Governor Livingston's and Maxwell's brigades at this post. "The Thirty-third and Forty-second Regiments, with the light company of the Guards, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Stirling," about one thousand in number, were detailed for this purpose. They embarked at Red Hook, L. I., at nine o'clock P.M. of the 24th of February, 1779, crossed the bay to the Bergen shore, landed, and marched overland to Newark Bay, when they re-embarked, the boats having passed around through the Kills. They landed between two and three o'clock A.M. of the 25th on the salt meadows about a mile north of Crane's Ferry. Having obtained Capt. William Luce, Cornelius Hatfield, Jr., and John Smith Hatfield (who had gone over to the British in 1778) as guides, the Forty-second Regiment advanced immediately, and gained the upland. The remainder of the force through a misunderstanding waited at the place of landing for further orders. Col. Stirling, impatient for their appearance, came to a halt after he had got well up towards Woodruff's Farms, and sent back one of the guides to order them forward.

Dr. Chandler, he was obliged to fly in Jan., 1776—that he returned in Dec., following, but on the Royal army evacuating Elizabeth Town in Jan., 1777, he was again obliged to fly—that Brig. Gen. Skinner granted him a warrant to be captain in the New Jersey Volunteers in the April following, that he has not received any pay for two years, and prays his Lordship's recommendation to Sir Henry Clinton for a captain's commission in the New Jersey Brigade." The officer in command declined to receive the order from the lips of the guide, who thereupon returned to Stirling for an official order. In this blundering they lost about an hour and a half.

Col. Stirling, in order to gain fuller intelligence as to the state of affairs in the town, sent one of the guides with six soldiers to capture one of the residents. They came to the house of Mr. Hendricks, and questioned him in respect to the troops, some of the soldiers in the mean time entering the house of Mr. Woodruff, directly opposite, and beginning to plunder. Mr. Woodruff made good his escape, and gave the information to Col. Ogden, the officer of the day. Gen. Maxwell immediately called the troops to arms, and marched them to the rear of the town, whither also the principal part of the inhabitants retired, uncertain as to the number and designs of the enemy.

A detachment was sent with one of the guides the shortest route to "Liberty Hall," the residence of Governor Livingston, to apprehend him. The Governor, happily, had left home some hours before, and was passing the night at a friend's house a few miles distant. It was falsely reported by the enemy that he had left his bed only five minutes before his house was surrounded. The house, of course, was searched in vain for his person. His papers were demanded of his eldest daughter, who had sufficient presence of mind to lead them into the library, and show them a drawer filled with intercepted letters from London, taken in a British vessel, a part of which they pocketed, and then carried off the remainder with the drawer itself. All his recent correspondence with Congress, Washington, and the State officers was in a box in the parlor, which was saved by this artifice.

In the mean time the main body of the enemy proceeded directly to the rear of the town, and had every road guarded except the Rahway road, by which several of the inhabitants escaped before the guard could reach it. The barracks and the Presbyterian parsonage, then used as barracks, were found deserted, and in the rage of their disappointment the enemy set them on fire and they were burned down. The school-house, or academy, adjoining the Presbyterian burying-ground, had been used for storing provisions for the troops. This also they fired and destroyed. While it was burning a few of the female neighbors, of whom Mrs. Egbert was one, rescued from the ruins twenty-six barrels of flour. A blacksmith's shop also was burned. They boasted also that they burned "the ferry-house of Stephen Crane," of which, however, the people themselves made no mention.

As soon as the light enabled Maxwell to ascertain the force and positions of the enemy he set his troops in motion and Col. Stirling beat a retreat. The militia both of this town and Newark took the alarm, and assembled with great alacrity. Cols. Dayton, Ogden, and Barber conducted the pursuit. Abandoning the horses and cattle which they had collected the enemy retreated as they came by the way of the salt marsh, usually regarded as quite inaccessible. Some skirmishing ensued, but the well-directed fire of two pieces of artillery greatly quickened their steps. After wading a considerable distance in mud and mire, they reached their boats, and re-embarked under the cover of a galley and two or three gunboats, not a little galled by the fire poured in upon them from the shore. One of their boats grounded, and with the hands on board was captured.

The enemy acknowledged that from four to six of their number were slain and about forty were wounded. They took with them about a score of the elderly men of the place, but soon after restored them to their homes. Brigade-Major Ogden, who first reconnoitred the enemy, received a bayonet-wound in his right side, but not dangerous. Lieut. Reucastle also was wounded and four privates; one man, a private, was killed. Chaplain Andrew Hunter, on his return from the Governor's house, whither he had hastened to give the alarm, was captured, but soon after made his escape. The invasion, save in the burning of the barracks, the parsonage, and the academy (a procedure worthy of a savage foe), was a complete failure, a signal blunder.¹

Four or five weeks after this occurrence Governor Livingston addressed a note, March 29th, to Gen. Sir Henry Clinton, informing him that he was "possessed of the most authentic proofs" that one of his general officers had "offered a large sum of money to an inhabitant of this State to assassinate" him—the Governor—"in case he could not take" him "alive." Ephraim Marsh, Jr., of this town, had deposited before Isaac Woodruff, Esq., that Cortlandt Skinner had offered him a reward of two thousand guineas and a pension for life for such an exploit. A reply, very curt and impertinent, was received from Sir Henry, to which the Governor returned a withering rejoinder.²

Depreciated Currency and Hard Times.—The immense depreciation of the Continental currency began to be seriously felt among all classes of the community, but especially among the soldiers of the patriot army whose families were in any measure depending on their wages. The Jersey Brigade, under Maxwell, stationed at Elizabeth Town, sent an affecting memorial of their distressed condition for want of adequate compensation to the Legislature. Gen. Maxwell also urged their case, and called attention to the necessity of sending out of the lines the Tories who were seeking every opportunity to induce the soldiers to desert. He instanced the cases of Cpts. Kennedy and McCloud at large on their parole and yet in the pay of the enemy, "licensed spies in our very lines, among our troops." He then adds,—

"Mrs. Chandler is much in the same way here that McCloud is, with respect to her living, but in the way of giving intelligence to the enemy I think her the first in the place. There is not a Tory that passes in or out of New York or any other way that is of consequence but what waits on Mrs. Chandler, and mostly all the British officers going in or out on parole or exchange wait on her; in short, the Governor (William Franklin, the whole of the Tories, and many of the Whigs. I think she would be much better in New York, and to take her baggage with her that she might have nothing to come back for. Lawyer Ross and some other noted Tories here I would recommend to be sent some distance back in the country. . . . There wants a thorough reform here."¹

A gratuity of two hundred pounds to each commissioned officer and forty dollars to each private was ordered by the Legislature, the money immediately forwarded to Elizabeth Town, and the brigade soon after took up their line of march for the Susquehanna. So many of the officers and men of the brigade were residents of this town, and so long had they been on service at this post during the war, that the people of the town took the deepest interest in everything pertaining to their welfare. It was their own right arm of defense.²

Washington removed his headquarters from Middlebrook the first week in June, and soon after took post at New Windsor, on the North River. In consequence, as the regular troops that usually kept watch of Staten Island were on their way to the Indian country, the eastern coast of this town was considerably exposed. Col. Neilson, a vigilant officer, was left here with a small corps, which with the militia, ready to be called out on any emergency, was thought sufficient for the time being. Col. Frederick Frelinghuysen at a later date was appointed to the command of the State regiment, with his headquarters at this post.³

Removal of Tories and Refugees.—The refugees on Staten Island took advantage of the reduction of the forces here and renewed their predatory excursions. On the night of Saturday, June 12th, Cornelius Hatfield, Jr., with five other "loyal refugees," as Gaines calls them, crossed over the Sound to Lieut. John Haviland's house, which they effectually plundered of its contents, and seizing Haviland and the captain of one of the guard-boats, whom they had also surprised, they returned with them in safety to the island. A few nights after, Friday, 18th, the same party, with other Tories and several British soldiers, repeated the experiment and landed at Halstead's Point.

"From whence they stole up in small parties amongst their friends, where, probably, they obtained full information of the strength and situation of our guard at Halsted's house, which they attacked about daylight in the morning. The guard being vigilant escaped (except one man killed) and gave the alarm to the town; the villains in the mean time plundered the house of almost everything portable, took off his riding-chair, and made Mr. Halsted a prisoner, who, however, had the address to take advantage of the surprise these British worthies were thrown into by the firing of a single gun and made his escape from them; had they stayed a few minutes longer they would probably have paid dear for their presumption, as it was they had two men wounded, one of them mortally."⁴

To these troubles was added, at midsummer, June 20th, a panic respecting the negroes of the town:

"On Sunday night last it was discovered that the negroes had it in contemplation to rise and murder the inhabitants of Elizabeth Town. Many of them are secured in gaol."⁵

This conspiracy was of course attributed to the Tories, and with the plundering incursions had the effect to quicken the Court of Common Pleas in finding, July 6th, inquisitions and entering judgment in favor of the State against the following fugitives and offenders, viz.:

"Isaac Mills, John Stiles, jun., George Marshall, James Frazee, jun., Ichabod Oliver, Thomas Bradbury Chandler, John Stone, Robert Gault, Joseph Marsh, John Ackley, Cornelius Hatfield, jun., Oliver De Launcey, and John Lee, Jr. in the County of Essex. (It is added) Notice is hereby given that all the real estates that lately belonged to the above fugitives within the bounds of Elizabeth Town will be sold at public vendue on Monday, the sixteenth day of August next, at the house of Samuel Smith, book-keeper, in Elizabeth Town aforesaid, or on the premises, and also that part of the estate late the property of Cavalier Jonet, that was sold to a certain Nathaniel Hubbell (son of Rev.), unless the said Hubbell appears and pays the purchase-money for the same before the day of sale."⁶

The representations of Gen. Maxwell in respect to the removal of Tories from the State were not without effect:

"A motion was made at Elizabeth Town last Thursday (12th of August, says Gaines) to remove all the suspected persons from that place, agreeable to a law lately passed in that province; but the motion could not be carried, it being strongly opposed by Governor Livingston, who said it was impolitic to the highest degree, and that it would only increase the number of their enemies."⁷

At the convening of the Legislature, Oct. 27, 1779, Livingston was the fourth time elected Governor of the State. Great efforts had been made by means of the press and otherwise on the part of his enemies to prevent his re-election. They could command in the Legislature, however, only nine of the thirty-eight votes. The result was highly gratifying to his patriotic townsmen, and all the true patriots throughout the State.⁸

Severe Winter of 1780.—With the commencement of the winter the main body of the army under Washington took up their quarters at Morristown. It proved to be one of the severest winters on record. The cold set in early, and storm succeeded storm, piling up the snow in every direction, until Jan. 3, 1780, when one of the most terrific storms ever remembered set in, from which the army suffered dreadfully. The snow covered the earth to the depth of from four to six feet, the roads were everywhere obstructed, and almost nothing could be had for the sustenance of the troops. Washington was compelled to resort to forced requisitions on the several counties of the State. Col. Matthias Ogden was appointed to collect the cattle and grain required of the county of Essex. The State, to its honor be it spoken, though so greatly impoverished by a four years' war, came nobly to the rescue. The crisis was firmly met and safely passed; the army was fed and furnished.¹

The extraordinary severity of the cold and its steadiness closed up the rivers, the Sound, Newark Bay, and even the harbor of New York. The isolation of the city and the island existed no longer. The ice, even in the bay of New York, was of such solidity that an army with all its artillery and baggage could cross with greater facility than on the firm earth. The authorities at New York were full of apprehension, and took measures to concentrate their forces in case of an attack. Extraordinary vigilance was called for on both sides of the line.²

As the troops had now received their needed supplies, and a portion of them might be favorably employed in an attempt on Staten Island, Gen. William Irvine, who had been sent down some time before with a detachment to this post, was instructed to obtain information "of the enemy's strength, corps, situation, and works" on Staten Island; to ascertain the state of the ice at Halstead's Point and at the Blazing Star Ferry, and to act in concert with Col. Dayton in making the necessary preparations. Great caution was to be used in keeping the design secret. A large number of sleds or sleighs—several hundred—were procured, with all the necessary ammunition, rations, tools, guns, and spare shoes. Various detachments were called in and detailed for the service, amounting to about two thousand five hundred men, all to rendezvous in this town in the evening of Friday, the 14th.³

The expedition was put under the command of Lord Stirling, and it was designed to capture, if possible, the entire force of the enemy on the island, supposed to be about twelve hundred men. It was believed that the communication by water with the city was cut off. The expedition set off in good order early in the morning of Saturday, the 15th. They crossed safely on the ice at De Hart's Point to Mercereau's dockyard. At the forks of the Blazing Star road they divided, one column proceeding by Dougan's Mills, and the other by the back road towards the watering-place (Tompkinsville). Lieut.-Col. Willet was detached to surprise Buskirk and his force of two hundred provincials at Decker's Ferry. But the enemy had obtained early intelligence of the invasion, and on all sides retired to their works. The two columns effected a junction on the heights above the works at the same time. They found the enemy strongly fortified, and intrenched also behind an abatis of snow about ten feet in height. Communication by water with the city also they found to be open. After fully reconnoitering the position and remaining overnight, they retired about sunrise the next morning, making good their retreat, and arriving at De Hart's Point about eleven o'clock A.M. At Decker's Ferry they captured and destroyed nine sailing vessels. They took eight or ten prisoners, and received several deserters. One of the enemy was slain, as were three of their own men. Many of the men also were frost-bitten, and all suffered considerably from the severity of the cold, the snow being three or four feet deep.⁴

Taking advantage of this opportunity a number of worthless characters followed the troops to the island and committed various depredations upon the people, Rivington says to the extent of ten thousand dollars. Washington had given strict orders not to allow anything of the kind. After their return from the island, Lord Stirling reclaimed the property as far as possible, and issued orders that whoever had been guilty of plundering should restore what they had thus taken to the Rev. Mr. Caldwell, that it might be sent back to the owners.⁵

This expedition had the effect to increase the vigilance of the enemy, whose number in garrison was thereupon doubled, while, on the other hand, the forces on this side, disheartened by their failure, suffered a relaxation of both vigilance and enterprise. Preparations were accordingly made by the enemy for retaliatory raids on this town and Newark on the night of Tuesday, Jan. 25, 1780, and in both cases they succeeded. The New Jersey Journal of the 27th makes the following statements:

"A party of the enemy, consisting of about three hundred infantry, under the command of Col. Van Buskirk, of the new levies, and about sixty dragoons, said to be under the command of Capt. Steward, of the Seventeenth Light Dragoons, with several refugees, the whole in number nearly four hundred, crossed on the ice from Staten Island to Trembly's Point, about three miles from Elizabeth Town, last Tuesday night. From thence they were conducted by Cornelius Hetfield, Joh Hetfield, and Smith Hetfield, their principal guides, the nearest and must retired route to Elizabeth Town. They entered the town in two divisions before the alarm was sounded. As soon as the troops that were in town (consisting of about sixty men) perceived their danger they retreated; however they took a major, who was commandant of the place, and two or three captains that lodged in town that night, and a few troops. They then set fire to the Presbyterian Meeting- and court-house, which were consumed; plundered, insulted, and took off some of the inhabitants, and retreated with great precipitation by the way of De Hart's Point, whose house they likewise consumed."⁶

"A gentleman at Elizabeth Town," in a letter written on the 29th, an extract from which was published in the New Jersey Gazette, says,—

"The enemy paid us a visit here last Tuesday evening; they were in town between ten and eleven o'clock, under the command of Lieut.-Col.

Buskirk, of the new levies. The plan was well concerted, and as well executed; they evaded our guards, and were in town before any one knew it. They have taken forty or fifty privates and several officers, with ten or twelve of the inhabitants. Maj. Williamson and Capt. Gifford fell into their hands. Mr. Belcher Smith [son of William Peartree Smith] in attempting to escape was likewise taken. They burnt the Presbyterian Church and the court-house, plundered Jecaniah Smith, but no other houses of any consequence, as they were afraid to enter them, and stayed but a little time before they pushed off.¹

Rivington, in his paper of January 29th, gives the British version of the affair:

"On Tuesday night, the 25th inst., the rebel posts at Elizabeth Town were completely surprised and carried off by different detachments of the king's troops. Lieut.-Col. Buskirk's detachment, consisting of about 120 men from the 1st and 4th battalions of Brig.-Gen. Skinner's brigade, with 12 dragoons under the command of Lieut. Stuart, moved from Staten Island early in the night, and got into Elizabeth Town without being discovered between the hours of 10 and 11. With little resistance they made prisoners 2 majors, 3 captains, and 47 privates, among whom were 5 dragoons, with their horses, arms, and accoutrements. Few of the rebels were killed, but several were wounded by the dragoons, though they afterwards escaped.

"The services were performed without loss. The following are the names of some of the rebel officers brought to town on Thursday last . . . from Elizabeth Town: Maj. Eccles, of the 5th Maryland Regiment; Col. Belt, of the 4th Regiment, from Prince George Co.; Mr. B. Smith, son of Peartree Smith; Maj. Williamson and his brother."²

Rivington's statement as to the persons and the strength of the detachment engaged in this retaliatory foray is probably to be accepted as at least semi-official. Abraham Buskirk, according to Gaines' Register for 1781, was lieutenant-colonel commandant of the Fourth Battalion of New Jersey Volunteers, or Tories, under the command of Brig.-Gen. Cortlandt Skinner, Esq. Neal Stewart was a lieutenant of Col. Bayard's Orange Rangers. The guides were natives of the town, familiar with all the roads and all the residents of the place.³

Washington speaks of the event, two days after, as "the late misfortune and disgrace at Elizabeth Town." Not less than two thousand men, under Col. Moses Hazen, were stationed that night along the shore of the frozen waters from Paulus Hook to Amboy, in small detachments, one of which, sixty only in number, under Maj. Eccles, was detailed for this important post.⁴

"The court-house" was "a small frame, shingle-covered building, which had never been adorned with paint, and in the same condition and style of architecture was the adjacent building, the Presbyterian meeting-house, both of which respectively occupied the ground whereon now stand the structures devoted to the same objects." Such is the description of these buildings as given by the late Capt. William C. De Hart. They were among the oldest and most venerable buildings of the town. The church was ornamented by a steeple, surmounted by a ball and weathercock, furnished also with a clock. It was the most conspicuous and the most valued building in the town, hallowed as the structure in which their pilgrim fathers had worshiped God, in which they themselves, so many of them, had been consecrated to God in baptism, and in which the great and revered Dickinson, the honored Spencer, and the still more renowned Whitefield had preached God's word.⁵

The destruction of these buildings is by common consent attributed to Cornelius Hatfield, Jr., whose venerable parents, Col. Cornelius and Abigail, were among the most excellent and honored members of the Presbyterian Church, and most thoroughly patriotic. The father had been a trustee, and was then an elder of the church. The mother died on the 27th of April, in the year following, in the seventieth year of her age, greatly lamented. The renegade son was a man of great energy of character, and of commanding influence among the refugees. During the previous two years he had resided on Staten Island, continually watching opportunities to molest and capture his former friends and neighbors.⁶

As the son had destroyed their church edifice, so the father opened the doors of a large "Red Store-house" that belonged to him, which was fitted up for the purpose, and used thenceforward as a meeting-house. It was on the other and most populous side of the creek, on the east side of Cherry Street, near West Water Street, and nearly opposite Capt. De Hart's house. It was afterwards removed to the opposite side of the road, rebuilt and occupied by Mr. Edward Price.⁷

As soon as Washington heard of the affair he dispatched Maj.-Gen. Arthur St. Clair, January 27th, to investigate the causes of the disaster, to guard against future inroads of the kind, and to ascertain the practicability of a retaliation, at the same time to take command of all the forces below the Hills. On Friday, the 28th, St. Clair reports from Crane's Mill as follows:

"I arrived at Col. Hazen's Quarters the night before last, and yesterday with him visited the several posts, which I found to be Rahway, Crane's Mills, Connecticut Farms, Elizabeth Town, and Newark. Elizabeth Town and Newark are occupied by small detachments only, and guards are posted at De Hart's and Halstead Points. A small guard is also kept at the New Blazing Star from the post at Rahway. . . . In Elizabeth Town I find a four days' guard, consisting of one hundred men, with a Field Officer. This I reduced to a Captain and fifty, to be relieved daily. . . . The guards at De Hart's and Halstead Points are certainly much exposed."

Notwithstanding these precautions, another foray was made on Sunday evening, 30th of January, which is thus described in a Tory paper:

"Last Sunday evening a party, consisting of thirteen mounted refugees, went from Staten Island, and [at Rahway] in the vicinity of Elizabeth Town, New Jersey, surprised Mr. Wyantz, a lieutenant of the rebel militia, and eight private men of Colonel Jacques' regiment [that had been on a party of pleasure with some young ladies]. Few Republicans on this continent are more remarkable for their implacable opposition to his Majesty's government than some of these prisoners; they were all the same evening securely lodged on Staten Island. They were found at a fandango or merry-making with a party of ladies, who became planet struck at the sudden separation from their Damosels. The further trophies of this successful excursion are three handsome sleighs with ten good horses, all of which were yesterday driven to New York over the ice from Staten Island, an enterprise never yet attempted since the first settlement of this country."¹

The ice blockade continuing, the Tories took another ride into Jersey on the 10th of February with similar results:

"On Thursday night last the enemy, under the command of Generale Stirling and Skinner, visited Elizabeth Town entirely upon a plundering party. Among other houses they plundered Doctor Barnet's, Messrs. William P. Smith, William Herriman, Matthias Halsted, and Doctor Wyantz, the two former in a most barbarous manner. The house of Mr. Smith they searched throughout for Mr. Elisha Boudinot, who they thought was concealed there, but fortunately both he and Mr. Smith lodged out of town. After terrifying the women and children, they heroically marched off with their plunder and five or six prisoners."²

The horrors of that dreadful winter could not be forgotten by that generation. The condition of the people in their almost defenseless exposure to the barbarian incursions of the rapacious foe was deplorable in the extreme. But the more they suffered for their country's cause the more fixed and deep-rooted was their determination never again to submit to the now more than ever hated rule of the cruel and haughty Briton.

It is surprising that any of the people should have continued, in these circumstances, to reside on the borders of the Sound, especially when it was everywhere frozen over, and could be crossed over in perfect safety by the refugee marauders. So long as this natural bridge lasted these incursions continued. The following statement, made on Wednesday, March 29th, shows what was now of not infrequent occurrence:

"Last Friday night [24th] some villains from Staten Island came over to Elizabeth Town and carried off Matthias Halstead, Esq., a worthy citizen."³

Even after the departure of the ice these forays were repeated. On the 26th of April a record is made as follows:

"A party of the enemy from Staten Island, consisting of about thirty men, attempted to surprise, last Sunday night [23d], a small guard at Halstead's Point, but through the alertness of the sentinels (one of which they killed) their plan was effectually marred. They plundered

Mr. Halstead of beds and bedding, the family's wearing apparel, and seven or eight head of creatures."

Thus passed in alarm and terror the ever memorable winter of 1779-80, memorable for the severity of the season, and for the devastation made by the merciless foe.

CHAPTER XV.

Knyphausen's Invasion.—Early in the spring of 1780, Gen. Knyphausen, then chief in command of the British forces at New York, began to make vigorous preparation for the invasion of New Jersey, with the view of driving out the patriot army. The following report of the inception of the movement was made by Governor Robertson, of New York, to Lord Germain:

"On the 6th of June we sailed with as many troops as could safely be spared from the defense of this province—6000—to Staten Island; from thence we landed our advanced guard the same night at Elizabeth Town, where they waited the landing of a second embarkation by the return of the boats. These Boats moved on, with orders to try to surprise Maxwell's brigade of Jersey troops, stationed near to the road we marched by, to endeavor to get possession of the strong post at Short Hills, to wait there the arrival of the third embarkation of the army, from whence if our intelligence should show circumstances favorable it was intended to march directly with the whole against Washington, who had been sending his stores from Morristown, but was still incumbered there with a great many."⁴

The Coldstream Guards, under the command of Gen. Edward Matthew, sailing down the bay disembarked at Staten Island, where they were joined by other troops, regulars and provincials. Here they were formed into three divisions, the first under command of Brig.-Gen. Stirling, the second under Brig.-Gen. Matthew, the third, comprising the Coldstream Guards and others, under Maj.-Gen. Tryon, the whole under the general command of Maj.-Gen. Knyphausen. As soon as formed they marched forward to the landing opposite Elizabeth Town Point, arriving in the night and unobserved. The first division crossed the Sound in flat-boats, and landed on the meadows near the Point, where they halted until in like manner the second and third, with the light artillery, had crossed before day. Early on Wednesday morning the whole force were in motion. Stirling, being the youngest general, led the advance.

In the mean time word was brought to Col. Dayton, of the Jersey Brigade, that the British were at the Point. Having reconnoitred the position he stationed a guard of twelve men at the eastern terminus of Water Street (now Elizabeth Avenue), where the two roads leading to the Old and New Points diverge, with orders to arrest the advance of the foe as long as practicable and then retire. Dayton hastened back to the town and mustered his troops as quickly as possible, to be ready for the emergency and fall back if outnumbered.

As the enemy came marching forward at the break of day, Gen. Stirling at the head of his division, the guards at the forks of the road allowed them to approach within musket-shot, when they fired and fled to town. One of the balls unhorsed Stirling and fractured his thigh. The whole column was thus brought to a halt until the wounded general could be cared for. Knyphausen now placed himself at the head of the division, and just as the sun was rising upon the earth the squadron in advance entered the town, passing up Water Street (Elizabeth Avenue) and so into Broad Street.

"An eye-witness of the passage of the troops through the village describes it as one of the most beautiful sights he ever beheld. In the van marched a squadron of dragoons of Simcoe's regiment, known as the 'Queen's Rangers,' with drawn swords and glittering helmets, mounted on very large and beautiful horses, then followed the infantry, composed of Hessians and English troops, the whole body amounting to nearly six thousand men, and every man, horseman and foot, clad in new uniforms, complete in panoply and gorgeous with lustrous brass and polished steel."¹

Passing from Broad into Jersey Street, the columns of the enemy on their way to the Short Hills and Washington's camp were led by the guides along the most frequented way, known as the Galloping Hill road, which leaving the Westfield road on the line of the present Central Railroad, at the extreme west point of the town as now bounded, and running northwesterly enters the village of Union or "Connecticut Farms" south of the Presbyterian Church. In passing through the town the troops were kept in perfect order, committing no deeds of violence.

As soon as it was known that the foe had landed word was sent as quickly as possible to Prospect Hill in the rear of Springfield, when the eighteen-pounder signal-gun and the tar-barrel on the signal-pole were fired, and the whole country on both sides of the mountain was roused. Instantly the drums in the camp at Morristown beat to arms, and Washington and his troops marched with all speed to the post of danger. The militia in every direction seized their firelocks, swords, or whatever weapon was at hand, hastened to their respective mustering-places, and were soon proceeding by companies to the field of action. The whole town, from the Sound to the Passaic, with all its villages, from Springfield to Rahway, was thoroughly aroused and preparing to resist and drive back the invading foe. Col. Dayton and that portion of the Jersey Brigade that was stationed in and about the old town made good their retreat from the superior numbers of the enemy, and effected a junction with the other portions of the brigade under Gen. Maxwell at Connecticut Farms. On the way up they were joined by militiamen, and with increasing numbers kept up a continual skirmishing.

On the rising ground just beyond the west branch of Elizabeth River, and about a quarter of a mile southeast of the Farms' Church, a stand was made by a party of the militia, about sixty in number, armed only with muskets, who succeeded in giving a temporary check to the column. Maxwell, with his brigade and some of the militia, took post on the high ground beyond the Farms' village, where they not only brought the enemy to a halt, but drove back their advance a short distance, annoying them considerably by their firing.

Writing from the "Jersey Camp, near Springfield, 14th June, 1780," to Governor Livingston, Maxwell says,—

"I thought Elizabeth Town would be an improper place for me. I therefore retired toward Connecticut Farms, where Col. Dayton joined me with his regiment. I ordered a few small parties to defend the defile near the Farm Meeting-House, where they were joined and assisted in the defense by some small bodies of militia. The main body of the brigade had to watch the enemy on the road leading to the right and left toward Springfield, that they might not cut off our communication with his Excellency General Washington. Our parties of Continental troops and militia at the defile performed wonders. After stopping the advance of the enemy near three hours, they crossed over the defile and drove them to the tavern that was Jeremiah Smith's; but the enemy were at that time reinforced with at least 1500 men, and our people were driven in their turn over the defile and obliged to quit it. I, with the whole brigade and militia, was forced to attack them shortly after they had crossed the defile, but it was too imprudent, as the ground was not advantageous, and the enemy very numerous. We retired slowly towards the heights toward Springfield, harassing them on their right and left till they came with their advance to David Meeker's house, where they thought proper to halt. Shortly after the whole brigade, with the militia, advanced their right, left, and front with the greatest rapidity, and drove their advance to the main body. We were in our turn obliged to retire after the closest action I have seen this war. We were then pushed over the bridge at Springfield (Rahway River), where we posted some troops, and with the assistance of a field-piece commanded by the militia the enemy were again driven back to their former station, and still farther before night. Never did troops, either Continental or militia, behave better than ours did. Every one that had an opportunity (which they mostly all had) vied with each other who could serve the country most. In this latter part of the day the militia flocked from all quarters and gave the enemy no respite till the day closed the scene."²

The fighting on this occasion took place mostly on the rising ground back of the Farms' village and on the east side of the Rahway River:

"In the hope of preserving the Farms (village) Colonel Dayton, who at that time commanded the militia, determined not to halt in the settlement, but to take post at a narrow pass on the road leading to Springfield."³

Both parties, therefore, passed through the village without damage to the dwelling-houses. Many, if not the most, of these houses were at noon and in the afternoon "filled with their wounded."

In the course of the afternoon the British commander "learned from Prisoners and Deserters that Washington had got time to occupy with all his force the strong post of Short Hills." This information at once put an end to all thoughts of advance. A retrograde movement was at the close of the day determined upon, to be executed, however, only after night-fall.⁴

Preparations accordingly were made for an encampment. Lieut. Mathew, of the Coldstream Guards, says,—

"Finding that the night would come on before we reached Springfield, we retreated to a very commanding ground near a place or village called Connecticut Farms, which we burnt on our retreat afterwards. Here the army divided their ground and sent out pickets, expecting to lay here the whole night. I was on a picket. I went on it about five o'clock in the evening. It was in the skirts of a wood; the rebels kept firing on it from the time I went on till dark."¹

As soon as it was determined to advance no farther the soldiers seem to have commenced the work of plundering, which was most effectually prosecuted, Governor Robertson himself sharing in the plunder. The village consisted of a house of worship belonging to the Presbyterian Church (a frame building) and eight or ten dwelling-houses, besides stores, shops, and outhouses. The buildings were first given up to pillage, thoroughly ransacked, and everything portable carried off. They were then fired and burnt down. The church edifice shared the same fate. The houses on the road running east from the church, belonging respectively to Benjamin Thompson, Moses Thompson, John Wade, and Robert Wade, and the house belonging to Caleb Wade, at the foot of the hill on which the church stood, were thus destroyed.²

The parsonage was on the street running north and south that bounds the village on the west. It was on the eastern side of the street fronting west. The last pastor of the church, Rev. Benjamin Hait, had died June 27, 1779. The Rev. Mr. Caldwell, of Elizabeth Town, by the advice of friends, had, shortly after Mr. Hait's decease, rented the vacant parsonage and occupied it with his family, having removed thither from Springfield. Mr. Caldwell had vainly endeavored, when the alarm was given in the morning, to induce his wife to seek with him and the elder children a place of greater security. She concluded to trust Providence and remain at home, "under the persuasion that her presence might serve to protect" the house "from pillage, and that her person could not possibly be endangered."³

Thacher, who was with Washington on this occasion, says, in his military journal, that "On the arrival of the royal troops Mrs. Caldwell entertained the officers with refreshments, and after they had retired she and a young woman, having Mrs. Caldwell's infant child in her arms, seated themselves on the bed." Another account, published seven days after the occurrence, says,—

"Mrs. Caldwell retired into a back room, which was so situated that she was entirely secured against transient shot from either party should they dispute the ground near the house, which happened not to be the case. The babe [Maria] was in the arms of the housekeeper [Catherine Bernard, or a small girl named Abigail Leighton]; the other child the mother held by the hand, all sitting upon the side of the bed, when one of the barbarians, advancing round the house, took the advantage of a small space through which the room was accessible and fired two balls into that amiable lady, so well directed that they ended her life in a moment."⁴

The circumstances of her death are variously related. The most particular and the most plausible statement is the following:

"The maid, who had accompanied her to this secluded apartment and had charge of the other small children, on looking out of a window into the back-yard observed to Mrs. Caldwell that a 'red-coat soldier had jumped over the fence and was coming up to the window with a gun.' Her youngest son [Elias Bondinot], nearly two years old, playing upon the floor, on hearing what the maid said, called out, 'Let me see! Let me see!' and ran that way. Mrs. Caldwell rose from sitting on a bed very near, and at this moment the soldier fired his musket at her through the window. It was loaded with two balls, which both passed through her body."⁵

Thacher says that at the sight of the soldier Mrs. Caldwell exclaimed, "Don't attempt to scare me!" when the soldier fired, shooting her through the breast, and she instantly expired.⁶

That it was a British soldier that killed her is fully established, and that it was not a random shot is also clear. But that she was known to the murderer, or that he was seeking to gratify a personal malice, is not evident. It was at all events an act of fiendish barbarity that made the British name still more execrable, not only by her townsmen, but by the whole American people.

Conflicting statements also are made as to the disposal of the corpse. Thacher says that "a British officer soon after came, and, throwing his cloak over the corpse, carried it to the next house." A correspondent of the New Jersey Gazette, under date of June 13th, says: "I saw her corpse, and was informed by the neighbors it was with infinite pains they obtained leave to bring her body from the house before they set fire to it."⁷

The house to which the body was conveyed belonged to Capt. Henry Wade. It was a small building on the opposite side of the street (the site of which has of late been occupied by the family of Mr. Phineas Crilley), one of the only two dwelling-houses in the village that escaped the flames. There Mr. Caldwell found it the next morning, and thence the same day it was with appropriate ceremonies carried to the grave. Three months after he published a most affecting appeal on the subject that made a deep impression on the public mind.⁸

The expedition proved a miserable failure. This great array of disciplined troops, horse and foot and flying artillery, so confident in the morning of reaching the American camp at Morristown and breaking up the rebellion, were held at bay by a few hastily-gathered militia, driven back, and, after the inglorious destruction by fire of the little hamlet at Connecticut Farms, compelled the same night, in the midst of drenching rain, and through mud and marsh, to retreat to the point of departure. Says Lieut. Mathew,—

"About ten o'clock the whole army got in motion and moved off. It was so exceedingly dark, and there was such strict silence observed, that one regiment could not perceive the adjoining regiment going off. . . . It was the darkest night I can remember in my life, with the most heavy rain, thunder, and lightning known in this country for many years. . . . It rained, I think, harder than I ever knew, and thundered and lightened so severely as to frighten the horses, and once or twice the whole army halted, being deprived of sight for a time. General Knyphausen's horse started so as to throw the general.

"We continued our march until we reached the bank of the creek (Sound) which he had crossed in the morning. Nothing more awful than this retreat can be imagined. The rain, with the terrible thunder and lightning, the darkness of the night, the houses at Connecticut Farms which we had set fire to in a blaze, the dead bodies which the light of the fire or the lightning showed you now and then on the road, and the dread of an enemy completed the scene of horror. . . . We halted at the side of the creek and took up our ground, and the whole army encamped."¹

As the result of the day's encounter, Gen. Maxwell reported one ensign (Moses Ogden, of Elizabeth Town, aged nineteen) killed and three lieutenants wounded, seven privates killed, twenty-eight wounded, and five missing. The militia also lost several and had a number wounded. The enemy lost three times the number. Gen. Stirling died of his wound nearly a year later.

"The Tories were so sure of the enemy's succeeding that they sent word to their friends in Elizabeth Town that they should pay them a visit the day after the enemy came over."²

It is safe to say that the visit was not paid. It is quite certain that the town "the day after" was not a very agreeable place for men that could glory in Knyphausen and his deeds.

Occupation of Elizabethtown Point by the British.—The scouts that followed after the retreating foe on their return reported that they had passed over to Staten Island, all but about five hundred men left behind to intrench themselves at the Point. They encamped between the Old Point and De Hart's house. Lord Stirling, the senior in command below the Hills, is reported to have said thereupon to Gen. Hand, "Take your brigade, Hand, and the two brigades of militia, and go down and bring up those fellows at the Point." The columns, numbering about fifteen hundred, were soon put in marching order, to rendezvous at Elizabeth Town. Here the troops were marshaled for the attack. The Continentals, under Gen. Hand, had the centre, with a militia brigade on the right and left. They advanced in three columns, designing to assault the enemy in as many points at once.

The advance corps of the left brigade cut off and captured the picket-guard of the enemy. This brigade were much exposed before reaching their point of attack in crossing a meadow, and drew forth so heavy a fire of artillery from the enemy as to show that they were in full force. Hand contrived, therefore, to give the attack the appearance of a feint, and drew off his troops so deliberately as to make the enemy believe that he was simply executing a manœuvre designed to draw them from their fortifications. He succeeded in effecting his retreat to the town without being pursued. The cannonade at one time was very heavy, and would have done fearful execution had their aim been lower, nearly all the balls passing over the heads of the troops on their advance.³

The ground occupied by the contending forces on this occasion is now covered by the factories, warehouses, and residences of Elizabethport,—the First Ward of the city of Elizabeth.

The British army continued in the occupation of this post during the next fortnight, behind the fortifications thrown up by the Americans more than four years before, continual skirmishes taking place between the lines.

The situation of the town during this period was anything but enviable. Almost daily they were visited by portions of one army or the other,—placed between two fires.

Gen. William Irvine, from the "Camp Short Hills, June 18th," wrote to his wife at Carlisle, Pa., as follows:

"The Enemy lie still at Elizabethtown Point, about ten miles from here. We have small parties down near them every day, but there is but little damage done on either side. We have taken at different times some forty prisoners. . . . We have been now thirteen days at this place without Tents or Baggage. No covering except boughs of trees and bark, which, however, is cool and pleasant in the heat of the day, and serves to keep out a good deal of rain. Notwithstanding these privations, we have not had a man sick since we have taken the field. One consolation we have, the enemy are worse off than we are. They have no Tents, and are hemmed in a narrow neck of land, whilst we have a wide extent of country. You may think your situation happy indeed, my love, when compared with that of the poor people of this part of our country. It grieves me beyond expression to see their distressed situation, particularly that of the women and children. Murder and Rapine await them wherever these barbarians come. Were it possible, I would suffer a thousand deaths rather than see you in the situation some poor gentlemen here are forced to see their wives and daughters left in."⁴

The attempt to penetrate to Washington's camp by the way of the Short Hills was renewed a few days later, Sir Henry Clinton taking the oversight of the affair. The British left their camp at the Point before day on Friday, the 23d, and marched forward, an imposing force of about five thousand men, besides dragoons, and fifteen or twenty pieces of artillery, superior to any force that Washington could oppose to them. Having driven in the American pickets, they pressed on without obstruction to Connecticut Farms, which they reached about sunrise. From this point they proceeded in two compact columns, the right taking the more circuitous road on the north that leads through Healdy Town, Vauxhall, and Milburn, and unites with the main road just below the principal pass of the Short Hills back of Springfield, the left taking the road that leads directly from "the Farms" over the Rahway River to Springfield, with which route they had become painfully familiar on their previous expedition.

As soon as the enemy were seen from the signal-station on Prospect Hill, the eighteen-pounder and the tar-barrel were again fired. The militia began immediately to collect from every quarter; the troops that were guarding the several passes over the hills were hastily called in and posted so as at once to resist the advancing foe, protect the American flanks, and secure a retreat if needed. Major Lee, with the horse and the pickets under Capt. Walker, took post at Little's Bridge, on the Vauxhall road, supported by Col. Ogden's command. The defense of the village against the left column of the enemy was intrusted to Col. Dayton's regiment of the Jersey Brigade. Stark's brigade and the remainder of Maxwell's were drawn up on the heights near the mill in the rear of the village, with the militia on the flanks.

In the disposal of his regiment Col. Dayton stationed Col. Angell, of Rhode Island, with about two hundred men and a piece of artillery at the first bridge over the principal stream, on the main road in front of the town, and Col. Shreve with a detachment at the second bridge, over a smaller stream on the same road behind the town, so as to cover the retreat of Col. Angell's forces. The planks of the bridges in front had been removed.

As the van of the enemy approached the first bridge they began to manoeuvre in such a way and so long, nearly two hours, as to convince Gen. Greene that they were moving on his flanks. In the mean time the right column of the enemy advanced along the Vauxhall road to the bridge, defended by Maj. Lee and Capt. Walker. Here they met with a stout resistance from the dragoons and pickets, but having forded the river higher up, and gained the point of the hill near by, Lee and Walker were compelled to retire.

As soon as it was known that the right column had reached the bridge in front of Lee, the left column advanced in force against Col. Angell at the lower bridge, and after a hotly-contested struggle of forty minutes compelled him to retire behind the second bridge in good order, carrying off his wounded. Col. Shreve in like manner was compelled to give way after covering Angell's retreat, when both commands fell back, and joined Maxwell and Stark on the high ground in the rear. Two regiments, Col. Webb's (under Lieut.-Col. Huntington's command) and Col. Jackson's, with one piece of artillery, were posted on the Vauxhall road to the left so as to cover Lee's retreat and oppose the advance of the enemy's right column, while the main body of troops were posted on the first range of hills in the rear of Byram's tavern.

During the heat of the contest with Dayton's regiment it is related of his chaplain, Mr. Caldwell, that he showed the utmost ardor in the fight, as if he would avenge himself for the murder of his beloved wife. To supply the men with wadding for their fire-locks he galloped to the church near by and brought back an armful of psalm-books, and as he handed them around he shouted, "Now put Watts into them, boys!"

Having gained possession of the village, and observed how every post in front was occupied by the Continentals and the militia, whose numbers were continually increasing, the enemy showed no disposition to press forward. Fearing, too, as they learned from their scouts of the approach of the brigade sent out by Washington, that their retreat might be cut off, they determined to proceed no farther, but to retrace their steps as before. The work of plunder now began, and house after house was rifled of its valuables, fired, and burned to the ground. Nineteen dwelling-houses and the Presbyterian Church were thus destroyed. Only four dwelling-houses were spared, being occupied by their wounded. Foiled completely in their object now as before, they once more took up their backward line of march, and disappeared as rapidly as they came, pursued and galled by a detachment of one hundred and twenty regulars under Capt. Davis and a large body of militia, who fell upon their rear and flanks, and pursued them almost to their fortifications at the Point. The sight of the burning dwellings almost maddened the militia, who eagerly sought to take off the red-coated marauders. Maj. Lee with his dragoons also fell upon their rear, and captured some of the refugees that accompanied the army, as well as some of the Tories who had joined them and welcomed their coming.

The enemy, crestfallen and severely punished for their audacity, entered Elizabeth Town on their return about sunset closely pursued by Stark's brigade, which in their eagerness to escape they effectually distanced by their precipitate flight. Having reached, before dark, the cover of their fortifications, they rested until midnight, when they crossed the Sound on their bridge of boats, which, of course, they took up and removed as their rear-guard passed over. Gen. Dickinson marched the militia to the Point the next day and effectually demolished the works which the enemy had constructed, and then dismissed the brave yeomanry, with great reputation, to their homes.

The loss of the Americans in the several contests of the day, as reported by Lieut.-Col. Barber, deputy adjutant-general, was thirteen killed and forty-nine wounded. The militia had none killed, only twelve wounded, and nine missing. Only one officer was slain, First Lieut. Thompson, of the artillery. The loss of the enemy is not recorded. It must have been very considerable. Lieut. Mathew says that "in this expedition to the Jerseys . . . there were not less than five hundred killed, wounded, and miss-

Thus ended, so far as this town is concerned, the most memorable campaign of the war. The whole of these exploits, from the 7th to the 23d of June, occurred within the territorial limits of the old borough. That on both these occasions so powerful and well-organized a force should have been held at bay and then driven back by so small a body of Continentals, aided by the militia from their farms and workshops,—not more than a thousand on the 23d having at any one time been brought into action,—reflects great credit on both the patriotism and bravery of the people. Washington was delighted with their services. June 25th he thus writes,—

"The militia deserve everything that can be said on both occasions. They flew to arms universally, and acted with a spirit equal to anything I have seen in the course of the war."²

From this time forward the people were mostly permitted to remain at home in the cultivation of their fields and in the pursuits of trade. The harvests were gathered without interruption, and the wastes of the war were in part repaired. As the enemy, however, still continued in force on Staten Island, it became necessary to guard against a repetition of these outrages. In consequence of the exposed condition of the post no more military stores were to be kept here, thus removing one of the strong temptations to these marauding expeditions.

The partisan warfare from which individuals had so severely suffered was still continued. The refugees on Staten Island were specially malignant and troublesome. The following notice, published November 8th, shows something of the danger to which the prominent friends of the country were continually exposed:

"On Saturday night last [4th] Smith Hetfield, Cornelius Hetfield, Elias Mann, and some others came over from Staten Island to Elizabeth Town where they were informed that Col. [Matthias] Ozden, of the 1st Jersey Regiment, and Captain [Jonathan] Dayton, of the Third, were to lodge that night at William Herd's at Connecticut Farms, to which place they hastened, made them both prisoners, and carried them off unmolested to Staten Island."

Gaines, under date of September 23d, represents that the people suffered also from the foraging parties of their own army:

"Last Week a Party of Moyland's Light Horse were at Elizabeth Town, collecting cattle for the Use of the Rebel Army. They took a pair of fat Oxen out of a Team on the Road, and gave the Driver a receipt for them; They then proceeded to the Point Meadows, and took away every Head from them, but were opposed on the Way by the Militia and the Commissioners of the Place, who obliged them to relinquish their Booty."

Under date of Dec. 18, 1780, Gaines says,—

"On Thursday evening last [14th] Mr. Elias Mann and a Party of Men under his command attacked the Rebel Picket at Elizabeth Town. They killed two and took six of the Rebels; one only escaped. The prisoners were brought in here on Saturday last, with two other Rebels taken by the same enterprising Party a few days before."³

The same authority, November 25th, says,—

"Yesterday Capt. Cornelius Hetfield, with adventure peculiar to himself, after an incursion upon the Jonathans in Jersey, brought off a lieutenant and five or six others."⁴

This daring partisan seems constantly to have been plotting against his former friends and neighbors with an ambition and courage worthy of a better cause. On the 25th of January, 1781, he and four other refugees, all formerly from this town, arrested on Staten Island Stephen Ball, a London trader from Rahway, a son of David Ball, and took him first to Gen. Patterson and then to Gen. Skinner, both of whom refused to proceed against him on the charge that he had aided in the execution, in 1779, of Thomas Long, a New Jersey refugee, when they took him over to Bergen Point, and without judge or jury hung him as a spy by the neck until he was dead.⁵

On Friday, the 23d of February, the same party came by night to Elizabeth Town and captured Capt. Craig, of the State Regiment, and four other inhabitants. The next week, Thursday, March 1st, they found their way by night to Rahway and carried off John Clawson, Esq., one of the commissioners for selling the confiscated estates, against whom, therefore, they had a peculiar grudge.⁶

The year 1781 was noted in this neighborhood for the frequency with which the nocturnal incursions of the "Cow-Boys" and other plunderers from Staten Island disturbed the peace and comfort of the border population. The following notices may serve to show to some extent in what a state of excitement and serious alarm the people of this town who still remained in the occupation of their dwelling-houses must have lived. The New Jersey Journal of the 28th of March says,—

"Last Wednesday night (21st) a party of refugees from Staten Island was over at Rahway, plundering and kidnapping every one they came across. They carried off, we hear, near a dozen of the inhabitants prisoners."

The same journal of the 4th of April says,—

"On Monday night, the 20th ult., a detachment of eight men from the State troops in Elizabeth Town went over to Staten Island and brought off a Lieutenant and one private of the militia. They took two more, but the wind blowing fresh and their boat small incapacitated them so much that they could not bring them over."⁷

Retaliation followed the next day, of which a statement is made by the same annalist as follows:

"On Tuesday night, the 27th ult., about two hundred regulars and refugees from Staten Island, under the command of Major Beckwith, who had eluded by circuitous routes the vigilance of the different patrols, entered Elizabeth Town in four divisions, where they captured ten of the inhabitants, 1 Lieut. and 3 privates of the State troops, and 2 continental soldiers. They stayed about an hour and a half in town, and then retreated, with the loss of one man killed and another taken prisoner. They plundered the house of Mr. Joseph Crane to a very considerable amount."¹

It was a party of the Thirty-seventh Regiment, under command of Capt. Beckwith, according to the New York papers, that performed this exploit:

"Finding the rebels dispersed in the houses, he immediately went to their alarm-post, where, by beating to arms, he drew a Lieutenant and many of his soldiers to him, whom he made prisoners."²

Among the most active of the partisans on the American side was Capt. Baker Hendricks, a cousin of the noted John Smith Hatfield on the other side. Washington had employed him at an earlier period as a spy, in which capacity he had been allowed to trade with the enemy on Staten Island. Governor Livingston had commissioned him, Sept. 19, 1780, to fit out two whale-boats, the "Flying Squirrel" and "Charming Betsey," as privateers to prey on the enemy's vessels. He was at this time about twenty-four years of age. The Journal of the 18th of April says,—

"Last Monday night (16th) Capt. Baker Hendricks went from Elizabeth Town to Staten Island and brought off one Lieutenant and a private of the refugees and one inhabitant. Previous to the above a party went over and brought off a captain."³

The New Jersey Gazette of the 9th of May says,—

"On [Saturday] the 21st ult. a party of about seventy of the enemy came over to Elizabeth Town from Staten Island. They landed at Halstead's Point, and were discovered between that place and the town by Capt. Hendricks, who was patrolling with about ten or twelve men, and though so much inferior in number, he kept up a smart fire on them, which prevented them from penetrating farther into town than Doctor Winans. After collecting a few horses, etc., firing through the windows in the room where Mrs. Winans was sitting, by which a boy was wounded in the arm, and burning the house of Mr. Ephraim Marsh, they went off to their boats."⁴

A New York paper says that the party was "a detachment of Gen. Skinner's corps, under his command," accompanied as usual by Capt. Cornelius Hatfield, with some of his refugees as guides. It further says that—

"Capt. McMichael, of the Refugee Post at Bergen Point, who had been taken out of a flag (boat) by the rebels and held in irons, was upon this occasion relieved and restored to his companions. We have only to regret the loss of Mr. Elias Mann, who has ever distinguished himself on all occasions as one the rebellion as a brave and active Loyalist. He was unfortunately killed by a shot from a skulking party as the troops were re-embarking. Capt. Hatfield and one private were slightly wounded."⁵

A visit from the "Cow-Boys" of Bergen is mentioned in the Journal of the 9th of May:

"On Friday last (4th) a party of the enemy from the refugee post at Bergen Point came over to Elizabeth Town Point, and before our people were alarmed collected about fifty head of cattle, which they drove on the great meadows, where they took them on board, under cover of a field-piece and some armed vessels."⁶

A retaliatory visit to Staten Island soon followed, of which no account appears but in the New York papers:

"On Tuesday night, the 8th inst., Captain Hendricks (a noted rebel), from Elizabeth Town, with another rebel officer, a sergeant, and eleven private, came on Staten Island, in order to take off the patrols of the First Battalion New Jersey Volunteers, and to plunder the inhabitants, but finding the patrols, commanded by Ensign Barton, too alert for their purpose, the rebels concealed themselves in a wood a short distance from the house of one Salter, and as soon as they observed the patrols leaving the neighborhood they immediately surrounded Salter's house. The patrols, though at a distance, concluding they saw rebels, turned back, attacked and soon put them to flight, and notwithstanding their agility two were made prisoners. The sergeant, losing himself, was secured by the militia, and had it not been for the ardor of the troops, which suffered no loss, the whole gang would have been taken. We hear that Hendricks received a slight wound and that one of his party was killed."⁷

This affair was served up in the Tory papers, with considerable embellishment as usual. It would no doubt have appeared very different in one of the Jersey papers.

These excursions from either side of the border uniformly occurred by night, and generally, it is presumed, on moonless nights. It became necessary to use great vigilance in watching every exposed point and guarding every avenue of approach. Sentinels were posted in the streets, and called the passer-by to account. On Saturday night, June 2d, David Woodruff and Philip McCrea were walking together along one of the streets in town, when they were hailed by the sentinel; but not answering, the sentinel fired and killed McCrea on the spot. Sad scenes were of almost daily occurrence.⁸

That part of the town bordering on the Rahway River was frequently visited by these rapacious marauders. Rivington, with his wonted exaggerations, in his paper of June 30th has the following account:

"Last night a detachment of the garrison of about thirty-six men, including two sergeants, under the command of Lieut. Hutchinson and Ensign Barton, First Battalion New Jersey Volunteers, with about thirty-four refugees and militia, under the command of Capt. Durham and Roberts, landed at Trembly's Point, near the mouth of Rahway River, and surrounded Tairil's tavern, in order to take three rebel light-horse, whose business was to patrol down the Sound and to give notice of any troops coming from Staten Island, but unfortunately those fellows were gone to Westfield. The troops then proceeded to one Capt. Amos Morse's, who was surprised and taken out of bed with four other rebels; after this they took twelve thirty and forty head of cattle, amongst which are six good oxen and about eighty sheep, which were drove to Trembly's Point. The rebels collected to the amount of about forty, across the rear as usual. Lieut. Hutchinson formed an ambuscade unperceived by the rebels, which had its desired effect. Fifteen rebels passed, hallooing, 'Damn the refugees! Cut them down!' Up the troops arose from the place where they were secreted. The rebels, observing this, stood agast, threw down their arms, others stood with arms in their hand. On this occasion ten were made prisoners. Some time after this about twenty rebels collected near the Point, on whom a charge was made, and some taken prisoners; the troops and the refugees then embarked with the greatest regularity and good order, with all their cattle and sheep, and came safe to Staten Island; not one of the troops received the least injury; one of the refugees received a spent ball on his thigh, which had no other effect than leaving its mark. The troops and refugees behaved with the greatest bravery on this occasion; twenty rebels are made prisoners, two of whom are wounded; some were killed, it's not doubted, but several were wounded, as several were heard to scream and halloo. The names

Morse is the notorious villain mentioned in a late handbill giving an account of the death and sufferings of that unfortunate victim, Mr. Thomas Long, who died by the hand of rebel cruelty, to which we beg leave to refer our readers.¹

The New Jersey Journal of the 27th of June says that this visit occurred "yesterday morning," and that "our people . . . killed two of the enemy which they left on the field, but it is supposed they had several more killed and wounded which they carried off. Two of their party deserted and came over to our troops."²

The northern part of the town received attention soon after. The Mercury of the 23d of July says,—

"Yesterday evening Lieut. Obadiah Meeker and fourteen privates of the New Jersey Rebel Militia were sent to town [New York] from Staten Island: they were taken the night before by a party of refugees between Newark and Elizabeth Town under the command of Capt. Hatfield."³

Lord Cornwallis surrendered, October 17th, his whole army and munitions of war at Yorktown, Va., to Gen. Washington. That grand event as soon as known was everywhere celebrated with demonstrations of delight and exultation. To the extent that it raised the hopes and expectations of the patriots it depressed and discouraged the refugees and their British supporters. Preparations, therefore, soon after began to be made for emigration to the British provinces, great apprehensions being felt among them for their personal safety at the close of the war now so obviously drawing to an end. The refugees on Staten Island began to find out that the border warfare in which they had so long been engaged was the worst kind of policy for their personal interests, that it was the surest possible way of preventing their own restoration to the favor of their countrymen and the recovery of their confiscated estates.

From this time the war with Staten Island, which had been carried forward so persistently for more than five years, lost much of its asperity and sensibly declined in spirit. Not that it was wholly intermitted, nor that vigilance was no longer demanded on the outposts. Desperate characters enough there were on the island who knew that they had too deeply injured their townsmen to expect forgiveness, and these might at any time make a sudden foray upon the stock and plunder the people.

An entire exchange of prisoners had taken place early in September, so that the citizens, as well as the soldiers, who had been captured by these marauding parties and had not died in prison had been restored to their homes, and were permitted to unite with their townsmen in their demonstrations of joy over the surrender of their old enemy, Lord Cornwallis.

So long a war, degenerating, as it had done in this locality, into a series of predatory forays and midnight surprises, had trained and let loose on society a class of desperadoes, thieves, and cut-throats, ready to prey on any unfortunates who fell into their hands. An instance of this kind is related in the New York papers of the 10th of November:

"Last Saturday [8th] William Hatfield, an inhabitant of Elizabeth Town, Rahway, came to Staten Island with a small quantity of flour to dispose of, etc. . . . On his return in the evening he was met in the Sound by one Peter Terrat, a noted thief, who supports himself and a gang of such miscreants by robbing and plundering: to him and his party Hatfield surrendered himself; but after he was a prisoner Terrat thought Hatfield threw something overboard, on which the infernal fiend took a pistol out of his pocket and shot him dead, laid the body on the bank of the Sound, and went off exulting with the other prisoners he had taken. Hatfield has left a wife and several children to lament their loss."⁴

The victim was the son of David Hatfield (an elder of the Rahway Church, who had been captured in June, and had now been restored to his home), and a cousin of J. Smith Hatfield, the desperado of Staten Island. The latter having ventured to return openly to the town in a flag-boat was, together with one of his comrades, Lewis Blanchard (son of John Blanchard and nephew of Capt. Cornelius Hatfield), seized by some of the Westfield people, loaded with irons, and hurried off to Burlington, where he was kept in close confinement. This gave occasion to the foray, of which the New York papers of the 6th of February, 1782, made mention as follows:

"Last Friday night [1st] a party, consisting of thirty Refugees, commanded by Captain Cornelius Hatfield, proceeded from Staten Island to Elizabeth Town, where they took nine prisoners, amongst them Mr. Reed, a rebel contractor; all were brought to Staten Island, where they are treated in the same manner as is Mr. Smith Hatfield, lately seized by the Westfield people, though he was then under the sanction of a flag of truce, carried into Burlington, and there loaded with irons; these rebels are by the Refugees kept in close durance as hostages for the safe return of Smith Hatfield, a valuable individual of their body. His companion, Lewis Blanchard, fortunately escaping from the rebels at Princetown, traveled two miles into the wood, where he was concealed till he could disengage himself from the chains with which he was loaded, and after being freed by the intense frosts is arrived, an object of commiseration amongst his overjoyed friends, at Staten Island."⁵

The Sound at this time was frozen over, of which advantage was taken. A very different account of this affair is given by the Journal of the 6th:

"On Friday night a party of Refugees, consisting of blacks and whites, having formed a plan to intercept the people of this side as they passed into the meadows for salt hay, came over and concealed themselves in a swamp, and had made upwards of a dozen people, with their horses and sleds, prisoners, when the alarm being given they were pursued so close that two of their party fell into our hands together with all they had previously captured."⁶

It would scarcely seem that these two accounts relate to the same event, and yet it is not at all probable that two such forays occurred the same night.

Soon after the murder of the London trader, related above, the tragedy of the Rev. Mr. Caldwell's death occurred, November 24th, filling the whole community with sadness and grief. The particulars of this lamentable event will appear on a subsequent page.

The following notice of Capt. Hendricks' exploits is found in the Journal of the 12th of December:

"Last Thursday sennight, Captain Baker Hendricks, with a party of men in whale boats, went down Newark Bay, near the Kills, when he boarded and stripped two wood-boats and took one prisoner; and on Thursday night last he landed a small party of men on Bergen Neck near the Refuge post, when he took two prisoners, and on his return took three noted villains, with provisions of all kinds."¹

A visit from some of the "Cow-Boys" of Staten Island is thus described in the Journal of the 5th of December:

"Last Saturday night [1st] seven refugees from Staten Island landed at Halstead's Point, with the expectation (as their leader told them) of meeting some of their quondam friends with fat cattle; but Capt. [Jonathan] Dayton having notice of their intention collected a party of men, and knowing the route they were to take laid in ambush for them, though, unfortunately, a muddy place in the road had turned them a little out, and obliged his party to fire through two fences, otherwise, in all probability, they would have killed every one the first fire; however, they killed one, mortally wounded another, and took three prisoners; the other two, favored by the shade of the night and a good pair of heels, made their escape. Three of the party were left in the gunboat, but hearing a boat of ours coming out of the creek, pushed over to Staten Island shore, nevertheless she fell into the hands of Lieut. Randall. It seems their leader, Swain Parsel, was a deserter from our army. On his information David Oliver, a villain who has long been the supporter of the illicit trade, and a dread to the inhabitants on the lines, was taken the same night concealed in a house at Bahway."²

Two days afterwards,—

"Sunday night [23d] Capt. Baker Hendricks went over to Bergen and made eight of the enemy prisoners."³

At the opening of navigation in the spring, the winter having been unusually severe,—

"Lieut. Blanchard sailed with a party of men in a whale-boat last Sunday [March 10th] and took, off Elizabeth Town Point, a whale-boat, in which was a Mr. Woodroffe and four other active rebels belonging to New Jersey."⁴

On the night of the following Thursday [14th],—

"A party of royal horse-thieves, under the command of the celebrated Lewis Robbins, . . . made an incursion into Rihway. They set out for Westfield to seize Sheriff Marsh, but as the roads were bad, and learning probably that the sheriff was not at home, they turned back and made their way to old David Miller's, capturing him, some of his sons, and his horses. Having paroled the old man because of his infirmities, they proceeded to Peter Trembly's, whom they seized and robbed of all his money and papers. They took also a Peter Horn. But at the sudden discharge of a gun they paroled their prisoners and fled."⁵

The next night Capt. Baker Hendricks and Mr. Luther Baldwin, with a small party of men, went over in a whale-boat to Staten Island, where they "surprised and took a sloop armed with two three-pounders, two blunderbusses, and manned with five hands;" as the sloop was aground, they "stripped her of arms, sails, rigging, cable, anchor, and long boat." Two other sloops they served in like manner.

Even the flag-boats suffered from the depredators on the Sound. Rivington says,—

"Last Friday [March 15th] a vessel with a flag of truce sailed from this garrison [New York] for Elizabeth Town Point, in which went a Hessian paymaster with a large sum of money for the use of the Hessian prisoners in Pennsylvania. Same night about 12 o'clock a rebel whale-boat boarded the flag-vessel at said Point, the crew of which seized the cash which the Hessian gentleman had in charge for the before mentioned purpose. Several other gentlemen on board the flag were also robbed of what cash they had with them."⁶

The American account presents quite a different aspect of this affair:

"Thursday night a flag of truce on her way to this shore was boarded near Shuter's Island by some men in disguise and robbed of upwards of two thousand guineas, being a part of a sum of money for the use of Cornwallis's army. They also plundered several individuals that were on board. The party that committed the above robbery were supposed to be refugees from New York or Staten I-land."⁷

The amount, as afterwards appeared, was nine hundred guineas, the losers having, as usual, magnified their loss.

The spring passed away in considerable quiet. Early in June Hendricks repeated his visits to Bergen:

"Friday passed through this place [Chatham] under guard seven tattered demoralized, taken the preceding day [June 6th] by a party under the command of Capt. Hendricks.

"Last Thursday morning [13th] Capt. Baker Hendricks captured, after some resistance, on Bergen Point, five refugees, which he brought off."⁸

Yet at this very time Hendricks was under accusation of illicit intercourse with the enemy, and Governor Livingston withdrew his commission as a partisan commander.⁹

The foray of the 1st of February, 1782, was the last to which the town was subjected. It does not appear that the enemy ventured again to cross the Sound after this date on a marauding excursion within the limits of the borough. The war practically came to an end at that date in this section. Some depredations were committed and some captures made on the waters in the vicinity, but none on land. Capt. Cornelius Hatfield, disgusted with the results of his visits to his native place, is found, April 10th, together with Capt. Blauvelt, at the head of an expedition of Tories on the armed brig "Arrogant," and capturing, a short distance up the North River, a "pettianger" and some small boats, with about ten prisoners.¹⁰

In June an expedition was fitted out from this town, of which an account is given as follows:

"Intelligence being received at Elizabeth Town of two whale-boats, fitted for a two months' cruise in the Delaware Bay, lying at a wharf the north side of Staten I-land, a plan was concerted to surprise and bring them off, which was put in practice last Thursday night [20th], and the boats, with all their appurtenances, were safely moored at Elizabeth Town bridge the next morning, together with eighteen prisoners that were on board, six of whom valuable Negroes. The party, Continentals and volunteers, consisted of upwards of thirty, commanded by Major [Wm.] Crane. There was a sentinel in each boat, who had led and attempted to fire on the party, but their pieces providentially flashing in the pan, the party, regardless of danger, rushed on them with such impetuosity that they had not time to prime again, and a few moments put them in complete possession of their object, without any further alarm."¹¹

At the October term of the Court of Oyer and Terminer for Essex County, George Hair was fined six hundred pounds "for letting John Smith Hetfield escape," of which the following is an account:

"Smith Hetfield, an infamous refugee, who has been committing depredations on the innocent inhabitants along the lines ever since the commencement of the war, and was taken prisoner several months ago, made his escape from the guard who had him in charge on Saturday night last [September 21st]."¹

One act more of aggressive hostility on the part of citizens of this town, March, 1783, remains to be narrated. It will be told in the words of Maj. William Crane, the leader of the enterprise, as written the next day:

"I have the pleasure to inform you of the capture of the sloop Katy, of twelve double-fortified four-pounders, containing one hundred and seventeen puncheons of Jamaica spirit is, lying, at the time of capture, within pistol-shot of the grand battery at New York, and alongside of the ship Eagle, of twenty-four guns, which we also took, but were obliged to leave there, as she lay aground. The Captain and crews of both the vessels were brought up by us in the sloop to this place, where we have them secure. This was performed on the night of the third of March [Monday], by six town-men, under the command of Captain Quigley and myself, without the firing of a musket by any of our party."²

The vessel and cargo were sold at auction at Elizabeth Town on Monday, the 17th of March.³

The welcome news at length arrived at Philadelphia, March 23d, that preliminary treaties between Great Britain, France, and Spain had been signed at Paris on the 20th of January, thus rendering effectual the provisional treaty of the 30th of November, 1782, between Great Britain and the United States. On the reception of the news, and of his instructions, Sir Guy Carleton hastened to proclaim a complete cessation of hostilities by sea and land; and a similar proclamation was ordered by Congress on the 11th of April. The order was received at headquarters in Newburgh, N. Y., on the 17th, and proclamation was made accordingly to every regiment and corps of the army at noon of Saturday, the 19th of April, precisely eight years from the actual commencement of hostilities at Lexington, Mass.

GEN. ELIAS DAYTON, son of Jonathan Dayton, was born at Elizabeth Town, N. J., in 1737. He entered the military service of the province as a lieutenant March 19, 1756, and was made captain March 29, 1760, serving with the British troops in the French war on the frontiers. In 1764 he conducted a successful expedition against the Indians near Detroit, who were engaged in the uprising under Pontiac, the famous Ottawa chief. Of this Mr. Dayton left a journal, commencing with April 30, and ending with Sept. 15, 1764. He took an active and patriotic part in the measures which led to the Declaration of Independence. As colonel of militia he had command of the Elizabeth Town Volunteers, who captured (Jan. 23, 1776) the "Blue Mountain Valley." He was commissioned colonel of the Third New Jersey Regiment of regulars Feb. 9, 1776, and took part with his regiment in the defense of Ticonderoga. His gallant conduct through the war has been already related. On the resignation of Gen. Maxwell, July 20, 1780, he was put in command of the New Jersey Brigade. He took part in the affairs of Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, and Yorktown, and accompanied Gen. Sullivan in 1779 on his Western expedition. He was commissioned as a brigadier-general Jan. 8, 1783, and June 5, 1793, as a major-general of the Second Division of New Jersey militia.

In 1779 he was chosen a member of Congress, and declined, but was a delegate in 1787-88. He was for several years a member of the New Jersey Legislature. He would have been appointed to the United States Constitutional Convention in 1787, but declined in favor of his son Jonathan. He was frequently appointed to office in his native town, as a member and president of the board of trustees for many years of the Presbyterian Church, as a member of the corporation, and from 1796 to 1805, with the exception of a single year, as mayor of the borough. He was the first President of the Cincinnati of New Jersey. In person and bearing he strongly resembled Gen. Washington.

Both before and after the Revolutionary war he was successfully engaged in mercantile pursuits, part of the time alone, and afterwards as Elias Dayton & Son.

He died of gout in the stomach, and on Saturday, 24th, the corpse was removed to the Presbyterian Church, where a funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. John McDowell from Joshua xxiii. 14: "And behold this day I am going the way of all the earth." The assemblage of citizens was more numerous than we ever knew on the like occasion in this town. Military honors were performed. The whole proceedings were marked with uncommon solemnity, and evinced the unfeigned affliction felt by all classes of citizens. In this solemn dispensation of Providence we beheld the uncertainty of sublunary things, a fellow-mortal in health in the evening and a corpse before the next rising sun.

HON. JONATHAN DAYTON, LL.D.—He was the son of Gen. Elias Dayton, and was born in Elizabeth Town Oct. 16, 1760. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1776; entered the army in 1778 as a paymaster; accompanied, in 1779, Gen. Sullivan on his Western expedition; and in 1780 was a captain in his father's regiment. After the peace he was chosen to the Legislature of New Jersey, of which he was Speaker in 1790. He represented his native State in the convention (1787) for the formation of the Federal Constitution, and in 1791 was elected to Congress. Thrice he was re-elected, serving four terms in the House, of which he was Speaker from 1795 to 1799. He was chosen senator of the United States, and served from 1799 to 1805. He was appointed by President Adams a brigadier-general, with the privilege of retaining his seat in the Senate.

He became largely interested with Symmes and others in the purchase and settlement of western military lands, the town of Dayton, in Ohio, being named in compliment to him. His early intimacy in boyhood with Aaron Burr, and his later association with him in the Senate of the United States, led him to look with more favor than prudence would have dictated upon the schemes of that aspiring and crafty politician, so that by advancing money to aid Burr in his adventures he became compromised with him in the charge of treason. This indictment, however, was not tried, and Mr. Dayton's bail was released. This unhappy affair, and the breaking up of the Federal party, of which he was a leader, put an end to Mr. Dayton's political aspirations. He was subsequently elected repeatedly to the Council of the New Jersey Legislature, and held several important offices in his native town. He received, in 1798, from his alma mater the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. His later days were passed at home, in the enjoyment of a comfortable competence, respected and venerated by his townsmen, and honored by all who knew him.

GEN. WILLIAM CRANE, son of the Hon. Stephen Crane, was a sterling patriot of the Revolution. He was born at Elizabeth Town, N. J., in 1748, and being in the full vigor of his early manhood at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, at once espoused his country's cause, and in common with several of his townsmen attached himself as lieutenant of an artillery company to the Canada expedition under Montgomery. At the time that his commander fell before Quebec, Dec. 31, 1775, Crane received a bomb-shell wound in one of his ankles, from which he suffered until his death, nearly forty years afterwards. As major of militia, the story of his capture, March 3, 1783, of the armed ship "Eagle" and the sloop "Katy," within pistol-shot of the battery of New York, has been told in the history of the Revolution in this work. For these acts of bravery he was promoted after the war to a brigadier-generalship of militia. He lived till nearly the close of the second war with England, discharging responsible trusts both in the borough and in the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a trustee, until the time of his death. The following obituary notice appeared in the New Jersey Journal of July 12, 1814:

"Died on Saturday last (9th) Gen. William Crane, in the 67th year of his age. In the year 1775, Gen. Crane entered the Continental service, and at the reduction of St. John's, or Montreal, received a wound in his leg which never was cured, and for some years past he suffered much from it. About seventeen months since his leg was amputated with flattering prospects, but that last resort has been too long deferred, and he fell a victim to the incurable wound. Gen. Crane's character as a soldier and citizen stood pre-eminent, and he lived beloved and died lamented. His funeral was attended on Sunday by a vast concourse of people from this and the neighboring parishes, who testified his worth as a MAN."

JEREMIAH BALLARD, ESQ.—He was born in 1748, and became at an early period of his life a resident of Elizabeth Town. In the later years of the Revolutionary war he was a captain in the Third New Jersey Regiment. In 1796 he was chosen recorder of the borough, and in 1801 deputy mayor. In 1788 he joined the Presbyterian Church, becoming a member of its board of trustees in 1807, of which he was made president in 1813. He was the vice-president of the Cincinnati of New Jersey, and a leading member of various other institutions in the town. At the time of his decease he was also mayor of the borough of Elizabeth. He died Sept. 4, 1823, aged seventy-five years. At a meeting of the corporation the day following his funeral the following testimonial to his eminent worth was recorded:

"While the Members of this Corporation, in common with their fellow-Citizens of this Borough, deeply lament the death of their late worthy chief Magistrate, Jeremiah Ballard, Esq., they think it due to his memory to express their sentiments of his public character and private worth.

"To detail the particulars of a long and useful life they do not feel themselves called upon, but they believe they give a faithful though brief summary of it when they say,—

"As a Soldier, he was brave, humane, and generous;

"As a Magistrate, he was upright, intelligent, and faithful;

"As a Citizen, he was public-spirited and highly useful;

"As Presiding officer of this Corporation, he was courteous, dignified, & impartial;

"As a Christian, he was Charitable & zealous, but unostentatious.

"He displayed the graces of the religion he professed in life, & he felt its support and consolation in death.

"Thus lived and died the worthy Chief Magistrate of our Borough, who ranked if not among the greatest yet among the best of men.

"Therefore, Resolved, that the members of this corporation feel & sincerely deplore his loss, and as a mark of respect to his memory they will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days."

HON. ABRAHAM CLARK.—Abraham Clark, known as one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born at the home of his ancestors, on the upper or western road, about midway between Elizabeth Town and the village of Rahway, where his father, Thomas Clark, his grandfather, Thomas, and probably his great-grandfather, Richard, had lived before him. The latter became a resident of the town in 1678. The Clark mansion was about half a mile north by west of the Wheat-Sheaf tavern.

Thomas Clark had at least three sons and one daughter,—Thomas, born 1701; Abraham, born 1703; James, of Connecticut Farms; and Mrs. Day. Capt. Abraham Clark, commander of the troops, resided directly west of his eldest brother, Thomas, and outlived him but fifteen days. The youngest brother and the sister lived to a great age. Thomas, the eldest, was one of the charter aldermen of the borough of Elizabeth. His grandson, Dr. Abraham Clark, says he was "Judge and, I believe, keeper of the Kings arms, as many muskets and cartouche boxes with the letters 'G. R.' on their covers remained in the house until used by our patriots." He died Sept. 11, 1765, and was the Judge Clark referred to elsewhere, who was buried without pomp or profuseness of expense, as had until then been so common.

Abraham, the signer, was his only son, and was born at the homestead on Feb. 15, 1726. "His nearest neighbors were his uncle Abraham on the west; Lewis Mulford, a strict Puritan, on the north; Capt. Jonathan Hampton, an Episcopalian, a member of the Colonial Assembly, who lived in the handsome style of a gentleman of the old school,' on the east; and a 'noble farmer, Ephraim Terrill, another captain of troopers, an Episcopalian, a man of strong mind and social qualities,' on the south."

Mr. Clark received a good business education for the times, and entered into business as a surveyor and conveyancer. He made himself familiar with the common points of law, and was ever ready to aid his neighbor with legal advice gratuitously, and so obtained the sobriquet of "The Poor Man's Counselor." In 1764 he was appointed by the Legislature one of the commissioners to survey and divide the common lands of the old township of Bergen.¹ He held the office of high sheriff of Essex County in 1767 and of clerk to the Colonial Assembly; he was a member of the Committee of Safety in December, 1774, and subsequently their secretary; he was chosen to the Provincial Congress in September, 1775, and was elected by them, June 22, 1776, one of the delegates from New Jersey to the Continental Congress, in which capacity he had the honor of affixing his name to the Declaration of Independence.

He was rechosen to Congress in 1776 and in 1777, serving until April 3, 1778; again in 1780, 1781, 1782, 1786, 1787, and 1788. He was appointed to the first Constitutional Convention at Annapolis in 1786, and again in 1787, but did not attend the latter on account of ill health. He was chosen by the people under the new Constitution to the second and third Congresses, and died before the completion of his last term. During his long public career he proved himself the incorruptible patriot, an active and judicious legislator, a prudent counselor, and a true friend of the people.

His death was occasioned by a coup-de-soleil, a stroke of the sun, which he survived but two hours. Great respect was shown for his memory on the occasion of his funeral. His remains were deposited in the burying-ground of the Presbyterian Church of Rahway. A stone with the following inscription marked the spot:

"In memory of ABRAHAM CLARK, Esq., who died Sept. 15th, 1794, in the 69th year of his age, | Firm and decided as a patriot, | Zealous and faithful as a friend to the public, | He loved his country, | And adhered to her cause | In the darkest hours of her struggles | Against oppression."

The New Jersey Journal of the following week says "he was uniform and consistent, adorning that religion that he had early made a profession of by acts of charity and benevolence."

It was also said of him that "in private life he was reserved and contemplative. Limited in his circumstances, moderate in his desires, and unambitious of wealth, he was far from being parsimonious in his private concerns, although a rigid economist in public affairs."

He had long been a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth Town, and was one of its trustees from 1786 to 1790. "His person was of the common height, his form slender, his eyebrows heavy." He is characterized as having been "very temperate."

Mr. Clark married, about the year 1749, Sarah, the eldest daughter of Isaac Hatfield, sister of Elder Isaac Hatfield, and first cousin of Mrs. Robert Ogden, the mother of Gen. Matthias and Governor Aaron Ogden. She was born in 1728, survived her husband nearly ten years, and died June 2, 1804. They had ten children.

CHAPTER XVI.

EARLY LAWYERS, COURTS, AND JUDGES.

THE first lawyer of whom we find any reference in the county was a Capt. Hackett, a New England shipmaster. Being a Yankee, he possessed the usual genius of that versatile nation, and could not only sail a ship, but expound maritime law with such force as to overwhelm a jury with the weight of his arguments. It is recorded that "the jury went forth, and upon a second and third going forth declared to the court that the matter committed to them is of too great weight for them, and desired the court to make choice of other jurymen." This ponderous and insupportable load thrown upon the jury, we are informed, consisted of an argument of much ability made by Capt. Hackett, in which he presented "no less than fourteen points as grounds of defence." But we must tell the whole story.

The first jury trial in Elizabeth Town of which any record has been preserved took place in May, 1671. A special court, consisting of Capt. William Sandford, president; Robert Vauquellin, Robert Treat, and William Pardon, was convened in the town on the 16th by order of Governor Carteret, for the trial of William Hackett, captain of the sloop "Indeavor," of Salsbury, in the county of Norfolk, in New England, for illegal trading in the province, mostly at Woodbridge. Governor Lovelace claimed that all vessels coming in and going out of Sandy Hook entrance should enter and clear at New York. Governor Carteret opposed the claim so far as concerned the waters of New Jersey, demanding that in order to trade in these parts entrance and clearance should be made at the custom-house in Elizabeth Town.

Capt. Hackett had entered his vessel and paid duties at New York, but not here. A jury was impaneled, consisting of Benjamin Price, foreman, Nicholas Carter, William Pyles, George Ross, Barnabas Wines, Nathaniel Bonnel, Matthias Hatfield, John Wynings, William Oliver, Stephen Osburn, William Meeker, and John Woodruff, all freeholders of the town and the most of them leading men. Governor Carteret testified for the prosecution. Capt. Hackett argued his own cause with much ability, presenting no less than fourteen points as grounds of defense. Then followed the result already described, the jury overwhelmed with such weight that after three successive trials they were unable to render a verdict and asked to be relieved. On the 18th the case was brought before another jury, who seem to have stood it better. These were Samuel Hopkins and Capt. Thomas Young, of Elizabeth Town, and the remainder from Bergen and Woodbridge. The dignity of New Jersey was vindicated and the vessel forfeited.¹

On the 14th of December, 1671, an act was passed constituting a Court of Oyer and Terminer, and another for the appointment of a marshal for the province. There were no counties yet organized in the province, and consequently no sheriff or other county officers. A writ was issued Feb. 10, 1672, authorizing and appointing Capt. John Berry, president, Robert Vauquellin, Samuel Edsal, Robert Bond, Capt. John Pyke, Capt. Robert Treat, William Pardon, or any three of them, to be a court, to meet or sit on Tuesday morning, February 27th, at nine o'clock, at the town-house in Elizabeth Town. The object of convening this court was the punishment of the so-called rioters of the previous June, the story of which is told by Hatfield, as follows:

Among the "menial servants" brought over by Capt. Carteret in the "Philip" in 1665 was Richard Michell. He was "the son of Symon Michell, of Munden parva, in the County of Hereford," England. Richard had married, April 23, 1668, Ellen Prou, "the daughter of Charles Prou, of Paris, in the parish of St. Eutache, in France." She, too, had come over, doubtless, in the "Philip," and was also a "menial servant," possibly a housekeeper in the government house. Michell, as well as Vallot, aspires to be a planter. Carteret, well pleased with Richard's course, and willing to reward his faithful services, takes it upon himself, without consulting the town, or any other than his own pleasure, to make him a grant of land for a house-lot, bordering on "the swamp in common," and lying at the rear of the house-lots of Francis Barber and George Pack, south of Charles Tucker, S. E. of Jonas Wood, and N. E. of William Letts. This was in the spring of 1671. Michell fences it in, and leases a part of the ground to George Pack for a tobacco crop. On the other part he builds a house covered with clapboards and lays out a gar-

All this was contrary to the fundamental agreements of 1666, made in town-meeting, and consented to by the Governor. None but the people in town-meeting could determine who should be admitted as associates and freeholders. It was a clear case of usurpation on the part of Carteret. If tolerated in this instance it might be followed by many others, and presently the town would be overrun by Frenchmen and other foreigners, claiming an equal share with themselves in the plantation. If not resisted they might as well give up all thought of self-government.

The town was deeply moved by the occurrence. It was the common talk. The neighbors had occasion to meet at Goodman Carter's on the south side of the creek. The matter was warmly discussed. They agreed to give Pack warning not to put a plow into the ground. He and Letts were greatly grieved at their prospective loss, but deemed it best to regard the timely warning. A town-meeting was called, at which the whole subject was gravely debated. Here is the record:

"June 19th, 1671, it was agreed by the Major Vote that Richard Michell should not enjoy his lott given him by the Governor. Upon this information, June 19th, 1671, it was agreed that there should some goe the next morning and pull up the said Michell's fence."

The Governor must be taught that it is not his to give away town-lots; it belongs to the people. Michell had "never asked the town for it," and therefore could not have the "lott given him by the Governor." It was "concluded to take the piece of land from him again, because it was not after vote of the town he had it." What followed is thus related by George Pack:

"The next morning after the said town-meeting the said Richard Michell came to my house, and I went with him up to the said lot, and going we came to the said Wm. Letts' house, and lighted our pipes, and when we had lighted people came upon the said ground. Goodman Meeker, the young John Ogden, Jeffrey Jones, and Nicholas Carter, and we running down to them at the corner of said lot, the said Richard Michell forewarned them of pulling down the said fence, and spake to them of a riot, upon that Goodman Meeker put it and began to pluck down the fence, and then all the rest did the like, and left not off till they had plucked down one side and one end."

Among those who aided in the work, as Letts, Michell, and Ronyon testified, were Joseph Meeker (the "eldest son" of Goodman Meeker), Hur Tomson (son of Goodman Tomson), "old Mash" (Samuel Marsh, Sr.), and Luke Watson, the lieutenant. When Michell forewarned them,

"Goodman Meeker answered, Do you forewarn me? and with that went to pull it down. While they were so doing Mr. Pardon came in, then they asked him whether he was come to help pull down the fence, and Mr. Pardon answered that he did not come to pull down the fence, but to take notice what you do, the said John Ogden said we do not care if a hundred such fellows as you are do take notice of what we do, and Mr. Pardon answered, You speak very sanisly. Luke Watson did not put his hand to pull down the fence, but said if I am in [the] piece it's as good, but after Mr. Pardon came then he heaved one log off from the the fence and said you shall not say but I will put my hands to it.

"A while after, 6:30 Letts, being at my own house, there came in Robert Moss and Mr. Crayne, of this town, who asked for drink, and I having none they went away presently, and presently after they were gone I heard a noise and looked out and saw the said Robert Moss and Mr. Crayne beating down the clabboards of Richard Michell's house and plucked up the pallsides of the garden, and, before I came, the hogs, within an hour's time, had rooted up and spoiled all that was in the garden which was full of necessary garden herbs."

Pardon was one of the Governor's Council, and had been appointed, June 5, 1671, a justice of the peace. He was known to be the Governor's obsequious parasite. Morse and Crane were next-door neighbors, residing on the west side of the creek. It is probable that not a few others, drawn thither by curiosity, especially of the boys of the neighborhood, witnessed the transaction, and spoke of it in later years as one of the memorable incidents of their pioneer life.

Warm work it was for a midsummer's day (June 20th), but needful work, unless they are prepared to succumb to the whims and dictates of the cavalier lordling sent over the seas by a brace of corrupt speculators to exercise arbitrary rule over these honest and sturdy planters. It was a day to be remembered in the annals of Elizabeth, a day for the inauguration of an open and determined resistance to all usurpation, and a manly defense of their vested rights. They acted as one man, and were not to be trifled with. Carteret and his adherents are powerless to withstand the tide, and however chagrined and vexed at the result, are compelled for the present to let the matter drop. William Meeker, the chief actor in the drama, is chosen constable of the town to succeed William Cramer, and receives, Oct. 13, 1671, a commission from the Governor.²

A court was convened to try these rioters.

All the members of the court, with the exception of Messrs. Bond and Treat, were of the Governor's Council. Seven of the jury were from Woodbridge and five from Bergen, none of Elizabeth Town or Newark. Messrs. Treat and Vanquellin were absent from the trial.

An indictment was found against William Meeker, Jeffrey Jones, Luke Watson, Nicholas Carter, Samuel Marsh, Sr., John Ogden, Jr., Joseph Meeker, and Hur Thompson for pulling down Michell's fence on the 20th of June. They all appeared in court March 8th, when the indictment was read, and the question guilty or not guilty was put. Not one of them answered; all left the house without putting in any plea, although peremptorily ordered by the court to remain. They saw from the complexion of the court and jury that no justice could be obtained, and they resolved to have nothing to do with such a tribunal, except to treat it with silent contempt.

The trial, however, proceeded in the absence of the defendants. George Pack, William Letts, Vincent Ronyon, William Cramer, Richard Michell, and William Pardon testified for the prosecution, no witnesses for the defense being sworn. The accused were severally brought in guilty of riot, and appearing in court the next day received sentence, William Meeker to pay £5, and each of the others £3, the fines to be collected by distraint. They were never collected. "The marshal, Samuel Moore, of Woodbridge, was powerless in the presence of an outraged and indignant people, whose opposition to the Governor and his party had now become more than determined."¹

Amidst the difficulties which occurred with Governor Carteret for several years all regular procedure of courts was suspended, except justices' courts and those for the trial of small causes. Upon the re-occupation of the province by the Dutch, in 1673, "John Baker, Jacob Melyn, John Ogden, deputies from the village of Elizabeth Town, New-worke, Woodbridge, Piscataway, situate in the Province heretofore called New Jersey," appeared at New York, now called New Orange, "praying by petition that they may be allowed to send some Delegates from their said villages to treat with the Admirals and associate Council of war, respecting the surrender of their towns under the obedience of their High Mightinesses the Lords States of the United Netherlands, and his Serene Highness the Prince of Orange, and that no audience be granted to their late Governor, Capt. John Berry, before and until the same be granted to the said delegates."

August 19th. The Deputies from the Towns of Elizabeth Towne, New-worke, Woodbridge, Piscataway, Middletowne, and Shronsbury appearing are ordered to call together the inhabitants of their respective towns, and have them nominate by plurality of votes a double number of Schepens or Magistrates of said Towns; also from each Town to elect two Deputies, who shall meet together as one board, and then nominate, by the greater number of votes, three persons for schout and three for secretary over the said six Towns."²

John Ogden, Sr., Samuel Hopkins, and Jacob Melyn were elected schepens for Elizabeth Town, and ordered by the Council at New Orange to "come hither on the first opportunity to be sworn in."³

The several towns chose their deputies, who met and made nominations for schout and secretary, or, as we would say, sheriff and clerk, although the schout, under the Dutch system, discharged the additional function of president judge of the court. These nominations being presented to the general and Council of War, Sept. 1, 1673, Mr. John Ogden was chosen schout and Mr. Samuel Hopkins secretary of the six towns. The Dutch commission to these officers reads as follows:

"Giving & by these presents granting unto the ^{sa} John Ogden & Samuel Hopkins & each of them, full power strenght & authority in their said offices. The said Schout together wth y^e Schepens or magistrates of y^e respective Townes to Rule & govern eas well their Inhabitants as Strangers and y^e ^{sa} Samuel Hopkins to adminioister the office of Secretarij in y^e ^{sa} Townes."⁴

The first duty performed by the schout and secretary appears to have been the taking of "an inventory of the estate of the late Governor Carteret." Under the authority of an order issued September 7th, and by the aid of some soldiers sent up as a posse committatus from New Orange, they arrested Robert Laprairie (Vauquellin), the surveyor-general, who had "removed diverse goods from the house of Philip Carteret, which he refuseth to restore; also one John Singletary, who refuses to obey their commands." Both of these parties were taken to New York and examined before the Council; they at first denied the charges preferred against them, but four days later, Mr. Ogden being present, the charges were sustained. Singletary was fined £5 and put on his good behavior; Vauquellin was found guilty, both of contumacy and sedition, and was sentenced "to be banished as an example to others."⁵

The schout and secretary were "furthermore ordered to summon James Bollen, late Secretary of the Province of New Jersey, to deliver up, agreeably to former order, the Governor's papers within the space of ten days after this date, or in default thereof his property shall be at the disposal of the Honorable Council."

The schout and schepens of this court were a presidential and also, to some extent, a legislative body. Oct. 1, 1673, instructions were sent by the Council of War to Schout Ogden and the schepens of the town "for the preservation of the public peace and the administration of Justice." Among other things it was provided that

"The Sheriff and Magistrates shall, each in his quality, take care that the Reformed Christiⁿ Religion be maintained in conformity to the Synod of Dortrecht, without permitting any other sects attempting anything contrary thereto. Power was given them for the 'laying out highways, setting off lands and gardens and in like manner what appertains to agriculture, observance of the Sabbath, erecting churches, school-houses, or similar public works.' The Sheriff was to 'take good care that the places under his charge should be cleared of all moles, gamblers, whore-houses, and such like iniquities; to receive the half of all civil fines accruing during his term of office, together with one-third part of what belongs to the respective villages from criminal cases.' In the nomination of schepens, 'a double number of the best qualified, the honestest, most intelligent, and wealth est inhabitants, exclusively of the R-formed Christian Religion or at least well affected thereto,' were to be presented to the Governor for his election."⁶

This court also had charge of Indian affairs in the local settlements. Schout Ogden writes Governor Clove, September 29th (O. S.), respecting the apprehension of an Indian who, shortly before, had carried off considerable property from the residents of Elizabeth Town and refused to restore it. The Governor in his reply speaks of "the Chiefs and Sachems hereabouts," from which it would appear that Indians were still in the vicinity in considerable numbers. He says, "I have once more thought fit that the Indian Sachem be summoned before me to give satisfaction about it." A messenger was sent, but what the result was is not recorded. The Dutch Governor also says in this communication: "Let Mr. Hopkins examine upon what Conditions the Tenants are seated upon the plantations of Captain Carteret, and account thereof return to me. Not else at present, but that I am Your Loving friend, A: CLOVE."¹

Governor Carteret had gone to England. After an absence of more than two years he returned to his home in Elizabeth Town, November, 1674. The government was reorganized under the Concessions, so modified as to give the Governor the control of the Legislature, and deprive the people of all original jurisdiction. In the proclamation of the Governor and Council, dated Elizabeth Town, Dec. 11, 1674, the people who had resisted the usurpations of the Governor and the prerogatives of royalty were stigmatized as "malcontent inhabitants" and "seditious spirits," who had taken advantage of the arrival of the Dutch "to cover their former guilt with the mantle of treason." As if this insult flattered in the face of a free and spirited people was not sufficient, they resolved not to commission any person to office, either civil or military, except such as have obtained patents for their lands of the Lords Proprietors, nor to grant the privileges of a corporation to any others. This was a blow aimed directly at the Elizabeth Town Associates, who it was well known obtained their lands not from the proprietors, but by purchase from the Indians and patent from Governor Nicolls directly under the Duke of York. Although Carteret at first acknowledged the validity of this title, not only verbally but practically, by taking a share in their grant and becoming himself an associate proprietor, he subsequently set himself to compel the Associates and all who held lands in their plantation to get out new patents, and thus subject themselves to the obligation of paying the proprietors the usual quit-rents. The struggle over this question was a long and severe one, into the particulars of which we cannot fully enter in this place. The final settlement of it will be found in another part of this history.

The first General Assembly after the restoration of the English rule was held at Elizabeth Town in November, 1675, beginning on Friday, the 5th, and continuing until the 13th. Of the townsmen Henry Lyon and Benjamin Pierce were the members of the House. At this session Elizabeth Town and Newark were constituted a county, which was the first county erected in the province of New Jersey. The Dutch had no such municipalities in New Netherland, nor had the English any in New York until 1669. A treasurer was appointed for the province with a salary of twenty shillings per annum. This favored individual was Jacob Meleyn, of Elizabeth Town. At an adjourned session the code of 1668 was revised, enlarged, and re-enacted. The Legislature also passed a respectable Sunday law in the words following:

"Whosoever shall prophane the Lords Day, otherwise called Sunday, by any kind of servile work, unlawful recreations, or unnecessary travels on that day, not falling within the compass of works of mercy or necessity, either wilfully or through careless neglect, shall be punished by fine, imprisonment, or corporally, according to the nature of the offence, at the judgment of the Court Justice or Justices where the offence is committed."

At the close of the session was passed the famous "Act of Oblivion," so called from its proposal to bury all the troubles of the preceding five years. It is in these words, copied from Leaming and Spicer, page 110:

"That there shall be an utter abolishing of all actions tending to recover damages, costs, and charges for any action committed or done against any one within this Province, that hath been a party or any way concerned in the end-avoring and making an alteration in the government here settled by the Lords, anytime from the year 1670 until June, 1673."

Two sessions of the Assembly were held in 1676, the first beginning April 6th, at Elizabeth Town, and the second from the 5th to the 8th of October, at Woodbridge. The most conspicuous act at the latter session was the establishment by law of the autumnal Thanksgiving Day commonly held in New England. At this time and for years previous Isaac Whitehead, town clerk of Elizabeth Town, served as clerk of the House of Deputies.

The Legislature convened by Andros passed no laws relating to jurisprudence. The province had been divided by agreement of the proprietors into East and West New Jersey, the eastern portion falling to Sir George Carteret, who made his will Dec. 5, 1678, devising his portion of the province to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. Sir George died Jan. 14, 1680. For two years the government (of East Jersey) was administered in the name of "The Right Honorable the Lady Elizabeth Carteret, Baroness, Widow, the Relict and sole Executrix of the Right Honorable Sir George Carteret, Knight and Baronet, deceased, late Lord Proprietor of the said Province, and Grandmother and Guardian of Sir George Carteret, Baronet, Grandson, and Heir of the said Sir George Carteret, deceased, the present Lady Proprietrix of the Province aforesaid."² In the mean time fruitless efforts were made to find a purchaser for East Jersey. At length the province with its civil jurisdiction, together with all arrearages of rent and sums of money due to the late proprietor, was disposed of to the highest bidder, the purchasers being an association of twelve persons, residents of London and vicinity, and most of them members of the Society of Friends. Among them were William Penn, Thomas Rudyard, and Samuel Groome. Soon after the number of associates was doubled, six being added from

Scotland and the remainder mostly from London. Among the Scotch associates were James Drummond, Earl of Perth and Lord High Chancellor of Scotland, a thorough monarchist of the Stuart type, and subsequently a Papist and an exiled Jacobite; his brother, David Drummond, and Robert Barclay, of Urie, the Quaker apologist. One of the new associates was Gawen Laurie, the Quaker merchant of London. Thus, as has been remarked by an able historian, "one proprietor was exchanged for twenty-four and the Cavalier for the Quaker rule."¹ The deed of lease and release whereby the province was conveyed to the new proprietors was executed Feb. 1 and 2, 1682, and the price paid for the property and privileges was £3400.

The government of East Jersey was soon inaugurated. It is no part of our province in this history to speak of West Jersey, which maintained a separate government and jurisdiction, with its capital at Burlington, down to the surrender of the province to Queen Anne in 1702. Of East Jersey Elizabeth Town was made the capital, and remained such until superseded by Perth Amboy, the new commercial metropolis which the proprietors attempted to build at the mouth of the Raritan River.²

Robert Barclay was appointed Governor of East Jersey in the spring of 1682, with the privilege of non-residence and of acting by deputy. It is said that he had been first a Presbyterian and then a Papist. He became converted to the principles of the Quakers, and wrote a book in their defense. He was held in high esteem by William Penn, and was also in favor with the royal family. Thomas Rudyard was appointed Deputy Governor, and Samuel Groome receiver and surveyor-general. They took up their residence at Elizabeth Town Nov. 13, 1682.

Probably the first lawyer regularly educated and trained for the bar was Deputy Governor Thomas Rudyard. He was regularly admitted to the English bar, and was a barrister in the city of London before he became one of the twenty-four associate proprietors and was chosen to fill the office of Deputy Governor of East Jersey under Barclay. There is no evidence that he practiced law in Elizabeth Town, or in New Jersey; but his talents and legal training were of great service as head of the executive and legislative departments of the government at a time when anything like systematic jurisprudence was in an incipient state, and had to be created, or at least developed and set in order, by those who had in a very large measure the shaping and directing of the local civil affairs of the province. The arrival of Rudyard at Elizabeth Town was the signal for a better state of affairs, both locally and throughout the province. He came with conciliatory letters from the proprietors; he was a man of amiable instincts, and of a friendly and courteous demeanor, representing not the lordly cavalier of a proud and imperious court, but a trading and agricultural association, of which the members were chiefly plain and unassuming men. Rudyard's family, also, were quite an accession to the settlement. He brought with him his two adult daughters, Margaret and Anne, and, it is thought, his two sons, Benjamin and John, designing to identify his interest fully with those of the country. He obtained a grant of three thousand acres of land, mostly on the Rahway and Raritan Rivers, and became a planter on a large scale, thus confirming his declaration of preference for these new settlements over the crowded thoroughfares of London.

Governor Rudyard selected good men for his Council, and appointed local officers high in the confidence of the people. The first General Assembly under his administration convened at Elizabeth Town March 1, 1682, and continued in session until the 28th. Benjamin Price, Sr., of this town, was a member of the Council. At this session East Jersey was divided into four counties,—Bergen, Essex, Middlesex, and Monmouth. The settlements of Elizabeth Town and Newark were included in the county of Essex, whose boundaries are thus defined: "Essex and the county thereof to contain all the settlements between the west side of the Hackensack River and the parting line between Woodbridge and Elizabeth Town, and so to extend westward and northward to the utmost bounds of the Province." Provision was made for the appointment of sheriffs, coroners, justices, clerks, and other officers, and for the erection of county courts, a court of small causes for every town, and a superior court, to be called the Court of Common Right, to be held quarterly at Elizabeth Town. Capt. John Baker and Benjamin Parkis were appointed justices of the Court of Common Right, the highest tribunal at that time in the province except the Governor and Council, to whom appeals could be made in certain cases provided for by law. Capt. John Baker was appointed coroner, George Jewell clerk and messenger of the House, James Emott clerk of the county of Essex and sheriff.

At the adjourned session in May the institution of domestic slavery is introduced for the first time as the subject of distinct enactment. We find the following strong prohibition passed by the Legislature:

"It is found by daily experience that negro and Indian slaves or servants, under pretence of trade, or liberty to traffick, do frequently steal from their masters and others what they expose to sale at distance from their habitations; (and, therefore, they forbade all) barter, trade, or traffick with any negro slave, or Indian slave, or servant, for any rum, brandy, wine, or strong drink, or any other goods, wares, or commodities, living or dead."

Numerous laws, mostly such as had been passed in Carteret's time for the preservation of good morals, the rights of property, and the welfare of the community, were enacted. The same strictness in regard to profanity, intemperance, licentiousness, and Sabbath-breaking was retained. Evidently a healthful tone of morals prevailed in the several settlements, notwithstanding the recent disturbances.¹

At the sessions in December, Benjamin Price, Henry Lyon, and Benjamin Parkis were appointed on the commission to lay out and appoint "all necessary highways, bridges, passages, landings, and ferries for the county of Essex."² As the country was everywhere at this early day infested with wolves, a bounty of fifteen shillings was offered for every wolf's head.

Of the six assessors for the county of Essex, three—Benjamin Price, Benjamin Parkis, and George Ross—were of Elizabeth Town.

Rudyard's administration was brief. In July, 1683, Barclay appointed Gawen Laurie, also one of the proprietors, his deputy for East Jersey. Laurie had been for several years associated with William Penn in the trusteeship of West Jersey, but had not yet come to America. He was a London merchant and of the Society of Friends. He arrived in January, 1684, at the new town of Perth Amboy, bringing with him his wife Mary, his son James, and his two daughters Mary and Rebecca. The latter became the wife of Miles Forster, of Perth Amboy, and her sister Mary married William Haige, of Elizabeth Town. Isabel, the daughter of James, married William Davis, of New York.

Governor Laurie was inaugurated at Elizabeth Town on the 28th of January, 1684, after having spent several days in laying out the streets and lots of the new city of Perth Amboy. Rudyard gracefully retired to the more humble yet responsible position of secretary of the province, but soon after, in August, 1684, became attorney-general of the province of New York.

No sooner had Laurie assumed the reins of government than he wrote home a glowing account of the new country. Under date of March 2, 1684, he wrote to the proprietors from Elizabeth Town as follows:

"Now is the time to send over people for settling Here. The Scots and William Duckwra's people com ag now and settling, advance the Province more than it hath been advanced these ten years. Here wants nothing but people; There is not a poor body in all the province, nor that wants; Here is abundance of provision, Pork and Beef, at 24 per pound. Fi-h and Fowl plenty, Oysters I think would serve all England; Sider good and plenty, for 1d per Quart. Good Venison, plenty brought us in at 18d the quarter, Eggs at 3d per dozen, all things very plenty. Land very good as ever I saw: Wines, Walnuts, Peaches, Strawberries, and many other things plenty in the woods.

"I have put two houses in repair upon the River, called the Point 2 miles from Elizabethtown; have let one of them, with 10 acres of Pasture ground, and 10 acres of Woody ground, for 7 years at 26 lb per annum: the man to clear the ten acres of Woody ground and make it fit for Ploughing or Pasture. I intend to let the other also with some land. All the houses were like to drop down, all the land lying without fence, and a barn quite fallen down and destroyed; another without any cover, and the other next to the house where I dwell, all to pieces, and all the fences and out houses were down, but repaired before I came."³

It is said of Governor Laurie that he carried out fully in his administration the instructions of the proprietors, "to use all means of gentleness and tenderness with the people, and not stand much with them upon small matters." Notwithstanding the desire expressed by the proprietors that he should make the new town of Perth Amboy his capital, he continued to reside at Elizabeth Town till his death, respected and honored by all. The General Assembly convened at Perth Amboy for the first time April 6, 1686, and from this time that town became the permanent seat of government of East Jersey. This was in the second year of the reign of James II., the Duke of York having come to the throne of England under this title upon the death of Charles II., Feb. 6, 1685. Being a Catholic, the news of his accession created great excitement in New Jersey and throughout the colonies. He was, however, soon deposed, and fled to France, when the Protestant prince and princess, William and Mary, were exalted to the throne, 1690.

The brief period of the reign of James II. was one of the most exciting in the early history of the colonies. The king, in order to carry into effect his long-cherished scheme of subjecting all the colonies of North America to his arbitrary and despotic control, commissioned his supple tool, Sir Edmund Andros, captain-general of all New England, with power and authority to bring New York and New Jersey also under his government. This plan of consolidation, although utterly repugnant to the people of New England, who felt called upon to resist it with all their might, was urgently sought by Governor Dongan and the authorities of New York, who were continually writing letters to the king, asking him to annex the other provinces to their territory. Their interest in this was the aggrandizement of New York, by making her the centre and source of government of the consolidated colonies. The mayor and Council of the city of New York, in an address to the king, dated March 2, 1687, insisted on "the absolute necessity there is that those adjacent parts of Connecticut, East and West Jersey, and Pennsylvania should be united to the Province of New York." Andros received his commission, and after arriving in New York, proceeded to New England to fasten the yoke upon the necks of those elder Commonwealths of the Puritans. At length, on the 7th of April, 1688, "the decree went forth that the two Jerseys and New York were united with New England under the rule of Andros, to be governed by the same royal pleasure which for three years had been grinding the liberties of Britain to powder, the whole to be henceforth known as 'New England.'" Andros, in a letter to the king, says he had received the submission of New York on the 11th of October, also of East Jersey on the 15th, and of West Jersey on the 18th following, and had settled all the officers, civil and military. In proclaiming his commission in East Jersey, he proceeded to Elizabeth Town, then the most considerable place in the province, where, we are informed in a letter written by Secretary Randolph, the people "all showed their great satisfaction at being under his Majesty's immediate government." Mr. Hatfield is of the opinion that if there was any "satisfaction" really expressed, beyond that of a few new-comers who gloried in the measures of King James, it must have been because the people felt gratified in being at length rid of the proprietary government, with which they had so long been vexed.¹

Col. Andrew Hamilton, who had succeeded Lord Neill Campbell in the government of East Jersey, was retained by Andros as his deputy, which went far to reconcile the inhabitants to the change, as Hamilton possessed qualities both of mind and heart which secured for him the confidence of all classes. Andros' rule, however, was short and inglorious. His royal master in England was soon dethroned and compelled to flee from his country, while he himself was degraded and imprisoned by the outraged Puritans of Massachusetts Bay. In New York, Capt. Leisler had seized the fort and ousted his officers in that quarter. So closely was Elizabeth Town connected, socially and commercially, with the neighboring city, that these events deeply affected the peace of the community. The agitation here, as elsewhere throughout the country, was deep and profound. On the 28th of June, 1689, a Committee of Safety was chosen, to whom was intrusted the management of the affairs of New York, and of this committee two members were residents of Essex County. "The utmost efforts were put forth by the faction in power to obtain the support of the towns in East Jersey, to overthrow the old governments and to set up their own, but without success, the people here resolving to maintain the existing government until they received orders from the new authorities at home."

Governor Hamilton left the country for England late in May, 1690. The proprietors, determining to reassert their jurisdiction, of which they had been deprived by King James, on the decease of Barclay, Oct. 3, 1690, made choice of Col. Joseph Dudley, who served as Governor until the reappointment of Hamilton, March 25, 1692. Hamilton convened the Assembly at Amboy in the following September. The principal work of this session was the adoption of measures to aid New York against an invasion by the French. Hamilton continued to administer the government for the proprietors, but it was evident a crisis was approaching. The proprietary government was doomed. It had been re-established in a moment of transition from the dynasty of the Stuarts to that of the Prince of Orange, in which the ministry was too much absorbed to give attention to such a colonial incident. Soon, however, the subject was taken up by the new ministry; their assent was withheld from the appointment of the board at London, and the jurisdiction of the courts denied to any of their appointees. In accordance with a law requiring the colonial Governors to be natives of England, Hamilton was superseded by Jeremiah Basse in April, 1698. Being an Englishman, and in sympathy with the opposition, he was opposed by the American proprietors. The people soon learned to hold the government in contempt; revolt ensued; the leaders were imprisoned, but were speedily released by the populace.

In May, 1699, Basse left the government in the hands of Andrew Bowne, president of the Council, and sailed for England. Bowne's exercise of authority was no more respected than his predecessor's, although it stirred up less resistance. The return of Hamilton at the close of 1699 with a new commission served still more to complicate matters. In the course of the following spring and summer the opposition openly revolted. The Assembly called to meet in May, 1700, demanded of Hamilton credentials from the king, and were dissolved the same day. A period of strife and violence followed, the courts were broken up, sheriffs and others were obstructed in serving processes, and, as during Basse's rule, there were "mutual breaking of Gaols, rescuing of Prisoners, and beating and abusing of officers."²

We have recited these facts to show how impossible it was during this period that courts should have been regularly maintained and law properly administered. It was a period in which anarchy was the rule and order the exception. At a meeting of the county court in Elizabeth Town March 12, 1700, the sheriff having been ordered to arrest Samuel Carter for contempt of court, the "noise and howling of the people" were such that the court was obliged to adjourn. A similar scene took place at the county court in Newark in September. In this confusion of public affairs it was determined to make an appeal directly to the king. A petition was prepared by "the Freeholders, Inhabitants, and owners of Land of and belonging to Elizabeth Town, or Township, and other lands thereunto adjacent, in the Province of East Jersey, in America, in behalf of themselves and many others."

After reciting their title, they say, "The said purchasers and those claiming under them still continued in the possession of the lands by them purchased, and peaceably enjoyed the same until about September, 1693, being about thirty years, and during that time, at great labor and expense, built, planted, and improved the same; and they humbly conceive they ought, according to law, reason, and justice, still to enjoy the same." They then rehearse the troubles to which they had been put in defending their title and their need of an impartial tribunal. They ask, therefore, either to be placed under the civil government of New York, or to have impartial judges appointed to whom all these matters might be referred; and that the usurpers be admonished no more to usurp the royal authority in "constituting courts and commissioning judges."

The names of sixty-five prominent citizens who signed this petition are elsewhere given. The petition was soon answered by the force of events. The anarchy of faction and the reign of disorder terminated at length by the final and unconditional surrender, April 15, 1702, on the part of the proprietors of all claim and right to the jurisdiction of the province. "Then in reality New Jersey, for the first time, became a royal province, governed no longer by a company of land speculators, but directly by the crown. King William died March 8, 1702, and Anne, Princess of Denmark, ascended the throne. A royal Governor of the combined provinces of New York and New Jersey was appointed Dec. 5, 1702, in the person of Edward Hyde, Lord Viscount Cornbury, cousin to her Majesty. In May, 1703, on the arrival of the royal commission, the proprietary government of East Jersey was brought to a perpetual end."

Whether Governor Philip Carteret was a lawyer or not is not positively certain, but it is evident that he managed many cases in court, and manifested no little skill and knowledge as well as tact and shrewdness. One of these occasions was when he was kidnapped and taken before a special Court of Assizes in New York by Governor Andros, in May, 1680. He was tried for "presuming to exercise jurisdiction and government over His Majesty's subjects within the bounds of His Majesty's Letters Patent, granted to His Royal Highness the Duke of York." Carteret presented his commission with other instructions in his vindication. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. "Upon which," says Carteret in a letter to Bollen, "he (the judge) asked them questions and demanded their reasons, which I pleaded was contrary to law for a jury to give reasons after their verdict is given in; nevertheless he sent them twice or thrice out, giving them new charges, which I pleaded as at first to be contrary to law, notwithstanding the last verdict of the jury being according to the first brought in by them,—'the prisoner at the bar not guilty,'—upon which I was acquitted accordingly."

This was a triumph for Carteret with the jury, and in law and justice, although the partisan judges felt it necessary to append to the record:

"But the court declare their opinion and judgment that if he, the said Capt. Carteret, shall go to New Jersey, he should give security or engagement not to assume any authority or jurisdiction there, civil or military."

Benjamin Price, Esq., attorney-at-law in New York, 1725, was a grandson of Benjamin Price, one of the original Associates.

Colonial Courts.—Upon the assumption of the government by the queen of England in 1702, a Governor of the province was appointed and commissioned to hold his office during the pleasure of the sovereign. The executive power was vested in the Governor with the advice of twelve councilors, appointed originally by the crown, but afterwards, generally, by the Governor himself. Six of these were taken from East Jersey and six from West Jersey, five constituting a quorum. The legislative power consisted of the same, with the addition of a General Assembly elected by virtue of writs under the great seal of the province, and convened, adjourned, or dissolved at the pleasure of the executive. The apportionment for members of Assembly was as follows: Two for the inhabitants and householders of Perth Amboy, and ten for the freeholders of East Jersey; two for the inhabitants and householders of Burlington, and ten for the freeholders of West Jersey. This arrangement was somewhat modified by an act passed in 1709 making the representatives elective by a majority of the votes of the freeholders of each county. Each freeholder, in order to be entitled to vote, should own one hundred acres of land or be worth fifty pounds current money; and the person elected to the Assembly should have one thousand acres of land in his own right, or be worth five hundred pounds in real and personal estate. Voting by ballot was not introduced generally until after the Revolution, nor in all the counties until 1797. The Assemblies met not annually, but only occasionally as the Governor saw fit to convene them. For example, from the surrender to the crown to the Revolution, a period of seventy-four years, there were twenty-two Assemblies, some of which continued but one year, others longer, and one from 1761 to 1769, eight years. In 1768 an act was passed providing that a General Assembly should be held once in seven years at least.¹ All colonial and county officers, even including the clerks of the Assembly, were appointed either by the crown or by the Governor and Council, and were required to take a certain prescribed oath of fidelity and allegiance.

The courts of the colonial period, which still exist in a modified form, were instituted by Lord Cornbury, under authority of Queen Anne, by an ordinance promulgated in 1704. They consisted of (1) justices' courts, which had cognizance of cases to the amount of forty shillings; (2) Courts of Common Pleas in each county, having power to try all actions at common law; (3) Courts of General Sessions of the peace, each with quarterly terms, having civil and criminal jurisdiction in certain cases; (4) a Supreme Court for the province, to sit once in each year at Perth Amboy and at Burlington, and to have cognizance of all pleas, civil, criminal, and mixed, as fully as the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer in England; (5) a Court of Chaucery, at first constituted of the Governor and any three members of his Council. This was changed by Governor Hunter, who during his administration exercised the powers of chancellor alone, which practice, being sanctioned by the king, became the constitution of the court, and so remained till the adoption of the constitution of 1844. The rules of practice were first systematized under the chancellorship of Governor Williamson in 1818.

"In 1714 the Supreme Court was required to hold two terms yearly in each place, and courts for the trial of issues were appointed to be held yearly in each county. . . . The times and places of holding the courts and the length of the terms were from time to time altered, but the constitution and powers of the courts remained the same, except that in 1724, no doubt through the influence of the proprietors, the jurisdiction of the Common Pleas was restricted so as to except causes wherein the right or title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments were in any wise concerned. After 1751 the Supreme Court fixed the times for holding the circuits. The jurisdiction of these several courts remains to this day as established by the ordinance of 1724."

CHAPTER XVII.

BENCH AND BAR OF UNION COUNTY.

In our chapter on early courts and jurisprudence the bench and bar have been foreshadowed, appearing in various degrees of dignity from the frontier court for the trial of small causes up to the Supreme Court of the colony and the State. The elegant barrister of the nineteenth century has been adumbrated in his unprofessional prototype of the seventeenth century. Thus all things proceed by a law of evolution. The contrast in the outward symbols of dignity which have accompanied the march of jurisprudence is not less marked or impressive than that exhibited in the mental furniture and equipments of judges and lawyers themselves. The backwoods justice presiding in his shirt-sleeves in some frontier cabin is certainly a very different picture from the ermined chief justice of the highest modern court, presiding in gilded and frescoed apartments.

These changes which marked the advance of civilization had been passed through in the Old World, but they had to be repeated in the New, where everything in the beginning was in a crude and wild state of nature; the forests had first to be subdued and homes made, society had to grow, the diversified political, social, industrial, and commercial relations of man had to be developed before the laws and judicial customs known to all civilized races could be applied except in their crudest and simplest forms. The people of this country, being of the same race and blood as those of England, only needed time and opportunity to develop here from the root of English law a grander tree of liberty and justice than that which shelters the broad empire of Great Britain.

Little is known of a regular bar in connection with the courts of New Jersey till about the middle of the eighteenth century. Some lawyers there were previous to that, especially in the chief towns, who had been regularly bred to the profession. Some of this class were among the officials sent over from England who participated in the early governments of the colony, such men as Thomas Rudyard, Deputy Governor in 1682, and Lord Cornbury, the first Governor under Queen Anne. Half a century later William Livingston, who had studied law with James Alexander, the former surveyor-general of New Jersey, then in practice in New York, came into practice in the courts of New Jersey, and soon after settled in Elizabeth Town. About the same time John De Hart, Esq., became a practitioner in the same town. These were followed by Robert Ogden, Jr., called the "honest lawyer," who had acquired a large practice before the Revolution. So far as we know these were all the regular lawyers in what is now Union County previous to the struggle for independence.

Some, without any legal education or training, practiced as amateur attorneys, doing a sort of law business for their less informed neighbors and attending to small causes in justices' and other inferior courts. Such in many instances stood in the way of the regular profession.

A prejudice existed against the legal fraternity at an early day, which in New England for a time assumed quite a bitter form. It was felt there and more or less in all the colonies till after the Revolution. This prejudice grew out of the antagonism between the laboring and professional classes at a period when the majority belonged to the former and were struggling hard against the adversities of a new country. Lawyers were looked upon by them as a class of people trying to get their living without work, and, withal, feeling themselves somewhat superior beings. This prejudice prevailed in New Jersey as early as 1769, and after the Revolution was fanned into a fresh flame, both against the lawyers and the courts, on account of their agency in enforcing the payment of debts and contracts when the people were greatly impoverished on account of the war. A notable illustration of this occurred in this county. The people at that time were clamorous for stay laws. Abraham Clark, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, was a member of the Legislature, and sided with the popular feeling. He was supposed to have been the author of a bill entitled "An Act for Regulating and Shortening the Proceedings of the Courts of Law," afterwards known as "Clark's Law." It did not pass, but in advocating it its author made the remark, "If it succeeds, it will tear off the ruffles from the lawyers' wrists."

The custom of wearing not only ruffled wristbands, but ruffled bosoms, prevailed at that day. Barristers in court also wore gowns and wigs. "When sitting in court the justices of the Supreme Court wore a robe of office, and commonly a wig, although it is not probable that, like their brethren in England, they considered it necessary to carry four of these indispensable articles, namely, the brown scratch wig for the morning when not in court; the powdered dress wig for dinner; the tie wig, with the black coif, when sitting on the civil side of the court; and the full buttoned one for the criminal side."

The following custom, however, did prevail until within the memory of many now living: "The ordinance establishing the circuits required the high sheriff, justices of the peace, the mayor and aldermen of any corporation within the counties, and all officers of any of the courts to be attending on the chief justice and other justices going the circuit at his coming into and leaving the several counties, and during his abode within the same; and the practice, as it was in England until the introduction of railways, was for the sheriff, with as many justices and other gentlemen on horseback as he could conveniently collect, to await the arrival of the judge at the county line, to which he was in like manner escorted by the officers of the adjoining county, and escort him to his lodgings. At the opening and closing of the court from day to day, the sheriff and constables, with their staves of office, escorted him from and to his place of lodging to the court-house, as was indeed the usual custom until very recently."¹

We append a list of the lawyers of this bar, so far as a record can be found of them, together with the dates of their admission to practice, to which are added some biographical sketches both of lawyers and judges.

GOVERNOR WILLIAM LIVINGSTON was a member of this bar. He was born in 1724, graduated at Yale College in 1741, studied law in New York with James Alexander, and attained to considerable prominence as a lawyer there before he removed to Elizabeth Town. The principal monument of his legal attainments in early manhood is found in his "Answer" to the Elizabeth Town Bill in Chancery, prepared by him at the instance of the town committee in 1750. He was then about twenty-six years of age. He soon after settled in Elizabeth Town, and practiced law in the courts of New Jersey and New York till the conflict between the colonies and the mother-country opened to him a more brilliant field in the public service. He entered with all his energy into the struggle of the colonies for independence, being on all local committees from the time of the passage of the Stamp Act to the beginning of actual hostilities, when, with a general's commission, he was placed in command of the important post at his own town to thwart the movements of the enemy from Staten Island. With John DeHart, Stephen Crane, and Richard Smith, he was a delegate to the first General Congress in 1774, and a member of the Council of Safety and the Provincial Congress of New Jersey. William Franklin, the apostate son of the great patriot, Benjamin Franklin, had been the last colonial Governor, and in his adherence to the British had thrown every obstacle in the way of popular rights. The people had deposed him, taken the reins into their own hands, organized a Provincial Congress in place of his arbitrary Legislature, adopted a Republican constitution, and when a suitable chief magistrate was wanted for the new-born State Livingston was called for, and found to be the man for the situation. He was chosen the first Governor of the State of New Jersey, Aug. 31, 1776, and by successive elections was kept in the office till the close of his life, a period of fourteen years. "It was certainly a most happy Providence," says a late writer, "that gave to New Jersey during the trying time of the Revolution, and for several following years, a Governor so well fitted by his character and acquirements not only to inspire the people with courage and perseverance, and to co-operate heartily with Washington during all the changes of a war to which they were especially exposed, but to guide the Legislature in the inauguration of the new and untried system of government. Chosen but for a single year, it was important to have a man of sufficient popularity to secure a re-election in spite of the cavils of those whose plans he found it necessary to oppose. With but the smallest amount of power or patronage, and besides his important judicial functions as chancellor and ordinary, being only the presiding officer of the Legislative Council, with only a casting vote, it was equally important to have a man of decided Republican principles and sound legal attainments, that he might exercise a salutary influence over legislation so liable to take a wrong direction. All these qualities were combined in Livingston, and although his writings show how much he was dissatisfied with those legislative measures which interfered so wrongfully between debtor and creditor, it is evident from an inspection of the statutes enacted while he was Governor that many of the most important of them were drawn by him, or underwent his careful revision."

He opposed the passage of the laws making the depreciated Continental money a legal tender, and, with reference to this matter, uttered a sentiment worthy to be engraved over every hall of legislation in the world: "No acts of Assembly have hitherto been able to reconcile me to cheating according to law, or convince me that human legislation can alter the immutable duties of morality." It was this kind of legislation that he satirized in the following verse:

"For useless a house-door, e'en if he would lock it,
 When any insolent legislative brother
 Can legally enter into a man's pocket
 And prescribe all his cash into another."

As soon as peace was proclaimed Governor Livingston left Trenton, where he had resided for three years, and returned to his house at Elizabeth Town. He was glad to be able to relinquish his wandering life, to enter again his deserted library, and to employ some of his leisure in restoring the comforts of home. A letter to his wife, written in 1783, shows that he was attached with strong interest to his home, both as a place of security for his two unmarried daughters, and to place his wife in an independent situation in case of his decease. He says, "I have a good estate left, if I can but get the time to put it in order."

In May, 1787, he was appointed by the Legislature one of the delegates to the convention assembled to form the Constitution of the United States. He took his seat in June, was a constant attendant upon its deliberations, affixed his name to the draught finally agreed upon, and was a decided advocate of its ratification by the States. In his message to the Legislature, in August, 1788, he heartily congratulated the members of that body upon the ratification of the Constitution, and thanked God that he had lived to see it. In 1788, Yale College conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. His wife died in 1789, and he himself departed this life on June 25, 1790, aged sixty-six years.

Governor Livingston had thirteen children, of whom six died before him. One son, Brockholst Livingston, became a distinguished lawyer in New York, was several years one of the judges of the Supreme Court of that State, and from 1807 until his death in 1823 one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

HON. ELIAS BOUDINOT, LL.D.—The father, grandfather, and great-grandfather of this distinguished man all bore the name of Elias. The latter was a Huguenot who emigrated from France in 1686, shortly after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Elias Boudinot, the subject of this notice, was born in Philadelphia April 21 (O. S.), 1740. Having studied law with his brother-in-law, Richard Stockton, Esq., at Princeton, he was licensed in November, 1760, and commenced practice in Elizabeth Town. He married, April 21, 1762, Hannah A., sister of Hon. Richard Stockton. Dr. Hatfield says, "He resided at first in a smaller, and then in a larger house on Jersey Street, both of which he bought of Alderman Samuel Woodruff or his heirs, in the latter of which Mr. Woodruff lived until his decease. He attached himself to the Presbyterian Church, and was chosen at the age of twenty-five president of the board of trustees."

At the commencement of hostilities with Great Britain, Mr. Boudinot devoted himself heartily to the cause of his country. After serving on the staff of Gen. Livingston, he was appointed by Congress, June 6, 1777, commissary-general of prisoners, in which capacity he served until the summer of 1778, when, having been appointed to represent the State in Congress, he took his seat July 7th, retiring at the expiration of the year. He was reappointed Nov. 2, 1781, and again Oct. 30, 1782. He was chosen president of Congress Nov. 4, 1782, and when the treaty of peace with Great Britain was ratified, April 15, 1783, he had the honor of affixing to it his signature.

He was again called to serve his country in the Congress of the United States under the Constitution, having been elected to the First, Second, and Third Congresses. At the expiration of his third term of service he was appointed, Nov. 1, 1795, to succeed Henry William De Saussure as superintendent of the United States Mint at Philadelphia, to which place he then removed. As a testimony of his kind feelings towards his former townsmen he forwarded, as a gift, to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church a pair of cut-glass chandeliers, and in the accompanying letter said of the church, "The many happy hours I have spent there make the remembrance of having been one of their society among the substantial pleasures of my life."

From the trustees of Yale College he received, in 1790, the well-deserved compliment of the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. In 1805 he retired from public life, and located himself at Burlington, N. J., where, on the 28th of October, 1808, Mrs. Boudinot was seized with apoplexy, and departed this life in the seventy-third year of her age. His eldest daughter, Susan Vergerean (born Dec. 21, 1764), had been married in 1784 to William Bradford, Esq., attorney-general of Pennsylvania, and subsequently of the United States. She was left a widow Aug. 23, 1795, and became, after her mother's decease, her father's housekeeper till his death, Oct. 24, 1821, in the eighty-second year of his age. She survived her father, and died Nov. 30, 1854. His only other child, Anna Maria, was born April 11, 1772, and died Sept. 3, 1774.

Mr. Boudinot, after his retirement, devoted himself to a life of Christian beneficence. In 1772 he was chosen a trustee of the College of New Jersey, in which office he continued until his death, founding in 1805, at an expense of three thousand dollars, the Cabinet of Natural History. In 1812 he became a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and in 1816 the first president of the American Bible Society, contributing to its funds ten thousand dollars, and aiding also in the erection of the first Bible House. In his will, having made ample provision for his daughter during her lifetime, he bestowed his large estate on various institutions connected with the church and the cause of education.

He wrote and published, in 1790, "The Age of Revelation, or the Age of Reason shown to be an Age of Infidelity;" 1793, a Fourth of July oration, delivered at Elizabeth Town before the New Jersey Society of the Cincinnati; 1806, "The Life of the Rev. William Tennent;" 1811, an address delivered before the New Jersey Bible Society; in 1815, "Second Advent of the Messiah;" 1816, "A Star in the West, or An humble Attempt to discern the lost Ten Tribes of Israel," still bringing forth fruit in old age. His monument at Burlington bears this inscription:

"Here lies the remaine of the Honorable Elias Boudinot, LL.D. Born on the 21 day of May, A. D. 1740. He died on the 24th day of Oct., A. D. 1808. His life was an exhibition of fervent piety, of useful talent, and of extensive benevolence. His death was the triumph of Christian faith, the consummation of hope, the dawn and the pledge of endless felicity.

"To those who knew him not, no words can paint;
And those who knew him, know all words are faint.

"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."¹

JOHN DEHART, ESQ., was a descendant of a very ancient family both in Elizabeth Town and New York. They were probably of French origin, though emigrating from Holland. Four brothers, Balthazar, Daniel, Matthias, and Jacobus, were early citizens of New Amsterdam. The former was engaged in the shipping business about 1658, in which he acquired wealth, and at the time of the English conquest resided on the south side of Wall Street. On April 3, 1671, he became a property-owner in Elizabeth Town by the purchase of the house and plantation of Richard Painter, one of the original Associates. He died the following year, and his brother Daniel, who was his executor, disposed of his property in the town. Daniel succeeded to his business, and died without issue late in 1689. He was a physician, and resided in New York. Balthazar had a son Matthias, who was the father of Capt. Matthias DeHart, born in 1667. The latter was the ancestor of the Elizabeth Town family.

John DeHart was born in Elizabeth Town in the year 1728, and had obtained considerable distinction at the bar previous to the beginning of the Revolution. During the struggle he took an active part with the patriots, was member of the Continental Congress in 1775, a member of the Council of Safety and of the Provincial Congress of New Jersey, and upon the adoption of the first constitution in 1776 was appointed Chief Justice of the State. In a letter written on the 16th of August, 1776, he acknowledged the "great honor" conferred upon him, and expressed the wish that his "abilities were equal to the high and important office." He, however, declined, and in January Robert Morris was appointed in his stead.

Upon the reorganization of the borough in 1789 Mr. DeHart was chosen mayor. He continued in that office until his death, June 1, 1795, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. His remains were deposited in the burial-ground of St. John's Church, of which he had long been a warden and an influential member. The following inscription was placed over his grave:

"In memory of | John De Hart Esquire, | Counsellor at Law and Mayor of | this Borough, | Who departed this life June 1st. 1795 | Aged LXVI years. His worth in private life was | truly great; | Nor will his public virtues | be forgotten; his name being recorded on the list of | chosen Patriots | who composed the memorable | Congress of 1775."

HON. ISAAC H. WILLIAMSON, LL.D.—Isaac Halsted Williamson was born in Elizabeth Town, N. J., Sept. 27, 1768. He was the grandson of William

Williamson, the first of the name who settled in the town, and the youngest son of Gen. Matthias Williamson and Susannah Halsted. His childhood and youth were spent among the stirring scenes of the Revolution. He studied law with his elder brother, Matthias, and was admitted to the bar as an attorney in 1791, and as a counselor in 1796, and opened a law-office in his native town, where he continued his residence until his death.

As a lawyer Mr. Williamson gradually rose in his profession till he came to occupy one of the first places at the bar. In 1816 he was elected to the Assembly, and while serving in that capacity, February, 1817, he was chosen Governor and (ex officio) Chancellor of the State. He continued to hold these high offices by consecutive elections until 1829, when he resumed his professional duties. In 1831 and 1832 he was a member of the State Council, and during four years (1830-34) he was mayor of the borough of Elizabeth. (He had been a member of the corporation for many years, from 1795 onward.) After his able services in the State Council he was again urgently solicited to accept of the governorship, but he declined all public offices, except in the last year of his life. Being elected to the Constitutional Convention which met at Trenton, May 14, 1844, he was unanimously chosen president of that body.

After an illness of eighteen months, which he bore with the utmost resignation and cheerfulness, he departed this life on July 10, 1844, universally lamented, as he had been universally honored and beloved. His remains were interred in the ancestral vault with distinguished respect. The New Jersey bar, in expressing sentiments appropriate to his death, said among other things,—

"The State mourns his loss. In all the relations of life, public and private, he has bequeathed to his countrymen an illustrious example. As a friend he was faithful and sincere; as a statesman, enlightened and patriotic; as a judge, profoundly learned, incorruptly pure, inflexibly just. The inimitable simplicity of his character, the artlessness of his life, the warmth and purity of his affectionate endeared him to the circle of his friends; his high and varied attainments command the respect of his associates. His long and eminent public services, his dignified and enlightened and impartial administration of justice demand the gratitude of his fellow-citizens and of posterity."

Similar testimonials were passed by the wardens and vestry of St. John's Church, of which from early life he had been an exemplary member, and for many years the senior warden.

He married, Aug. 6, 1808, Anne Crossdale, a daughter of Rev. Cavalier Jouet (by his second wife, Mary Hampton), and had two sons,—the Hon. Benjamin (ex-Chancellor) and Isaac Halsted, Esq.²

COL. AARON OGDEN, a son of Hon. Robert Ogden, was a lawyer, Governor of the State, and United States senator. He was born in Elizabeth Town, Dec. 3, 1756, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1773, joined the army in 1777, served with distinction during the war, and at its close engaged in the practice of law. In November, 1796, he was chosen one of the Presidential electors of New Jersey, and Feb. 28, 1801, he was appointed to the United States Senate to fill a vacancy of two years. In 1824, Col. Ogden succeeded Gen. Bloomfield as president of the Society of the Cincinnati of New Jersey. He remained the president until his death, when he was succeeded by Ebenezer Elmer, the last surviving officer of the New Jersey line.

The Society of the Cincinnati was organized at the cantonment of the American army on the Hudson River in May, 1783. Like Cincinnatus, the illustrious Roman, many of the soldiers had left the plow and entered into the service of their country, and they resolved on leaving the army to imitate his example by returning to their citizenship. Hence they called themselves the Society of the Cincinnati, basing their organization on immutable principles, viz.:

"An incessant attention to preserve inviolate those exalted rights and liberties of human nature for which they had fought and bled, and without which the high rank of rational being is a curse instead of a blessing.

"An unalterable determination to promote and cherish between the respective States that union and national honor so essentially necessary to their happiness and the future dignity of the American Empire.

"To render permanent the cordial affection subsisting among the officers, this spirit will dictate brotherly kindness in all things, and particularly extend to the most substantial acts of beneficence, according to the ability of the society, towards those officers and their families who unfortunately may be under the necessity of receiving it.

"The general society will, for the sake of frequent communications, be divided into State societies, and these again into such districts as shall be directed by the State society."

There were originally nine or ten State societies, of which six, those of New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and South Carolina, still remain. The fund of the New Jersey society amounts now to $13,500, invested in United States bonds. A report made in 1866 showed that since its formation the society had expended for current expenses $11,821, and for benevolent objects $25,629.

In 1825, Col. Ogden was chosen vice-president of the general society, and was made president in 1829, succeeding in that office Gens. Washington, Alexander Hamilton, C. C. Pinkney, and Thomas Pinkney.

In October, 1787, soon after he commenced the practice of law in Elizabeth Town, Col. Ogden married Elizabeth, daughter of John Chetwood, Esq., an eminent member of the bar, and afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court.

Of Governor Ogden's qualities as a lawyer Mr. Elmer speaks as follows: "He soon had a good practice; and whatever may have been his own reflections on the subject, I think, in view of what afterwards befell him, it is to be regretted that he did not adhere to that profession during his life. He was an accomplished lawyer, and took a high position at the bar. Mr. Cox's Reports begin in 1790, and it appears that he was much employed in the most important cases argued before the Supreme Court."

We find him elsewhere characterized as possessed of strong analytical and logical powers, taking a firm grasp of the underlying principles of law, and at the same time making himself thoroughly acquainted with the cases in which those principles had been applied. He was, therefore, both a thoughtful and industrious lawyer, never thinking his duty discharged to his client nor to himself while a single corner of the case committed to his care remained unexplored.

Governor Ogden died at Jersey City, April 19, 1839, aged eighty-three, and his remains were buried in the cemetery of his native town with civic and military honors on the 22d. He was honored by his alma mater in 1816 with the degree of LL.D.

AARON OGDEN DAYTON, named in honor of Governor Aaron Ogden, was a son of Elias B. Dayton, and was born in Elizabethtown in 1796. After the usual preparatory studies in the grammar school he entered Princeton College, where he graduated with the highest honors in 1813. He studied law with Governor Ogden, and was admitted to the bar in 1817. Immediately after he went to Cincinnati, with a view of practicing in that city, and was admitted to the bar there also, but he returned soon after and settled in Salem County, N. J. In 1823 he was elected from that county to the Legislature, and although the youngest member of that body was recognized as one of its most influential members. The next year, declining to be a candidate for the Assembly, he entered with much spirit into the Jackson campaign, being a member of the convention to nominate electors, and drafting the address sent forth by that body. Although Gen. Jackson failed to secure the requisite number of electoral votes that year, he received the popular majority, the vote of the largest number of States, and New Jersey was carried for him, very much to the surprise of the opposition. For that result a large part of the credit was due to the brilliant efforts of Mr. Dayton.

Removing to New York in 1826, with a view of establishing himself as a lawyer in that city, he identified himself with the Jackson party, who in 1828 put him in nomination for the Legislature. He was returned by a large majority, while his chief was triumphantly elected to the Presidency of the United States.

Mr. Dayton, although receiving the appointments of master in chancery and injunction master for the city of New York and Long Island, offices at that time of considerable importance, did not remain long in the practice of law, owing to a nervous disease which finally proved fatal. He accepted a position in the Diplomatic Bureau of the State Department at Washington. In 1836 he was appointed chief clerk of the Department of State, for which office he was well fitted. In 1838 he was appointed fourth auditor of the Treasury, charged with the settlement of the navy accounts, and remained in that office through all the varying administrations until his death in 1858.

"He represented his father in the New Jersey Society of the Cincinnati, and in 1835 delivered a very eloquent eulogy on Lafayette before that body. In 1839 he delivered the address before the societies of Princeton College. These were both productions exhibiting a high order of talent. Had his health permitted him to remain at the bar, there can be no doubt that he would have ranked among the most respectable advocates."

JUDGE JOHN ROSS was one of the judges of the Essex County Court and a master in chancery. He was a son of George Ross, and grandson of Deacon George Ross, who came to Elizabeth Town from New Haven about 1670. Deacon Ross married in New Haven Constance Little, in 1658. The son George, father of Judge Ross, died at Elizabeth Town in October, 1750. Judge Ross was born in Elizabeth Town, and spent his life there. He was one of the charter aldermen of the borough in 1740. The New York Weekly Post-Boy, No. 204, contains the following obituary of Judge Ross:

"Elizabeth-Town, August 15, 1754. Wednesday morning last (7th) departed this Life, after a short but painful Illness, JOHN ROSS, Esq.; one of the Judges of Essex County Court, and a Master in Chancery: He was a Gentleman of a very affable and obliging Disposition, of steady and unshaken Principles, a strict Observer of Law and Justice, and a truly honest Man. In his Death the Country have really a sensible Loss, and a worthy Family an irreparable Damage; which nothing can so much alleviate, as the lively Hope and Assurance of his being translated into a State of blessed Immortality:—This Testimony is now given of him, by a Friend to his Person and a Lover of his Virtues."

THOMAS CLARK, Esq., one of the judges of the County Court, died at Elizabeth Town, Dec. 11, 1765. In the case of his burial was first put in practice the principle of retrenchment in funerals, referred to in the following notice from one of the newspapers of the day:

"December 24, 1764: We hear from Elizabeth-Town that, upon the 29th of last Month, near fifty Heads of the principal families, in and about that Place, entered into an Engagement to retrench the present usual and unnecessary Expenses of Funerals and Mourning, as the giving of Scarfs, Gloves, and Liquor at Funerals, and wearing black Apparel as Mourning, nothing but a black Gape round the Arm being allowed for the Future."

In a notice of the death of Judge Clark, Dec. 14, 1765, it is said,—

"He was decently buried, in the plain manner, by his own directions according to the new mode—none of his relations or friends appearing in mourning, though he was universally lamented by all who knew him, as he left the character of an honest man. We flatter ourselves that this laudable example, so very sensibly set by people of fortune, will be imitated by all, especially by those in slender circumstances (no liquor was given at the funeral)."

Judge Clark was the father of Abraham Clark, the signer of the Declaration of Independence. He was one of the charter aldermen of the borough, and a magistrate from the time of its incorporation (1740) until his death. He was also an earnest patriot, and had entered heartily into the agreement of the previous November respecting the non-use and importation of British goods.

BENJAMIN WILLIAMSON, LL.D., Chancellor of New Jersey, is the son of Hon. Isaac H. Williamson, Governor and Chancellor of the State from 1817 to 1829. He was born at Elizabeth Town, graduated at Nassau Hall in 1827, was admitted to the bar in 1830, and made a counselor in 1833. He began practice in his native town, where he has ever since continued to reside, and is still in the active practice of his profession. For several years he was prosecutor of the pleas for Essex County, and in 1852 was appointed Chancellor of the State, succeeding Chancellor Oliver S. Halsted, whose term then expired. He filled this position with distinguished ability until the expiration of his term, and then resumed the practice of the law. "There were few cases of importance or interest arising in Mr. Williamson's section of the State in which he was not employed previous to his appointment as Chancellor, and on his return to the bar he at once secured a large and important practice extending over the whole State. . . . While he has avoided public office outside the line of professional service, he has on more than one occasion been prominently urged by friends as United States senator, and they only failed of his election by a few votes in 1863 or 1864."

In 1860 he was a delegate at large from the State to the Democratic convention at Charleston, and in 1861 was appointed one of the delegates to represent New Jersey in the Peace Congress which met at Washington, composed of delegates from every State, and which was called in the hope and for the purpose of averting, if possible, the impending conflict between the two sections of the country. Mr. Williamson has been all his life identified with the interests of church, of education, and the development of the resources of the State. He has for years served as an officer of the church of St. John's Episcopal Parish, and of the Union County Bible Society, as trustee of the State Normal School, as director and counsel for the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey, of the State Bank of Elizabeth, and as director and trustee of the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, as commissioner of the sinking fund of Elizabeth, and in other positions of trust both public and private. He still lives at Elizabeth, on the place formerly the residence of his father.

HON. JOHN CHETWOOD, a justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, was a son of Philip Chetwood, of Salem, N. J. (in 1700), and was born April 24, 1736. He came to Elizabethtown in his childhood, being an orphan. He married Mary Emott, granddaughter of James Emott, who came to Boston in 1678 from Lancashire, England. Her mother was a Boudinot. Their children were the following: 1. Anna Ashton, died in infancy; 2. Thomas Bradbury Chandler, died in infancy; 3. Philip, died unmarried; 4. William, married Mary, daughter of Col. Francis Barber; 5. John, married Susan Jelf; 6. Elizabeth, married Col. Aaron Ogden; 7. Mary Boudinet, married Capt. Cyrus De Hart; 8. Jane, died in infancy; 9. Sarah, married John Stansbury.

His son, Governor William Livingston (afterwards, and for many years a resident of Elizabeth Town) made an appeal to the public as early as June, 1753, in favor of putting an end to this kind of extravagance.

WILLIAM CHETWOOD was a son of the Hon. John Chetwood, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of New Jersey. He was born at Elizabethtown in 1771, graduated at Princeton in 1792, and studied law with his father. During the Whiskey Insurrection he was a volunteer, and served on the staff of Gen. Lee, with the rank of major, by which title he was usually known. He was licensed as an attorney in 1796, as a counselor in 1799, and in 1816 was called to the degree of sergeant-at-law. He married a daughter of Col. Francis Barber, a distinguished officer of the Revolution, who was killed during that war by the falling of a tree. Mr. Chetwood practiced his profession in Elizabethtown, where he resided until his death, which occurred in 1857 at the advanced age of eighty-six years and six months.

Mr. Chetwood was a man of great energy of character. In his profession he was indefatigable, and achieved a high degree of success. During the Jackson contest he was elected to Congress by the Democratic party, and served in that body in 18—. He afterwards, however, acted with the Whigs.

JOHN JOSEPH CHETWOOD was a grandson of Judge Chetwood, and a son of Dr. John Chetwood, of Elizabethtown, who died of cholera in 1832. The son was born in 1800, and graduated at Princeton in 1818. He studied law with his uncle, William Chetwood; was admitted as an attorney in 1821, as a counselor in 1825, and as a sergeant-at-law in 1837. He married a granddaughter of Gen. Elias Dayton, and resided in Elizabeth, where he died in 1861.

Mr. Chetwood was a member of the Council and surrogate of the county of Essex. For several years he was prosecutor of the pleas of the county of Union, an active business man, highly esteemed both in and out of his profession, of a generous disposition, yet successful in the accumulation of property. He was a trustee of Burlington College, and active in every enterprise for the advancement of education. Few men have been more popular than Mr. Chetwood in the community in which he spent his truly useful life.

FRANCIS B. CHETWOOD was born Feb. 1, 1806, at Elizabethtown, and was the son of Hon. William and Mary (Barber) Chetwood. His grandfather, John Chetwood, was an assistant justice of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and was of Quaker descent. He died in 1806 at Elizabeth, at the age of seventy-two years. Francis B. Chetwood was licensed as an attorney in November, 1828, and as counselor in 1831. He commenced the practice of law with his father, with whom he continued until the latter retired. He then followed his professional pursuits alone until about 1860, when he formed a partnership with William J. Magie which lasted several years, until he became associated in business with his son, Robert E. Chetwood. At different times during his life he held nearly all the local offices,—member of the City Council, mayor of the borough and the city of Elizabeth, prosecutor of the pleas for Essex County before the formation of the county of Union, member of the Legislature, etc. He was also one of the chief originators of the gas and water supply of the city, the orphan asylum, Evergreen Cemetery, and many other local measures and improvements. He died Jan. 13, 1875, leaving a widow, two sons, and one daughter; two sons had died some years previous.

ROBERT E. CHETWOOD is a native of Elizabethtown, where he was born Dec. 20, 1837. He is the son of Francis B. Chetwood, also a native of Elizabeth, and Elizabeth P. Phelps, who was of New England stock, born in Connecticut. After thorough preparation in the schools of his native city, Mr. Chetwood entered Princeton College, where he graduated in 1850, and immediately commenced the study of law in the office of his father. His progress was rapid and thorough, not only as a student, but after he entered upon his professional career it was no less successful than his early life had given promise of. He was licensed as an attorney in June, 1861, and as a counselor three years later.

In 1874 he was elected to the office of city attorney of Elizabeth, and discharged the duties of the office until Jan. 20, 1880. Politically he is of the Republican faith, and has been an active worker in that party since his majority. He was married March 5, 1867, to Kate A. McGowan, daughter of Capt. John McGowan, of the United States revenue service.

WILLIAM J. MAGIE, judge of the Supreme Court, was born at Elizabeth Dec. 9, 1832. He is the son of Rev. David Magie, D.D., a native of the same town, and for nearly forty-five years pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of that city. His mother, née Ann Frances Wilson, was also a native of Elizabeth. Young Magie entered Princeton College in 1852, and graduated in 1855; he studied law with Francis B. Chetwood at Elizabeth, and was admitted to the bar as an attorney in 1856, and counselor in 1859. For six years he was associated in practice with his preceptor, Mr. Chetwood, and subsequently formed a partnership with Mr. Cross. He was prosecutor of the pleas for Union County from 1866 to 1871. In politics he is a Republican, and has acted with that party since 1861. In 1875 he represented the county of Union in the New Jersey Senate, and was appointed chairman of the committee on the judiciary, in which capacity he served with marked ability. He, however, only accepted the senatorial nomination at the earnest solicitation of friends.

Judge Magie married, Oct. 1, 1857, Frances Baldwin, of Elizabeth.

HON. CORNELIUS BOICE, who for thirty-five years was identified with the various interests of Plainfield, and was the first permanently-settled lawyer there, was born at Green Brook, in Somerset County, N. J., Feb. 4, 1808. He was the son of David Boice and Elizabeth Covert, who resided at Green Brook, were farmers, and reared a family of two sons and four daughters. The other son, David Patterson Boice, died in Plainfield in August, 1880. David Boice died at the age of eighty-two, and his wife at the age of ninety-five years.

Cornelius Boice

Cornelius Boice received during his minority a good English and classical education, and became fully conversant with surveying. He studied law with Judge James S. Nevius, a prominent lawyer of New Brunswick, N. J., was admitted to practice as an attorney in 1829, and as counselor in 1832. Immediately after his admission as an attorney he settled in the practice of his profession at Plainfield, where he remained in continuous practice until his death, which occurred Sept. 6, 1864.

The same year of his settling in Plainfield, on November 25th, he married Sarah Ann, eldest daughter of Abraham and Anna (Lenox) Cadmus, who resided near Plainfield, and carried on a farm and mill property. Her only brother, Andrew A. Cadmus, succeeded to the homestead property, where he resided until his death. Her only sister is Rachel Cadmus, unmarried. Her father died Feb. 20, 1845, aged seventy-two years, and her mother died Jan. 24, 1862, aged over eighty years. Her maternal grandfather, Levi Lenox, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and died at his residence, where William McD. Coriell now resides, in Plainfield, Dec. 24, 1828, aged about eighty years. The children of Cornelius and Sarah Ann Boice are Anna E., wife of Lewis E. Clark, a justice of the peace of Plainfield; Frances M., wife of John J. Bell, of New York; Sarah Azelia, wife of Joseph B. Coward, a lawyer of Plainfield; Cornelia, wife of George S. Underhill, of New York; Mary E., wife of Robert C. Cook, a lumber and coal merchant of Plainfield; Cornelius C., a druggist of New York; and Emma Hoyt, wife of Willard H. Young, of Philadelphia.

Mrs. Boice was born Dec. 4, 1811, and survives in 1882, residing in the Boice homestead, purchased and remodeled by them in 1847, and which was once the Fairchilds' private school.

For many years Mr. Boice was the only lawyer in Plainfield, and during his early practice he gave considerable attention to surveying. His name became widely known throughout this part of the State for his soundness of opinion on questions of law and business, and although he never gained prominence in his profession as an advocate, yet his thorough knowledge of the law, his unbiased judgment and discretion gave him rank among the first in his profession as a safe and judicious counselor. He was retained as attorney and counselor by the Central Railroad Company from the time of the construction of the road until his decease. For five years he served as surrogate of Essex County, and was twice elected from that county to the lower branch of the State Legislature, where he served with honor to himself and credit to his constituents. As a citizen, Mr. Boice was ever interested in all that pertained to the best interests of the community. He was identified with the early seminaries of Plainfield, and graduated all his daughters either in the schools at home or in other places, and he was one of the framers of the law for the present school system of the city. While he was prospered in his profession and in his business relations he never forgot to be a friend to the deserving poor, who always found in him a ready and willing contributor to their wants pecuniarily, and a donor, as counselor, in settling their difficulties to avoid unnecessary litigation. His kindness of heart, his urbanity of manner, and his social and genial bearing always won him the respect of all who came in contact with him. During his early manhood and middle life he was an active member of the old Whig party, and remained true to its principles during his life. He was one of the founders of the First Presbyterian Church at Plainfield, and a contributor to and promoter of religious and moral sentiment in the community.

At a meeting of the bar held in the court-room of Union County on the 6th day of September, 1864, the Hon. Daniel Haines in the chair, and Robert S. Green secretary, it was unanimously resolved, "That we have heard with sorrow of the death of our late brother, Cornelius Boice, Esquire; that his personal intercourse and professional relations with us for many years have been characterized by a fraternity uniformly generous and confiding; that his professional labors have always been marked by a true, commendable zeal for all who committed their rights and interests to his care, and in the public fiduciary position which he filled for a number of years with unwavering fidelity and with a watchful and zealous regard of the rights and interests of the widow and the orphan."

EDWARD YOUNG ROGERS, for many years the only lawyer in Rahway, and one of the leading members of the bar of New Jersey, was fourth son of Warren and Sarah (Ogden Platt) Rogers. He was born in New York City, June 21, 1812, and died in Rahway, Oct. 13, 1868. He was graduated at Rutgers College in the class of 1830, studied law with William Chetwood, of Elizabeth, N. J., and was admitted to practice as an attorney in 1833, and as counselor in 1836. Immediately after his admission to the bar he commenced the practice of his profession in Rahway. After a couple of years he formed a law partnership in Newark, but subsequently returned to Rahway, where he continued in the practice of law during the remainder of his active business life. For many years he was prosecutor of the pleas, and during his incumbency of that office his marked ability, his desire for impartiality and justice in the trial of a cause, his careful preparation of each and every case within his jurisdiction, and his impassioned advocacy of what he conceived right and in accordance with the law, before either judge or jury, gained him not only the very high esteem of the legal profession, but commanded the respect of the people at large.

At the first meeting of the bar after his death, among others the following resolution was passed: "That while the public services of the deceased, rendered to the State and to the city in which he lived, have justly entitled him to the respect of his fellow-citizens, and while his many virtues endeared him to friends, his ability as a lawyer, his unvarying probity and uprightness in the discharge of the delicate duties of our profession, his uniform courtesy and kindness to his brethren at the bar have won our regard and love in an eminent degree, and have left us an example that we may all be proud to follow."

For several years Mr. Rogers contributed regularly to the Rahway Advocate, then published by Mr. Green, and about 1843 or 1844 he became the editor and proprietor.

He was a religious man, and his zeal increased in later years. He was a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of which he was one of the founders, and a warden and treasurer for twenty-seven years.

Mr. Rogers took an active part in local politics and State legislation; was elected State senator by the Whigs of Middlesex County in 1850, to succeed Adam Lee; was one of the early advocates of Republican principles, upon the founding of that party in 1855 and 1856, and he was a delegate at large to the Chicago Convention that nominated Abraham Lincoln for his first term to the Presidency, and one of its vice-presidents.

The City Council of Rahway passed the following resolutions upon the occasion of his death:

"Resolved, That by his death we lose a citizen who filled every position which he occupied with dignity and worth. We mourn a professional counselor whose advice was sound and conscientious, a legislator whose ideas were philanthropic and progressive, and a Christian whose piety was pure and unassuming.

"Resolved, That we desire especially to express our grief at the loss of one who organized the city government and was its earliest chief magistrate, who loved his country with a zeal which grew warmer the more it was imperiled, who was gentle as a child to the influences of truth and right, and unyielding as a rock to all that was false and wrong."

His widow and one son survive him.

ENOS W. RUNYON was born near Green Brook, Somerset Co., N. J., in 1825, and was admitted to the bar in 1854, having studied law with the late Joseph Annin. He was elected to the Legislature in 1867, and in the House was a member of the judiciary committee. He was appointed law judge of the county of Union in 1873, and held the office till 1878. From 1854 to 1859, Judge Runyon was a law partner of Cornelius Boice, but is now associated with his brother, Nelson Runyon, in law practice at Plainfield.

The latter was born near Green Brook in 1840, and was admitted to practice in 1862. In September of that year, however, he joined, at his country's call, the Thirtieth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, under Capt. Hubbard, and after serving his time in the army began the practice of his profession at Plainfield.

JOSEPH ANNIN was a son of the late Judge Joseph Annin, of Somerset County. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and practiced for a short time in Jersey City, removing to Plainfield in 1848, and practicing there until his death in 1863. He was killed in the riots of that year in the city of New York. He was highly gifted, an able and persuasive speaker, and strongly attached to the institutions and liberties of his country, ready at all times to defend what he believed to be right and true in an earnest and able yet candid and pleasing manner. He was very highly respected in the community in which he lived.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CIVIL ORGANIZATION.

Act to erect Union County.—An act to create the county of Union was approved March 19, 1857, and took effect on and after the second Monday in April following. The boundaries of the new county are thus defined in the act:

"Beginning at the Sound, leading from Elizabethtown Point to Amboy, at the easternmost point in the division line between the counties of Essex and Middlesex; thence northeasterly along the eastern line of Essex County to the southeast point in the division line of the township of Clinton; thence westerly along the division line between the township of Clinton and the city of Elizabeth to the division line between the townships of Clinton and Union; thence along the northerly and westerly line of division between the townships of Union and Clinton to the northerly division line of the township of Springfield; thence down the east branch of the Rahway River to the junction of the east and west branches of the said river; thence up the west branch of the said Rahway River to the mouth of William and Abner States' mill-pond; thence along the middle of the said pond or ponds to the mouth of the brook that runs south and near to Wellington Campbell's paper-mill; thence up said brook to the new road near said Wellington Campbell's mill-dam; thence up said new road to the Morris turnpike; thence up the said turnpike to the Passaic River at a point in the west division line of the township of Springfield; thence along said line to the northerly division line of the township of New Providence; thence along the north and west division line of the township of New Providence to the division line of the township of Plainfield; thence along the westerly and southerly division line of the township of Plainfield to the division line between the counties of Essex and Middlesex; thence easterly along the division line between said counties to the place of beginning on the Sound; including and intending to include within the said metes and bounds all that part of the county of Essex now contained within the city of Elizabeth and the townships of Rahway, Union, Westfield, Plainfield, New Providence, and that portion of the township of Springfield included within the boundary lines hereinbefore described, be and the same is hereby erected into a separate county, to be called the county of Union; and said lines shall hereafter be the division lines between the counties of Essex, Somerset, Morris, Middlesex, and the said county of Union, respectively."

The original county contained the city of Elizabeth and the townships above named, to wit: Rahway, Union, Westfield, Plainfield, New Providence, and Springfield. Linden was erected from Elizabeth and Rahway by an act of the Legislature approved March 4, 1861. Clark was erected from the Fifth Ward of the city of Rahway, March 23, 1864; Cranford was set off from Westfield, Springfield, Union, Linden, and Clark townships, March 14, 1871; and Fanwood was erected from Westfield and Plainfield March 6, 1878, since which no changes have been made in the civil divisions of the county.

Union was a part of Essex County for one hundred and seventy-five years, from 1682 to 1857, and during that period Newark was nominally the seat of justice for the whole territory, although at an early time Elizabeth Town was the larger place, and was the seat of the first provincial government and of the higher courts of the province. She continued to have her own borough courts and court-house and her city courts after she was chartered as a city, down to the time of the division of the county, to which have since been added the court-house and courts of the new county of Union.

County Buildings.—On the erection of the county the city of Elizabeth was made the county-seat. The court-house and grounds owned by the city were conveyed to the county, and the deed accepted by the board of chosen freeholders Feb. 2, 1858. The same day the following resolution was adopted by the board:

"Resolved, That the building committee be authorized to purchase the lot in the rear of the court-house upon the best terms they can, not to exceed $2500."

The design was to acquire sufficient ground in the rear for the enlargement of the court-house and the erection of a suitable jail for the county. The lot was purchased of Meeker Wood for $1500, and the committee reported, May 10, 1858, that $955.34 had been expended on the buildings, probably for temporary repairs. In addition to the lot bought of Mr. Wood, a lane belonging to Dr. James C. Blake and a strip on the north side adjoining the burying-ground of the First Presbyterian Church were also purchased by the board in order to make suitable ground for the proposed buildings. This last strip of ground was conveyed by the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, and another strip was subsequently bought of them on the north side extending to the street, when the building was enlarged in that direction.

The jail of the old court-house was simply a lock-up for local prisoners, and the county prisoners, by provision of a special act of the Legislature, were sent to the Essex County jail at Newark till 1862, a committee being appointed by the board each year to look after them. Another act was procured to extend the time of keeping the prisoners at Newark, and we find in the minutes of the board of freeholders in 1860 that a resolution was adopted to extend the time five years after that date. But it proved not to be necessary, as the Union County jail and enlargement of the court-house were completed in 1862.

The first committee on plan and specifications reported to the board Sept. 2, 1858, estimating the cost of the proposed jail and furniture at seventeen thousand dollars. Plans had been furnished by J. Graham, of Trenton. The extension of the court-house in the rear was to be an addition of eighteen by thirty-three feet, and two stories high. This plan was substantially carried out in 1861-62. An additional strip of land was bought of Dr. Blake, and it was resolved to expend a sum not exceeding sixteen thousand dollars. The committee was composed of the following-named gentlemen: David Mulford, Zachariah Webster, Job S. Williams, M. W. Halsey, Andrew W. Brown, Addison S. Clark, C. D. Boyleston, and Stephen Jackson. The contractors were Messrs. Budd and Ross. The cost of the jail and enlargement of the court-house, as appears from the report of the committee, was a little less than fifteen thousand dollars.

Several important improvements have since been made. The jail and court-house are substantially under one roof, being connected by a building, the basement of which is used chiefly as a boiler-house, and the loft as a water-tank. Here the steam is generated which comfortably warms the whole establishment—prison, cells, court-rooms, offices, halls, kitchen, laundry, and the family apartments of the jailor—at an expense considerably less and with much greater convenience than could be done by stoves. Both the male and female departments of the jail are neatly kept, and exhibit an air of cleanliness and comfort.

A fire-proof building contains the valuable records and papers of the county. In front of it is the commodious clerk's office, and above this, in the second story, the hall of county legislation, where the chosen freeholders representing the different townships hold their sessions. This room is a model of order and taste, the desks being arranged in the form of a hollow square, and the directors' desk at one end, slightly elevated above the others. The other offices are convenient and well furnished, and the court-room airy and commodious.

During the time when the court-house was undergoing extensive repairs, a session of the court was held in Library Hall, in the rooms of the former Young Men's Christian Association, and one of the trials which took place before the late Judge Haines attracted considerable interest in the community, the parties aggrieved being well-known citizens. On the occasion of the dedication of the present court-room addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Aikman and others.

The county jail has held prisoners at various times who have been guilty of every degree of vice. There have been three executions within its grim walls,—Grady, Glennon, and Quiller, the latter a colored man. Grady was concerned in the killing of Fergus Collins, on Elizabeth Avenue, during the war; Glennon murdered his wife in what is known as "Castle Garden," on Morris Avenue; Quiller killed his wife near Westfield. It is impossible to give the list of convictions, from the fact that no accurate record was kept until Prosecutor Fay came in office. He made up a valuable book, which is now the property of the county by purchase. Since the county was formed the jail has held seven thousand seven hundred and forty-two prisoners. The court-house, the old portion of which was built in 1811, has witnessed many strange scenes. From it men and women have gone forth to prison, and others are yet to go. The bell in the tower has rung for victories to our arms, welcomed home the heroes of two wars, and tolled when great men have been borne to the tomb.

Board of Freeholders.—The first meeting of the board of chosen freeholders for the county convened at the court-house in the city of Elizabeth, May 13, 1857. Samuel Williams, of Rahway, was chosen temporary chairman, and A. M. Elmer, clerk. The roll of the townships was then called, and all the members answered to their names, as follows:

Elizabeth, William J. Tenny, James B. Burnett.
Union, Abner Parcel, Matthias T. Wade.
Springfield, Isaac Bannister, William Stites.
New Providence, John S. Clark, Daniel H. Noe.
Westfield, Gideon Ross, Charles Marsh.
Plainfield, Manning Vermeule, Zachariah Webster.
Rahway, Samuel Williams, Stephen Jackson.¹

At the permanent organization, Samuel Williams, of Rahway, was unanimously elected director, and Periam Pierce was chosen clerk of the board. The salary of the clerk was fixed at twenty-five dollars for the first year; it has since been augmented to fifty dollars. Those who have served as directors of the board since the organization are Samuel Williams, Rahway, 1857; Zachariah Webster, Plainfield, 1858; David Mulford, Elizabeth, 1859; Andrew W. Brown, Springfield, 1860-61; Job S. Williams, Union, 1862; Andrew W. Brown, Springfield, 1863; Amos P. Scudder, Westfield, 1864-67; David Mulford, Linden, 1868; Robert A. Russell, Clark, 1869; J. Frank Hubbard, Plainfield, 1870; Gustavus J. Thebaud, Summit, 1871; John C. Rose, Linden, 1872-73; Nathaniel K. Thompson, Elizabeth, 1874-75; William C. Ayers, Plainfield, 1876; Cornelius W. L. Martine, Westfield, 1877-78; George W. F. Randolph, Plainfield, 1879; Cornelius W. L. Martine, Fanwood, 1880-81.

The following have served as clerks of the board: Periam Pierce, 1857-59; Oliver Pierce, 1860-74; Lewis S. Hyer, 1874-76; John M. Wilson, 1876-77; Oliver Pierce, 1877-78; John L. Crowell, 1878-81.

The county collectors, elected annually by the board, have been: Moses M. Crane, Union, 1857-61; Samuel Williams, Rahway, 1862-63; Stephen O. Horton, Plainfield, 1864-66; Thomas B. Budd, Elizabeth, 1867-71; Elias R. Pope, Plainfield, 1872-73; Patrick Sheridan, 1874-81.

Officers of the County.—The first officers of the county were designated by the act of organization,

CHAPTER XIX.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

Early Status of Medicine in Union County.—Medicine as a science and an art was as far advanced in this portion of New Jersey as in any other previous to the period of the Revolution, and yet it had made but little progress for a hundred years after the first settlement. The people were strong and robust in natural constitution, and the climate was generally healthful. Occasionally an epidemic prevailed in some sections of the country, like the "throat distempers," so called, of 1735, which alarmed the inhabitants, and caused the best educated men of the day, who were usually clergymen, to look into the nature and causes of the disease. Hence Rev. Thomas Thatcher and Rev. Cotton Mather, of New England, were the first American writers on the small-pox and the measles, in 1677 and 1721, respectively. When the throat distemper became epidemic, its character was noticed first in printed form by Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, minister of the First Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth Town, and also a practitioner of the healing art. His notice is found in Zenger's Weekly Journal, Feb. 16, 1735-36. Subsequently, in 1738-39, Mr. Dickinson wrote his observations on the disease more in extenso to "a Friend in Boston," which were published at the instance of a few medical men in that city in 1740. These essays, together with those of Dr. Thomas Cadwalader, 1740, then a resident of Trenton, N. J., and a few others, were among the earliest contributions to medical literature in the American colonies.

At this time, and for nearly twenty years after, there were no schools of medicine in the country, and not even a course of medical lectures had been given. New Jersey had among its medical men a very limited few who had received their training in the schools of Europe. But the profession was at first largely composed of those who, without liberal education, had lived a year or two with any sort of a practitioner, read the few books on medicine which came within their reach, and then, assuming the title of "Doctor," offered themselves to the people as competent to cure disease. Dr. Wickes speaks of a text-book called "Salmon's Herbal," published in England in 1596, which was the text-book of a New Jersey physician of extensive practice for many years, who procured it from England at a cost of fifty pounds. It was the work of a "noted empiric," as Allibone calls its author, and contained thirteen hundred folio pages.

The first course of lectures on medical subjects delivered in America was a course on anatomy by Dr. William Hunter, a Scotch physician, at Newport, R. I., in 1754-55-66. Drs. Bard and Middleton made the first recorded attempt to impart instruction by dissection in New York in 1750. Dr. Cadwalader, upon his return from Europe in 1751, gave the first lectures on anatomy in Philadelphia. It was not until 1762 that the foundation of the first regular medical school was laid in Philadelphia by Drs. Shippen and Morgan, who had pursued their studies in Europe. The College of Philadelphia, in May, 1763, elected Dr. Morgan Professor of the Theory and Practice of Physic, and Dr. Shippen, in September following, Professor of Anatomy and Surgery.

This was the first regular medical school engrafted upon a college. New York followed with a similar school in connection with King's College in 1767. It established chairs of anatomy, pathology and physiology, surgery, chemistry and materia medica, theory and practice, and midwifery, electing professors to fill them all, and graduated its two first medical students in 1769. Between that and 1774 eleven degrees had been conferred, when the occupation of New York by the British and the stirring events of the Revolution put an end to all medical instruction till after the war. It was not until 1792 that a successful organization of the medical college was effected, although an effort had been made to revive it in 1784.

During the time that this medical college was suspended, in 1790, Dr. Paul Micheau, an eminent physician from Staten Island, who had studied abroad, opened a medical school in Elizabeth Town (see his memoir further on). This was probably the earliest medical school in New Jersey. It was two years later, in 1792, that Dr. Nicholas Romaine and others, of the city of New York, obtained authority of the trustees of Queen's College (now Rutgers) under their charter to establish a medical department in connection with that institution. This department was continued till 1816 in the city of New York, when the Legislature of that State declared all degrees conferred by any college out of the State upon students studying within its limits null and void as licenses to practice medicine, and the medical school was transferred to Hobart College, about that time established at Geneva, N. Y. There was no medical department connected with Princeton College until 1825, and its progress was subsequently arrested by the death of John Van Cleve, on whose ability the college relied to carry its plan into execution.

Dr. Wickes and other writers on medicine in New Jersey date a stimulus in the progress of medical studies from the French war. "The physicians who were commissioned as surgeons and surgeon's mates, being brought into association with the British officers, were led to know their inferiority, and were stimulated to improve their opportunities of practice and of intercourse with their more cultivated compeers." This revival of interest was speedily "followed in New Jersey by a measure still more potent in its influence,—the organization, in 1766, of a medical society for the province." This at once elevated the tone and standard of the profession, and has been the conservator of its best interests throughout the State during the one hundred and fifteen years of its existence. By its policy of granting commissions to auxiliary district medical societies it has virtually its organization and influence in every village and hamlet of the State. Most of the physicians noticed in the following brief memoirs were members of the New Jersey Medical Society, and some of them practiced many years before its organization. They all lived and practiced within the present limits of Union County.

Early Physicians of Union County.—DANIEL DENTON was probably the first physician in East Jersey. He was one of the original petitioners for the patent of Elizabeth Town in 1664, and was the first town clerk. His biographer says of him, "He taught school, practiced medicine, and served as justice of the peace." He wrote a "Brief Description of New York," which was published in London in 1670. Judging from his style as a writer, he was a man of considerable ability, and fair learning for his times.

EDWARD GAY was an early physician. Letters of administration were granted Aug. 3, 1687, to "Edward Gay, of Elizabeth Town, Doctor of Physick," for the estate of John Wren, of Elizabeth Town, deceased.¹

This is the first mention of him. He frequently appears as a witness to the wills of the early settlers. He obtained a warrant, Aug. 15, 1693, for fifty acres of unappropriated land in Elizabeth Town. He may have been a descendant of John Gay, of Watertown, Mass., 1635, and of Dedham, Mass., 1639.¹

WILLIAM ROBINSON was a physician residing in the Rahway neighborhood. He came to the town as early as 1685, purchased land of John Toe, and had surveyed to him, April 1, 1686, a tract of seven hundred acres on the north side of the Woodbridge line, and on the branch of the Rahway River called Robinson's Branch. He was undoubtedly of the Scotch immigration. He appears to have been a large land-owner both here and in Monmouth County, where he obtained, in 1692, a survey for five hundred and fifty acres, "in full of his share of the first division." In his will, dated May 18, 1693, he is called "William Robinson, Doctor of Physick." He appears to have died soon after, for his estate was appraised June 2, 1693, by Andrew Hampton and John Winans. Ann Winans, a daughter of the latter, married a son of Dr. Robinson.²

WILLIAM BARNET was a native of Elizabeth Town, born in 1723. He was distinguished as a physician and as an active and prominent Whig during the Revolution; served as a voluntary surgeon in the army; was one of the volunteers under Elias Dayton, who, in January, 1776, captured the "Blue Mountain Valley," a vessel described by Lord Stirling, in his letter to Congress, as a ship of about one hundred feet from stem to stern above, capable of making a ship-of-war of twenty six-pounders and ten three-pounders. The vessel was brought in safety to Elizabeth Town Point. Subsequent to this Dr. Barnett was major of Col. Williamson's eastern division of light-horse.

About 1760, Dr. Barnett built a large brick mansion, which after his death was conveyed by Dr. Oliver Barnett, his brother, as executor to Jonathan Hampton, in 1790. The house was subsequently owned and long occupied by Maj.-Gen. Winfield Scott during his residence in Elizabeth. It is still standing, having been kept in good condition. This is the house which suffered from the depredations of the British in their plundering expeditions from Staten Island. In describing one of these after the war the doctor relates that "the rascals emptied my feather beds in the streets, and smashed my mirrors and windows. That was bad enough, but, to crown all, they stole from me the most splendid string of red peppers, hanging in my kitchen, that was ever seen in Elizabeth Town."³

In medical science Dr. Barnett was in advance of most physicians of his day. He was probably in intimate relations with Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, as he introduced that remedy for smallpox thirty-seven years before its discoverer published it to the world. Dr. Rush states that "in the year 1759 Dr. Barnett was invited from Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey, to Philadelphia to inoculate for smallpox. The practice, though much opposed, soon became general." Jenner published his discovery in 1796. The quotation from Dr. Rush shows that he was well known as a promoter of inoculation and a physician of extensive reputation. His will was probated Dec. 30, 1790. He died during that year, at the age of sixty-seven.

Oliver Burnet, his brother, who was made executor of his will, was a successful and highly-esteemed physician, residing in New Germantown, Hunterdon Co., N. J. He was a surgeon of the Fourth (Hunterdon) Regiment, Feb. 14, 1776, and one of the associate justices of the trial in Westfield of Morgan, the murderer of Rev. James Caldwell, of Elizabethtown.

WILLIAM M. BARNET, son of Dr. William Barnett, of Elizabethtown, became a physician prior to 1772. Dr. Wickes refers to a charge to Dr. William Barnett, Jr., which appears in an account-book now extant, dated 1771. "He was elected a member of the New Jersey Medical Society in 1772. He signed his name to the constitution, making a dash under the 'M,' probably to distinguish himself from his father, who never joined the society. He served as surgeon in the war, First Battalion, First Establishment, Dec. 8, 1775; also First Battalion, Second Establishment, Nov. 28, 1776.

As a large property fell to him from his father, he probably did not practice his profession very extensively. Tradition says that he removed to New Germantown and died there. But Dr. Wickes is of the opinion that the William Barnett referred to by Dr. Blane, who began practice in New Germantown in 1812, and died there in 1821, was a son of William M. Barnett, and one of the "grandchildren" alluded to in the will of 1790. If so, the doctor probably died in Elizabethtown.

ICHABOD BURNET was a physician in Elizabethtown, and a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, where he probably took his degrees in medicine. He was born at Southampton, L. I., in 1684, being a son of Daniel and a grandson of Thomas Burnet, who removed from Lynn, Mass., to Long Island about 1640. Dr. Burnet came to Elizabethtown about the year 1700. In 1730 he lived and practiced in Lyon's Farms, but afterwards removed to Elizabethtown.

He is spoken of by Dr. Hatfield as one of the distinguished men of the town. He died July 13, 1774. His wife, Hannah, died Feb. 19, 1758, aged fifty-six. They had two sons, William and Ichabod, Jr., both of whom became physicians.

WILLIAM BURNET, the elder of the brothers, was born Dec. 2, 1730 (O. S.). He graduated at Princeton College in 1749, studied medicine with Dr. Staats, of New York, and settled in Newark as a physician, where he distinguished himself as a patriot in the Revolution. He was the father of Judge Jacob Burnet, of Cincinnati, the author of the well-known "Notes on the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio."

ICHABOD BURNET, JR.—Little is known of him, as he died too young to leave any professional record. He probably graduated at Princeton later than his brother, as his father being a university scholar, with strict notions respecting the profession, would not have sanctioned any preparation for practice short of a collegiate course. Whether he pursued his medical studies with his father or in the city of New York we are not informed. He died March 12, 1756, in his twenty-fourth year.

STEPHEN CAMP was an early physician in Rahway, where he settled soon after graduating at Princeton in 1756. He was a son of Nathaniel Camp, of Newark, and was born in 1739. He married at Rahway Hester Birt, daughter of a British officer. Dr. Wickes says of him, "He was one of the founders of the New Jersey Medical Society, being present at its first meeting. . . . The doctor was fond of company, 'full of fun and frolic,' and made many friends. He died in 1775. One son, John, survived him, who though quite young became a Tory and a refugee, and was killed in Georgia during the Revolutionary war. He left also a daughter. Two sisters of Dr. Camp married,—Mary, born in 1731, to Dr. William Burnet, and Elizabeth to Dr. John Griffith, who succeeded to Dr. Camp's practice upon his decease.

"The house in which Dr. Camp died was occupied successively, perhaps not continuously, by Drs. Camp, Griffith, Lewis Morgan, and by the late Dr. Samuel Abernethy, who died in 1874. It is said to be the oldest house in Rahway."

The inscription over his grave shows that Dr. Camp died March 19, 1775, in the thirty-seventh year of his age.

WILLIAM CHANDLER, son of Rev. Dr. Thomas Chandler, rector of St. John's, Elizabethtown, was bred for the profession of medicine, though he probably practiced little, if any, in this country. He graduated at King's College in 1774. His native place was Elizabethtown, whence he fled on account of his own and his father's loyalty in 1776, and served as a captain of a company of New Jersey volunteers (British) stationed on Staten Island. After peace was declared he went to England, where he died Oct. 22, 1784, in his twenty-ninth year.

ABRAHAM CLARK was a physician at Elizabethtown. He was a son of Abraham Clark, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, born in 1767 in Elizabethtown. His mother was Sarah, daughter of Isaac Hatfield. He is said to have studied medicine with Dr. John Griffith, of Rahway, whose daughter he married in 1791. In the New Jersey Journal, Jan. 4, 1791, is the notice: "Married on Thursday evening last, by Rev. Dr. McWhorter, Dr. Abraham Clark to Lydia, daughter of Dr. John Griffith, of Bridge-town."

Dr. Clark commenced practice at Elizabethtown, where he remained till after 1800, when his name appears in the "New York Directory" as living in the lower part of Broadway. He was there but a few years when he removed to Newark, where he pursued his profession, together with literary and scientific studies, until 1830, when he removed to Kinderhook, on the Hudson, and spent the remainder of his days with his daughter, widow of Dr. Beckman. He died in July, 1854, in his eighty-eighth year.¹

JOHN CLARK, born in Elizabethtown, 1758, and practiced his profession there till his death, April 29, 1794, aged thirty-six. He was a second cousin of the signer, and died in the same year. His wife was a daughter of Esek Hopkins, of Rhode Island, the first commodore of the United States navy, and a brother of Stephen Hopkins, the signer. Dr. Wickes says, "He made her acquaintance during a visit to Providence for the purpose of observing the characteristics of an epidemic which was prevalent there. His residence and office in Elizabethtown were in an old-fashioned wooden house; his office with a bow window, in which were displayed the bottles and equipments of a drug-shop. The late David S. Craig, of Rahway, was for a time a student in his office."

DAVID CRAIG.—He resided and practiced in Rahway. He was descended from the Craig family, who settled in Elizabethtown about 1680-85; was born 1753, and died 1781. Dr. Isaac Morse, who spent most of his life in Elizabethtown, succeeded to Dr. Craig's practice. So says Dr. Wickes. David Craig was the father of David S., born 1774, who practiced for a great number of years in Rahway. From an inscription on the monument of the elder Dr. Craig it appears that he died at the age of twenty-eight years and eleven months, March 24, 1781.

REV. JOHN DARBY, though a minister at Connecticut Farms, was also a physician. The honorary degree of "Doctor of Medicine" was conferred upon him in 1782 by Dartmouth College. He was a descendant of William Darby (Darbie), who was a resident of Elizabethtown in 1688; was born 1825; graduated at Yale in 1784; and was licensed to preach in April, 1749. He spent eight years preaching on Long Island; settled at Connecticut Farms in 1758; three years later removed to Parsippany, Morris Co., where he died December, 1805, aged ninety. As an illustration of his varied attainments it is recorded by his historian that during the last sickness of Gen. Winds, of distinguished Revolutionary fame, he was his physician, his lawyer in writing his will, his minister in affording the consolations of religion, upon his death the preacher at his funeral, and upon the erection of his monument the author of the monumental inscription. He taught many pupils in medicine from different places who sought his instruction.

JONATHAN DAYTON was a practicing physician for many years in Springfield, having settled there prior to 1766, at which time he was one of the founders of the Medical Society of New Jersey. He was the youngest of nine children of Nathan and Amy (Stratton) Dayton, of East Hampton, L. I., and descended from the common ancestor of Gen. Elias Dayton and Hon. Jonathan Dayton, of Elizabethtown, viz., Ralph Dayton, of Boston, 1637. Dr. Dayton was born in 1731, and removed to Springfield (then a part of Elizabethtown) when a young man. He continued to reside there until his death, his practice as a physician extending into the adjoining settlements of Summit and New Providence. He died in the early years of the Revolution, Aug. 26, 1775. The house in which he lived is still standing, one of the three houses which were left when the enemy, in 1780, burnt the town. The house is notable for a hole in its north end made by a cannon-ball on the day of the battle.

Dr. Dayton had a son, William W., who studied medicine and began practice with his father. His career was cut short by an early death. Of his daughters, Mary married William Steele, of New York; Margaret married Thomas Salter, of Elizabethtown; and one died young.

JONATHAN I. DAYTON, of Elizabethtown, where he practiced medicine during his professional life, was born in that town in 1738; married Mary Terrill March 3, 1770, and was a highly esteemed and very popular physician. Although sympathizing strongly with the loyalists at the outbreak of the Revolution, he subsequently took and subscribed the oath of abjuration and allegiance. His death, which occurred Oct. 19, 1794, is thus noticed in the New Jersey Journal:

"Sunday was interred in the Presbyterian burying-ground, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, all that was mortal of Dr. Jonathan I. Dayton, who for many years labored under a paralytic affection which greatly impaired his bodily and mental faculties. As there was no prospect of his emerging from the pitiable situation he was in, his relatives and friends must feel a melancholy pleasure in reflecting that his sufferings are terminated. As a physician, he was popular; as a member of society, useful and enterprising; as a husband, kind and affectionate; as a parent, tender and indulgent. In short, he possessed many of the social virtues."

REV. JONATHAN DICKINSON.—While a sketch of the life of this eminent author and divine appears in the history of the First Presbyterian Church, of which he was so many years the honored pastor, it may be well to mention here that he was a physician also. In this latter capacity he acquired a high reputation. Dr. Wickes, speaking of his letter on the throat distemper, published in Cambridge, Mass., in 1740, at the request of several of the most eminent physicians of Boston, says it "gives evidence of a mind skilled in the appreciation of morbid phenomena, and an enlarged knowledge for his time of the principles of cure."

He died in Elizabethtown Oct. 7, 1747, and his remains rest in the Presbyterian Cemetery.

ALEXANDER EDGAR, a native of Rahway, was admitted to membership in the State Medical Society at a meeting held in Princeton in May, 1784. He was a son of William and grandson of Thomas Edgar, who came from Scotland about 1715 or 1720. Dr. Edgar obtained a certificate and recommendation from the medical society at the time of his admission, with the view of practicing in a remote part of the State. This is all that is known of him, except that he never married and died young, and as a stranger, in Albaux, N. Y.

PHILEMON ELMER.—Of the numerous physicians of the Elmer family in New Jersey, the subject of this brief notice resided in Westfield, where he practiced the greater part of his life. He was born Sept. 13, 1752; married (1) Mary Marsh, by whom he had two children, viz.: Sally, wife of Dr. Loring, and Polly, wife of Dr. Joseph Quimby, of Westfield; married (2) Catharine, only child of Capt. John Sleight (or Slack), of New Brunswick, by whom he had two daughters, Betsey and Catharine. The former married Ellis Potter, of New York; the latter, Aaron Coe, of Westfield, who had children,—Philemon Elmer Coe, an Episcopal minister, who built the first Episcopal Church in Plainfield about 1852, and died of smallpox in 1874, and Catharine, who married Hon. Alfred Mills, of Morristown. Married (3) the widow of Charles Clark.

Dr. Elmer had a large practice, was a man of ability and force of character, and of fine social qualities. He died May 16, 1827, leaving a large property, which has remained among his heirs.

MOSES GALE ELMER was a practitioner of medicine during his professional life in New Providence. He was born Sept. 26, 1757, and was consequently nineteen years of age at the breaking out of the war of the Revolution. He entered the service as soon as his attainments in medicine would permit, being commissioned surgeon's mate, Second Battalion, Second Establishment, Aug. 28, 1778; surgeon's mate, Second Regiment, Sept. 26, 1780; discharged at the close of the war. He married Chloe, daughter of Matthias Meeker, of Morristown, and had four children.

Dr. Elmer had an extensive practice, and was the owner of a fine estate in and adjoining the village of New Providence. Dr. Wickes, who gives a pretty full account of Dr. Elmer's personal characteristics, relates the following anecdote:

"There were in his town a large number of operatives connected with the shoe and hat manufactories, whose raids at night upon his watermelon-patch caused him much annoyance. On one occasion he so doctored some of the finest melons that they produced in those who had taken them symptoms which demanded treatment. The doctor was summoned. The patients averred that they had 'eaten nothing,' but the administration of an emetic soon caused a disorgement of the melous and a discovery of their tricks."

The practice of denying water to patients in fevers, so common in the early days, was almost a mania with Dr. Elmer, who was unrelenting in his prohibitions. "In one case of fever the sufferer begged the doctor for water. 'Tut, tut, tut; no, no, no; not one drop shall you have, sir; if you touch it, it will be at the peril of your life, sir!' But the patient managed to creep on his hands and knees to a pail of cool, fresh water, drank all he could swallow, returned to his bed, perspired freely, convalesced, and then told the doctor what had cured him. In his later years he abandoned the frequent use of phlebotomy."¹

By act of Congress passed in 1828 the doctor received a pension for the rest of his life. He died on the 31st of May, 1835, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. His wife died June 19, 1833, aged sixty.

HENRY G. ELMER, son of the above, studied medicine, and was regarded as a very promising young physician, but intemperate habits overcame him and he fell a victim to it in early life. He was born in 1799; married Pamela, daughter of Gabriel Johnson; died Feb. 11, 1824, aged twenty-five years and eleven months.

JOHN GRIFFITH, of Rahway, was one of the founders of the New Jersey Medical Society in 1766. He was born Nov. 19, 1736; married Elizabeth, daughter of Nathaniel, and sister of Dr. Stephen Camp, to whose house and business he succeeded. He was highly esteemed as a physician and citizen. He is described as a "stout, stirring man, pleasant and jolly." Of his four sons and two daughters we find the following mention: "Dr. Thomas; William, Esq., of Burlington, a distinguished lawyer and author of 'Griffith's Law Register, 1822;' John, a merchant of New York; and Nathaniel, who entered into partnership with John. One of his daughters, Lydia, married Dr. Abraham Clark."

THOMAS GRIFFITH, son of the foregoing, was born in 1765, and died at Elizabethtown, December, 1799, aged thirty-four. The Sentinel of Freedom, Newark, contains the following notice of his death:

"The death of Dr. Griffith is sincerely and universally lamented, being a great loss to his family, the town, and to society. He possessed a considerable degree of literature; was eminent as a surgeon and physician, and his liberality to his patients of poverty will long be remembered. In his deportment he was modest, manners agreeable, conduct through life amiable, his morals unblemished, an honor to his profession, and left an example worthy of imitation."

He became a member of the State Medical Society in 1787.

ROBERT HALSTED, a descendant of Timothy, one of the original Associates, was the son of Caleb Halsted of Elizabethtown, and was born there in 1746. His mother was Rebecca, a daughter of Robert Ogden. He was twice married, first to Mary Wiley, who died soon after the close of the Revolution; second to Mary Mills, who died in 1845, in her seventy-ninth year. Nothing is recorded respecting the education of Dr. Halsted, or where he received his medical degree. He was, however, held in high esteem as a physician, was bold and energetic, somewhat stern and brusque in his manner, though uniting with his strength and energy great magnanimity and kindness of heart. He was a strict observer of the Sabbath and a regular church-goer, always in his seat at the hour of worship. Being patriotic and outspoken at the beginning of the war, he rendered himself obnoxious to the loyalists, from whom he suffered not a little, being arrested and confined in the old sugar-house in New York. He died Nov. 17, 1825, aged seventy-nine. A fine marble monument marks his grave in the churchyard at Elizabeth.

CALEB HALSTED, a brother of Robert, was a physician at Connecticut Farms, where he practiced until seventy-four years of age, dying Aug. 18, 1827. He married Abigail Lyon, and had four children who grew to mature life, viz.: Mary, wife of Gen. Isaac Andrus; Phebe Roberts, wife of Luther Goble; Joseph Lyon, who married Ellen Turk; and Caleb Stockton, who married Margaret Roome. The doctor is remembered as a fine figure, portly in person, and popular with all classes. He was well up in his profession, both theoretically and practically, and in public and private life distinguished for his philanthropy and benevolence.

MATTHIAS DE HART.—The family of which Dr. De Hart was a member emigrated originally from France to Holland. They first appear in this country at New Amsterdam in 1658, where in the old records the name is De Hardt. One of the brothers was a physician,—Dr. Daniel De Hardt. Belthazer, a wealthy merchant of New Amsterdam, was the progenitor of the family in Elizabethtown, his son, Capt. Matthias De Hart, being the first settler of that name, about the close of the seventeenth century. He was the grandfather of the subject of this notice. At what time he began practice is not known, although from an advertisement in the Weekly Post-Boy, November, 1752, it appears that he was a doctor prior to that date. He was the eldest son of Col. Jacob De Hart, and died at the age of forty-three in 1766.

"Towards the close of his life," says Dr. Wickes, "he became blind, and had an African servant to attend upon him. This attendant made himself useful to his master with his needle in repairing and binding on the lace-work of his coat according to the fashion of his times. The doctor married into the family of the Kingslands, of Second River. He had several children. Three of his sons were in the Revolutionary army, viz.: Maurice, major and aide-de-camp to Gen. Devine, and subsequently to Gen. Wayne; he was killed at Fort Lee. William, major in 1775, and lieutenant-colonel in 1777; resigned in 1780; lawyer, lived at Morristown. Also a young son who was killed at the early age of eighteen while storming a fort."¹

JOHN HOLE.—This physician practiced in Washington Valley, between New Providence and Westfield, Union Co. He married (1) Hannah Clark, (2) Mercey, daughter of Jenny Ludlow. His children were Jeremiah, Mary, Elizabeth, and Jane. The last named married Jacob Mulford. The graves of these children of Dr. Hole are marked by brown headstones, with their inscriptions, in the Presbyterian churchyard at New Providence.

MOSES JAKUES was a practicing physician in Rahway, and a native of that town. He was born Nov. 7, 1770, received his early education at the common schools, studied with Dr. Halsted, of Elizabethtown, and attended medical lectures under Dr. Rush in Philadelphia, where he also practiced for a time. His health failing he abandoned the practice of medicine, sold out to Dr. Ralph Marsh, of Rahway, and embarked in mercantile business in New York, in which he was very successful. While a member of the Legislature from Essex County in 1800 he was a warm supporter of a law for the gradual emancipation of slaves, if not its author, which brought upon him the censure of his constituents, as many of them, including his father, as well as himself, were slaveholders. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1844 for the county of Middlesex, having removed from New York to Woodbridge in 1837. He continued to reside there till his death, in August, 1858, in his eighty-eighth year.

EPHRAIM LORING.—Surgeon's mate, Third Battalion, Second Establishment, Col. Elias Dayton, Nov. 28, 1776; surgeon's mate, Third Regiment, Continental army, Sept. 26, 1780. After the war Dr. Loring practiced in the vicinity of New Providence. He married Sally, eldest daughter of Dr. Philemon Elmer. His name appears on the original list of members of the Society of the Cincinnati of New Jersey, and in 1786 is enrolled among the members of the Presbyterian Church of New Brunswick.

PAUL MICHEAU.—Several ancestors of Dr. Paul Micheau were of the same name, residing on Staten Island. One was sheriff of Richmond County in 1736, and died while a member of the Colonial Assembly in 1851. His son Paul was a man of popularity and influence, and was a member of the first and third Provincial Congresses. He died in 1790. He was the father of Paul J. and Benjamin Micheau, of Staten Island, the latter supposed to have been the father of the doctor. Dr. Micheau removed from Richmond, Staten Island, and commenced the practice of medicine in Elizabethtown in April, 1789. In March following he became a member of the New Jersey Medical Society, upon presenting testimonials of his attainments from European schools in which he was educated.

In February, 1790, he opened a medical school at Elizabethtown, advertising a complete course of medical lectures to be given at four o'clock P.M., from May 10th to July 25th; charge, five pounds. In his advertisement he speaks of himself as "Surgeon and Fellow of the Lyceum Medicum Londinense."

FREDERICK A. KINCH, M.D.—Thomas Kinch was of English lineage, and resided in New York City. He was united in marriage to a lady of Welsh parentage, and had children,—William, Mary Ann, Charles, Frederick A., and Eliza, but three of whom survive. Their son, Frederick A., who is the subject of this biography, was born in New York City, March 12, 1822. Both parents having died during his childhood, his early life was passed under the guardianship of a paternal uncle, William Kinch. He was placed at a boarding-school at Bloomingdale, and remained until the age of thirteen, after which he repaired to Orange County. Here, until his majority was attained, he attended school and also engaged in farm labor.

Having an ambition to acquire a profession he determined upon the study of medicine, and placed himself under the tutelage of Dr. William C. Terry and Dr. Daniel T. Graham, of Mount Hope, Orange Co., N. Y. He remained here four years, pursuing his studies, and also attending lectures at the Medical Department of the University of the City of New York. He was licensed to practice by the New York State Medical Society, by the Orange County Medical Society, and by the New Jersey State Medical Society. In September, 1849, he chose Westfield as a promising field of professional labor, and has since that date been a resident of the place and an active practitioner. The doctor was married Feb. 6, 1850, to Miss Harriet, daughter of Col. William S. and Elizabeth Little, of Mount Hope, Orange Co., N. Y. They have two sons, Charles Augustus, a practicing physician in New York City, and Frederick A., who is at present attending lectures in the Medical Department of Columbia College. Dr. Kinch is in politics a Republican, and although debarred by the demands of his profession from leisure for participation in public affairs, has served as a member of the township committee of Westfield, as township clerk, and superintendent of schools. He is a Presbyterian in his religious convictions, and an elder in the Presbyterian Church at Westfield, of which both Mrs. Kinch and their sons are members.

The doctor is a member of the Union County Medical Society, and also of the New Jersey State Medical Society.

Frederick A. Kinch, M.D.

ENOCH MORE was a contemporary of Drs. Stephen Camp, Morse, and Griffith in Rahway in the practice of medicine. He belonged to the Society of Friends.

LEWIS MORGAN commenced practice in Rahway a year or two before the death of Dr. John Griffith. He was admitted to the State Medical Society in 1787, and practiced first in Somerset and Burlington Counties. He is reputed to have been a surgeon in the British service during the Revolution, although that is doubted on good authority. Dr. Wickes gives, upon the authority of Dr. H. H. James, of Rahway, and in his own words, the following anecdote of Dr. Morgan:

"For a short time there was a Dr. Rodgers in the town, who was a competitor in practice, whom Dr. Morgan very much disliked. During a freshet in the river Dr. Rodgers attempted to cross the bridge, which was overflowed with water. Not being aware that the centre of the bridge was gone, horse, sulky, and rider all went in together.

"The horse was used to swimming, and the doctor held his place in his sulky, heading his horse down the stream. The whole town gathered on the bank to see the doctor drown. Among the spectators was Dr. Morgan, who, seeing the situation, ordered his horse and sulky and followed the river road to see the result. About a mile below Dr. Rodgers brought his horse to the bank and came out sitting in his sulky all right. His horse was very much exhausted, and he was very wet. Dr. Morgan, pitying his condition, invited him to sit on the foot-rest of his sulky that he might take him home quickly, as his horse was fresh. Rodgers replied, 'No, sir; I had a — hard ride, but I'll go back the way I came before I sit at your feet.'"

Dr. Morgan died Jan. 12, 1821, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

ISAAC MORSE, to whom reference has heretofore been made, was a son of Joseph Morse, a surveyor and land conveyancer. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of Elizabethtown, where he was born in 1758, and died there in 1825, his remains being buried in the cemetery of the First Presbyterian Church. Dr. Clark's "History of Physicians of Essex County" contains many anecdotes of him, to which the reader is referred. "His ruling trait was facetiousness and humor," says Dr. Wilkes. "He was a man of much originality and great professional activity and usefulness, enjoying a very large practice." His fun and humor did more for his patients, it has been remarked, than his learning or his drugs, a statement which will not be discredited by any one who knows the effect of a genial presence in a sick room.

GEORGE PUGH was a physician residing in or near Elizabethtown. Joined the medical society in 1770. His will, probated Dec. 26, 1785, describes him as "Late of the Island of Jamaica, now Physician of Elizabethtown." Little is known of him beyond these few facts.

CHARLES W. RODGERS, the hero of the incident related in the memoir of Dr. Lewis Morgan (which see), resided only a short time in Rahway, and then removed to the West. When it was known that he was about to leave town a rich patient whom he had treated successfully called on him to procure the prescription for the remedy which had been so effectual in his case. The doctor said, "Certainly, but it will cost you ten dollars." The applicant objected at first, but remembering his former pains, he reluctantly paid the ten dollars. The doctor took his pencil and wrote "Catania." Afterwards, of course, he found out that he had paid ten dollars for the word "Catnip."¹

GEORGE ROSS was an early physician and druggist of Elizabethtown, probably a descendant of the first settler of that name, 1665-66. The New Jersey Journal, Feb. 2, 1796, contains the following advertisement:

"Drugs, medicals, chemicals, etc., being a fresh importation from Europe, to be sold by Doctors Ross and Williamson, opposite the Church in Elizetown."

Little is known of Dr. Ross. It is thought that he left the town soon after the above advertisement. He had been a trustee of the Academy in 1789 and librarian of the Library Association in 1792, the year it was formed.

MATTHIAS HAMPTON WILLIAMSON, referred to in the foregoing notice, was a son of William, a descendant of the first settler of that name in Elizabethtown, 1725, and of Lydia, daughter of Jonathan Hampton. He married his cousin, Frances H. Joust. Of his early life and education no positive records exist, although it is highly supposed that he studied medicine in Philadelphia. He was a member of the medical society of that city when he wrote his thesis for a degree in May, 1793. The title, somewhat abbreviated, was as follows: "Dissertation on the Scarlet Fever, attended with an ulcerated sore throat, submitted to the Rev. John Ewing, S. T. D. Provost, . . . for the degree of Doctor of Medicine, . . . on the tenth of May, A.D. 1793, by Matthias H. Williamson, member of the American Medical Society of Philadelphia." This dissertation was published, and is in the valuable library of Dr. Samuel S. Purple, of the city of New York. Dr. Williamson attained a high reputation as a practitioner. He was practicing in Elizabethtown and also keeping a drug-store in partnership with Dr. Ross in 1796.

DOCTORS WINANS.—Two physicians of this name practiced in Elizabethtown before the Revolution. They were probably descendants of John Winans. Of the first we have not the Christian name, but simply "Dr. Winans." The other, William Winans, was a surgeon in the First Regiment of Essex, July 15, 1776, and surgeon of Col. Thomas' battalion detached militia, July 24, 1776. March 17, 1781, a meeting was advertised in the New Jersey Journal "at the Inn of Doctor William Winans," Elizabethtown.

SAMUEL SWAIN, born at Scotch Plains, N. J., in 1771, died at Bound Brook in 1844, and was buried in the vault of Jacob DeGroat, whose daughter he married. He practiced at Scotch Plains and occasionally at Plainfield.

EDWARD AUGUSTUS DARCY first lived in Morris County, whence he came to Plainfield in 1821. He was a brother of Dr. John Darcy of Newark (who died there Oct. 22, 1863), and removed to Illinois in 1834, where he died.

STEPHEN MANNING, born in Westfield, now township of Plainfield, received the degree of Doctor of Medicine at the Medical College of Philadelphia, and practiced a short time in Monmouth County. He removed to Plainfield, but soon after died, in 1821 or 1822.

JOHN CRAIG was a well-known physician and druggist at Plainfield, where he died Oct. 15, 1872. He was a descendant of Andrew Craige, who came with the Scotch immigration in Governor Laurie's time. It was at his house that George Keith, as missionary of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," preached the first Episcopal sermon in the old borough of Elizabeth in November, 1703, on which occasion he baptized Mr. Craig's four children. Andrew Craige was admitted an Associate in 1699-1700, and drew lot No. 162 of the one-hundred-acre lots on the southwest side of the Rahway River and on the lower side of the "Norameheghn branch" (Westfield township). His name appears in the Town Book as early as Nov. 28, 1729. He died Oct. 1, 1738.

There have been several physicians in the family, among them Dr. David Craig, born in 1753, died in 1781, and his son, Dr. David S. Craig, born in 1774, and practiced till his death at Rahway.

John Craig settled in Plainfield in 1822, and was associated with his younger brother, Lewis, who came soon after, in the drug-store on the corner of Front and Cherry Streets. For many years Dr. Craig dispensed drugs and visited the sick far and near. His name was known all over the land, and for miles he traveled by night and day visiting the sick. He was the friend of the poor, and seldom refused to call upon patients who were unable to pay for his services. Towards the latter part of his life he became quite wealthy through the rise of the value of his real estate in the city of Plainfield. His remains lie in the Union Cemetery, where a block of granite close to the main foot-walk tells that here lies the body of John Craig, M.D.

ALLEN WILSON practiced in Plainfield at an early time. Little is known of the history of his life beyond the fact that he died in the year 1837.

CHARLES H. STILLMAN, physician and ex-mayor of Plainfield, was born in Schenectady, N. Y., Jan. 25, 1817. The family is of English descent, the ancestor having emigrated to Massachusetts in 1680. His father, Joseph Stillman, was widely known as a ship-builder. Dr. Stillman graduated at Union College in 1835, and in the year 1840 took his medical degree at the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York.

In 1842 he removed to Plainfield, N. J., where he has since resided, actively engaged in the practice of his profession. His advance to the front rank of medical practitioners was rapid and brilliant. He was for many years surgeon of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and his great skill as a surgeon has won the cordial recognition not only of the community at large but of all in the profession. Next to his devotion to his profession is his practical earnestness in forwarding the educational interests of the community in which he resides (see schools). He was a member of the State Medical Society, and president of the Medical Society of Union County. He was also a director of the City National Bank, of the Washington Fire Insurance Company, the City Savings Institute, and various other corporations. In 1872 he was nominated by both political parties for the office of mayor of Plainfield, and elected to the position, and administered the duties of the office for two years. He was married in 1842 to Mary E. Starr, of Hamilton, New York. His eldest son, Thomas B. Stillman, was for a time assistant professor of chemistry in Stevens Institute, Hoboken, N. J.; his second son, Charles F. Stillman, M.D., medical examiner in Mutual Life Insurance Company, now practicing in city of New York; his third, William M. Stillman, counselor-at-law in city of Plainfield.

Medical Societies.—THE NEW JERSEY MEDICAL SOCIETY was the first institution of the kind organized in the colonies. In view of the low state of medicine in the province in 1766, and the difficulties and discouragements which stood in the way of its advancement, a number of physicians were led to consider the project of forming a voluntary association of the principal practitioners, for the purpose of elevating the standard of the profession and of promoting its general usefulness to the public. In order to call together those who might be disposed to take an interest in the scheme the following notice was published in the New York Mercury:

"A considerable number of the practitioners of physic and surgery in East New Jersey having agreed to form a society for their mutual improvement, the advancement of the profession, and promotion of the public good, and desirous of extending as much as possible the usefulness of their scheme, and of cultivating the utmost harmony and friendship with their brethren, hereby request and invite every gentleman of the profession in the province that may approve of their design to attend their first meeting, which will be held at Mr. Duff's, in the city of New Brunswick, on Wednesday, the 23d of July, at which time and place the constitution and regulations of the society are to be settled and subscribed.

"EAST NEW JERSEY, JUNE 27, 1766."

Sixteen physicians responded to this call, met at New Brunswick on the appointed day, and adopted a constitution ample in its aim and purpose as that of medical societies of the present day. The constitution was signed by fourteen physicians, whose names were as follows:

Robert McKean.
Chris. Manlove.
John Cochran.

Moses Bloomfield.
James Gilliland.
William Burnett.

John C. Elmer

Julius Felt. Del.

Lewis Drake M D

Jona. Dayton.
Thomas Wiggins.
William Adams.
Bern. Budd.

Lawrence V. Dewere.
John Griffith.
Isaac Harris.
Joseph Sackett, Jr.

Three of these original members, viz.: Drs. Burnet, Dayton, and Griffith, were residents and practitioners in what is now Union County. Dr. Robert McKean was the first president. Charles Manlove was the first secretary of the society. Those who have served in the capacity of president and secretary of the society from Union County have been the following:

PRESIDENTS.

1766. Robert McKean.	1783. Thomas Barber.
1767-68. William Burnet.	1784. Lawrence Van Derveer.

1773. Nathaniel Scudder.	1789-92. Francis Bower Sayre.
1774. Hezekiah Stites.	1793-95. James Anderson.

The society continued to hold its regular semi-annual meetings either at New Brunswick, Princeton, or Burlington till 1775, when they were discontinued on account of the war.

A number of the members of the State Medical Society took an early and decided part in the struggle for independence. Dr. Wickes gives us the names of seventy-two physicians of New Jersey who were connected with offices under the government during and after the Revolution, forty-four of whom were collegiate graduates from the following institutions: Princeton, twenty-seven; Yale, five; Kings, two; Queens, two; University of Pennsylvania, one; Harvard, one; Foreign, six.

At the close of the war, in November, 1781, the society resumed its meetings, which were sustained with regularity until 1795. Ninety-one members had been enrolled since its organization. From this latter date there was a suspension of its meetings until 1807, owing to the organization of another society in Eastern New Jersey, through the influence of Dr. Paul Miceau, of Elizabethtown. In 1807 the society resumed its functions under its charter of 1790, and in December, 1807, an act to ratify its proceedings was passed by the Legislature.

The feature of district medical societies, organized in the respective counties and auxiliary to the State society, was adopted upon its reorganization in 1807, and has tended greatly to the strength and permanence of the parent institution.

The physicians who were instrumental in forming the District Medical Society of the County of Union are named in the following:

COMMISSION.

"STATE OF NEW JERSEY, ss.

"By the Medical Society of New Jersey, to S. Abernethy, Wm. M. Whitehead, D. W. C. Hough, L. W. Oakley, Louis Braun, Elihu B. Silvers, Thos. L. Hough, J. S. Martin, Wm. Gale, J. A. Petrie, Thomas Terrill, Jr., Eugene Wiley, P. U. Selover, J. O. Pinneo, Alonzo Pettit, Physicians and Surgeons, greeting:

"Your application requesting that a District Medical Society might be instituted, consisting of Drs. S. Abernethy, Wm. M. Whitehead, and others, above mentioned, in the County of Union, was duly considered at a meeting of the Medical Society of New Jersey, held at Jersey City, the 26th day of May, Anno Domini 1869, and it was thereupon voted that your request be granted, provided that this grant is not to be extended beyond the period of one year.

"In testimony whereof the President, pursuant to the aforesaid vote of the Society, subscribed his name and affixed the seal of the Corporation at Orange, this 27th day of May, Anno Domini 1869.

"WM. PIERSON, President.

"Attested:

"WM. PIERSON, JR., Rec. Sec."

The objects of the society are briefly stated in the constitution, as follows:

1st. To advance the science and art of medicine and surgery.

2d. To promote harmony among medical men, and maintain high the standard of professional character.

The regular meetings of the society are held quarterly on the second Wednesday in April, July, October, and January.

The following-named persons have been the officers of the society since its organization:

PRESIDENTS.

JOHN C. SUTPHEN, M.D., was born at the old Sutphen homestead in Somerset County, N. J., Aug. 12, 1834. His paternal ancestors came from Sutphen, Holland, and from this ancient city the family name is derived. Both of his grandmothers were of English (Puritan) descent. His father was Gilbert Sutphen, and his mother's maiden name was Jane M. Crater. His early boyhood was spent on the farm at home, and at the school of his native place. His preparatory education was received under the private instruction of Rev. W. W. Blauvelt, of Lamington, N. J., a Presbyterian clergyman. He entered Princeton College in 1852, and was graduated from that institution in 1856. His brother, Rev. Morris C. Sutphen, was his classmate and fellow-graduate; was engaged in ministerial labor from his graduation in theology until his decease, and died June 18, 1875. After his college course Dr. Sutphen entered the theological seminary with his brother, but ill health compelled him to relinquish the study of theology after three months. For one year thereafter he conducted a preparatory school at Southampton, L. I., and then began the study of medicine with Dr. C. C. Suydam, of Lamington; in due time attended lectures in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, from which he was graduated in March, 1859.

During the following eight years he was actively engaged in the practice of his profession at Liberty Corners, in Somerset County, and soon after settling there, on Jan. 11, 1860, he married Miss Fannie A., daughter of David King, Esq., and Fannie Layton, of that place, but formerly of New York. The surviving children by this union are Jennie Frances, David King, Madge Louise, Charlotte Victoria, Gilbert Tennant, John Calvin, Morris, Clarence, Julia Scott, and Carman Parse.

Dr. Sutphen removed to Plainfield in 1867, and soon after his arrival was chosen city physician under the new charter then just adopted, and in the following year was elected a member of the Common Council, and was appointed chairman of several important committees. In the mean time Dr. Sutphen's practice steadily increased, and reliance in his professional skill and regard for his integrity and sterling qualities as a public-spirited citizen were greatly augmented by his fearless and successful labors during the memorable smallpox pestilence. His great kindness of heart and sympathy for the suffering as often led him to the bedside of those from whom he expected no remuneration and never received any as to administer to those in affluence. His heroic exertions on this occasion were in a measure recognized by the citizens of Plainfield by his nomination and election in 1874, and re-election in 1875, mayor of Plainfield, which position he filled to the entire satisfaction of his fellow-citizens, and to the permanent benefit of the city.

Dr. Sutphen was well read in his profession, and took an active interest in all that pertained to the prosperity of Plainfield. He was a student of the cause and cure of complicated cases of disease, a man of quick perception and ready diagnosis. In early life he united with the Presbyterian Church at Lamington; was a member of the church of Liberty Corners, and upon his settlement in Plainfield became at once an active and influential member of the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church. Of the latter church he was trustee for several years, and was one of the building committee, and contributed liberally of his means in erecting the present fine church edifice. Dr. Sutphen died April 13, 1878, suddenly, of apoplexy. Upon the occasion of his death the members of the Union County Medical Society passed appropriate resolutions expressing their high esteem for the memory of their departed collaborer, and mourning the loss of an honest practitioner, an upright citizen, and a Christian gentleman.

DR. CORRA OSBORN, son of Jonathan H. and Martha (Shotwell) Osborn, was born at Scotch Plains, Union Co., N. J., May 12, 1793, and died at Westfield,

John C. Swafford M.D.

June 7, 1868. His early education was obtained in the common school of his native place and under the private instruction of Dr. Ludlow, with whom he subsequently studied medicine. He was graduated at a medical college in New York at the age of nineteen, and began the practice of his profession at Acquackanonck, Passaic Co., N. J., but soon afterwards formed a copartnership with Dr. Philemon Elmer, of Westfield, which continued until the decease of Dr. Elmer, when he succeeded to the entire practice, which he continued until about six years before his death, having been in the successful practice of his profession for a period of forty years. Dr. Osborn, as a physician of the past generation, ranked among the first of his day, and was known as a skillful, painstaking, and devoted practitioner. His ride extended over a large territory in the vicinity of Westfield, and he was widely known as a safe counselor and of quick perception in the diagnosis of complicated cases of disease. Dr. Osborn was a staunch member of the old Whig party, but never sought office, or held any. Upon the organization of the Republican party he became a bold advocate of its principles, and remained a strong supporter of its platform until his death.

From the age of twenty-seven years he was a member of the First Baptist Church at Scotch Plains, and served the church for many years as one of its deacons. He gave liberally of his means in the support of every worthy local enterprise, and especially was he interested in the propagation of religious doctrine and the establishment of morality, law, and order in society. His wife, Mary Hand, whom he married June 30, 1812, bore him the following children: Mahlon, deceased; Mary, wife of Samuel Hayes; Letitia, widow of David Miller; Ann, deceased, was the wife of Nathan Williams. The mother of these children died Oct. 26, 1826.

The contributor of Dr. Osborn's portrait and sketch, Samuel Hayes, was born June 3, 1816, and is a son of Dr. Samuel Hayes, who lived and died in Newark, N. J., where he practiced medicine for over forty years.

Samuel Hayes has followed agricultural pursuits most of his life near Scotch Plains, and is a supporter of the First Baptist Church at that place. His wife, Mary, is a daughter of Dr. Corra Osborn, before alluded to, whom he married on May 17, 1848. His children are Mary, Hannah D., and Lydia K. Hayes.

JOHN C. ELMER, M.D.—The records of the Elmer family in its different branches furnish us with many names of those who have held high positions of honor and trust in the church, in the community, and in the struggle of the American Revolution. Although the early settlers located first in Connecticut, and then in New York, some of their number came to New Jersey.

Rev. Jonathan Elmer, and his son, Moses, M.D., settled in New Providence, Union Co., while his son, Philemon, M.D., went to Westfield, Union Co. Gen. Ebenezer Elmer resided in Cumberland County.

The progenitor of the family in this country was Edward Elmer, who emigrated Sept. 4, 1632, and became one of the first settlers of Hartford, Conn.

His grandson, Deacon Jonathan, settled in Sharon, Conn.

Dr. Nathaniel, son of Deacon Jonathan, was a physician in active medical practice in Florida, N. Y., and died there in the year 1779.

Dr. William, son of Dr. Nathaniel, practiced medicine in Goshen, Orange Co., N. Y., and was a member of the "Medical Society of the Counties of Ulster and Orange, in the State of New York," which society was instituted June 25, 1793.

Dr. William occupied a prominent position in the State in which he resided, and was appointed "Surgeon of the regiment of militia in the County of Orange, at a meeting of the council of appointment, at the Exchange, in the city of New York, on Tuesday, the 26th day of September, 1786."

He was also "appointed, in 1796, by virtue of an act of Congress, as one of a board of examining physicians and surgeons for the County of Orange, in the State of New York."

Dr. William's son, Horace, was the father of Dr. John C. Elmer, the subject of this sketch, at the time of whose death the following article, with slight variation, was written at the request of the medical society by Rev. O. L. Kirtland, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Springfield, of which church Dr. Elmer was a member, and was published in the "Report of the Medical Society of New Jersey for 1864":

"Dr. John C. Elmer, son of Horace Elmer, was born in Goshen, Orange Co., N. Y., April 7, 1817. His grandfather, his great-grandfather, and his elder brother, William S., were all physicians in active practice until their deaths. William S., elder brother of John C., practiced medicine in the city of New York, and was a victim of over-exertion during the cholera season of 1834.

"John C. Elmer spent the early years of his childhood with his parents in his native town. At the age of fourteen he entered the store of a druggist and practicing physician in the city of New York as clerk, and remained in that capacity four or five years.

"There he became thoroughly acquainted with the character of medicines, and with the modes of testing them, and learned the importance of selecting and scrutinizing very carefully the remedies which he administered. To the habit of examining personally all medicines given by his prescriptions he ascribed much of his success. His academical studies were pursued successively in the academies at Bloomfield, N. J., and at Morristown, N. J.

The study of medicine, commenced about the year 1835 or 1836, was pursued for a season under the supervision of Dr. John Hubbard, of New York City, and later under the direction of Dr. John B. Johns, of Morristown, N. J.

"In or about the year 1838 he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and also took two summer courses of lectures in the medical college at Pittsfield, Mass., then under the care of Dr. Willard Parker, of New York City. He received his diploma April 7, 1840, and in May of the same year, at the age of twenty-three, entered upon the practice of his profession as partner of Dr. Absalom Woodruff, in Mendham, N. J."

In September, 1843, he married Jane R., only child of William Stites, of Springfield, N. J. Dr. Elmer remained in Mendham until April, 1852, possessing the confidence and esteem of a very large circle of friends and patrons, who manifested deep feelings of regret and reluctance at the loss of their physician when he left them.

His cheerful home in Mendham was situated in the centre of a large practice, which involved many long and tedious winter rides over the bleak hills of that part of Morris County.

Just as he was deciding to accept the oft-repeated invitation from numerous friends and relatives in Springfield, N. J., he received flattering inducements to settle in Somerville. Several leading citizens pledged to him the support of twenty-four influential families as an introduction in the town. Dr. Elmer, while gratefully appreciating this generous offer from the citizens of Somerville, decided in favor of Springfield for several family reasons, whence he removed immediately, pursuing his profession with diligence and success until arrested by the typhoid fever, superinduced by a season of unusual professional fatigue and exposure, of which he died Oct. 17, 1863.

While at Mendham, Dr. Elmer was for a number of years one of the board of censors for the district of Morris County. Intellectually, he was characterized by strength and discrimination rather than by brilliancy. Spurning the merely superficial, he was patient in research, and unwilling to rest until sure of a foundation that could not be shaken, hence the usual correctness of his diagnosis, and the confidence of his patients.

Possessed of a happy social talent and unaffected manners, he found easy access to the hearts of his patrons, and endeared himself to them by a kindness which reached beyond his professional services, sympathizing with them in their trials, and, when occasion required, extending a helping hand for their relief.

In Springfield he occupied a prominent and decided stand as a friend of popular education. Mainly through his influence a tasteful, commodious, and well furnished academy was built, and for a series of years a school was maintained quite in advance of the ordinary public schools of the day.

Dr. Elmer was a Christian, occupying both in Mendham and in Springfield the place of a worthy communicant in the Presbyterian Church, having been a leader of its choir and a helper in its enterprises. He was animated by the spirit of true patriotism. During the progress of the civil war, occasioned by the great Southern Rebellion, his feelings were deeply enlisted, and all his sympathies were with the government in its measures for suppressing the insurgents, and maintaining the nation in its integrity.

The wide-spread grief occasioned by his death bore testimony that his confiding family, who rested upon him as the pillar of all their earthly hopes, were not the only mourners. All classes united in the sentiment that one had fallen whose place as a physician, as a friend, and as a citizen could not easily be filled again.

Dr. Elmer's funeral services were attended in the Presbyterian Church in Springfield. Rev. David Magie, D.D., of Elizabeth, N. J., who conducted the rites, spoke on the "character and offices of the beloved physician," and as he witnessed the vast throng of weeping friends who pressed eagerly forward to take a last fond look at the face so long familiar to them remarked, "This immense assemblage seems to me like one great mourning family circle."

Dr. Elmer left a widow and two children,—a son, William S., and a daughter, Louise B. His son died very suddenly in three weeks after his father, aged seventeen years.

The following article is an extract copied from the daily papers, published at the time of his death by the physicians at a special meeting of the District Medical Society of the County of Essex, of which John C. Elmer, M.D., was a member:

"Dr. John C. Elmer, of Springfield, N. J., died on Saturday, 17th inst., of typhoid fever, aged forty-six years. Deceased has been a resident of Springfield for many years, where he had the esteem of all who knew him.

"In the death of this physician our county has lost one of its ablest practitioners. He was much beloved and respected at Mendham, Morris Co., whence he removed about eleven years ago. His death leaves a vacuum not easily filled. He died of typhoid fever, the result, probably, of his zealous effort to relieve others.

"The Essex County Medical Society, of which he was a member, held a meeting last evening in relation to the subject of his death.

"The president, Dr. W. M. Brown, occupied the chair; Drs. John F. Ward, L. A. Smith, and J. Henry Clark were appointed to draft resolutions, and reported the following, which were adopted:

"Resolved, That we have learned with sincere regret of the decease of our brother, John C. Elmer.

"Resolved, That we cherish a fond recollection of the amiable manners and kindly disposition of our late brother, and that this dispensation reminds us of our own mortality.

"Resolved, That we desire to convey to his afflicted family our sense of bereavement, and our heartfelt sympathy for them in this hour of their great calamity.

Dr. DeWitt C. Hough

His paternal grandfather, Benjamin Hough, who was of English descent, was a farmer in Bucks County, Pa., and there reared a large family of children, of whom one son, Gen. Joseph Hough, father of our subject, was born in 1798 and died at the age of seventy-seven years. He attained the rank of general in the old State militia; was a merchant at Point Pleasant, Bucks Co.; justice of the peace there for over forty years, and he was for several years superintendent of the Delaware Division of the Pennsylvania Canal. He was a man popular among his fellow-citizens, and influential in political matters of his native county. The latter part of his life was spent at Philadelphia, and his death occurred at the residence of his son at Frenchtown, N. J. Gen. Hough's mother was a Simpson, and sister of the mother of Gen. Ulysses Simpson Grant. His wife, Jane, daughter of Joseph Crowell, of Point Pleasant, who died in 1866, aged sixty-six years, bore him the following children: Dr. DeWitt C. Hough, subject of this sketch; Bryan, agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Frenchtown, N. J.; Hannah, wife of Samuel Bangor, of Philadelphia; Horace Binney, who served for three years in the late civil war, first in a Pennsylvania regiment, was captured by the Rebels, and afterwards belonged to the Third New Jersey Cavalry, is now in the United States Mint at Philadelphia; Morrison, died at St. Louis, at the age of seventeen; John Simpson, served in the late civil war, in the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment Cavalry, afterwards served as captain in the Third New Jersey Cavalry, and was killed at the battle of Five Forks.

Dr. DeWitt C. Hough was born at Point Pleasant, Dec. 31, 1826. His early education was obtained at the schools of his native place and at the Newtown Academy. After one year as clerk in a general store he began the study of medicine with Dr. Arnold, of Carversville, Bucks Co., Pa., with whom he remained one year; was a student for two years with the eminent physician, Dr. Charles Froncfield, of Harleysville, Pa., and attended three courses of lectures at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, from which he was graduated on March 25, 1847. Immediately after his graduation he began the practice of his profession: was at Tyersport, Pa., one year; at Red Hill, Bucks Co., near his native place, for three years; and at Frenchtown, N. J., for six years. In February, 1857, Dr.

Hough settled at Rahway, N. J., and took the practice of Dr. Janeway. At this time the older practitioners of medicine in Rahway were Drs. Abernethy, Drake, Cook, and Silvers. Since his residence in Rahway, by his devotion to his patients, by his skill as a physician and surgeon, by his attendance upon the poor needing medical assistance, as well as upon those able to pay for professional services, Dr. Hough has become socially and professionally identified with the people of Rahway and the surrounding country, and commands a large practice. He has been closely identified with the interests of Rahway during his residence there; was mayor of the city in 1867-68; was a member of the first Board of Water Commissioners and president of it for three years, and was elected on the Democratic ticket and served in the lower branch of the State Legislature in 1868-69.

Upon the breaking out of the late civil war, Dr. Hough was commissioned, Sept. 5, 1861, surgeon of the Seventh New Jersey Volunteers, which was a part of the Third Corps, under Gen. Hooker, but afterwards consolidated with the Second Corps, and with the exception of six weeks that he was detailed for hospital duty after the battle of Gettysburg, and three weeks after the battle of Fredericksburg, he followed the fortunes and misfortunes of the regiment until he was mustered out of service in October, 1864, having been a short time before leaving the army promoted to the position of brigade-surgeon.

He was successively in the battles of—siege of Yorktown, battle of Williamsburg, Seven Days' battle before Richmond, Glendale, first and second battles at Malvern Hill, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, battles of Richmond, Seven Pines, and Bristow Station.

Dr. Hough was one of the charter members of the Union County Medical Society, founded in 1869, and has frequently been a delegate to the State Medical Society of New Jersey.

His wife, whom he married Jan. 28, 1850, is Almira W., daughter of Philip Runkle, of Milford, N. J., and his children by this union are one daughter, Jennie C., and one son, Dr. H. Page Hough, who was graduated in the commercial, classical, and high school at Lawrence, in 1873; studied medicine with his father, and attended lectures at Jefferson Medical College, from which he was graduated in the class of March 12, 1878, and is now practicing his profession in Rahway.

John J. Daly, M.D.

John Joseph Daly, M.D., son of John and Catherine Daly, was born in Rahway, N. J., where his parents resided, on May 26, 1852. His early education from books was received at the public schools of his native place, and at the exceedingly youthful age of thirteen, in 1865, he began the study of medicine in the office of the late Dr. Samuel Abernethy, of Rahway, well known throughout the State as one of the best read physicians and successful practitioners of surgery of his day. Here he remained for nine years, and although his progress was such that long before reaching his majority his medical education was sufficient to be graduated, yet by the laws of the university he could not be, and therefore, after attending lectures in the medical department from 1870, he was graduated at the University of New York in the class of 1873. For many years prior to this he had taken charge of a large part of Dr. Abernethy's office and outside practice, and had become wholly conversant with the practice and theory of both surgery and medicine.

After his graduation Dr. Daly returned, and until Dr. Abernethy's death, Feb. 13, 1874, remained with him, when he had become so fully associated with him in his professional work that he found a large field for the immediate encouragement of his talents, which had already attracted attention and placed him favorably before the people. Dr. Daly has continued the practice of his profession here since, a period of eight years, and his skill as an operating surgeon, his intrepid coolness where nerve is required to meet a difficult case, and the exceeding difficult operations performed by him in surgery have placed his name among the most skillful surgeons of the present and past. His quick perception in the diagnosis of a case, and ready understanding of the proper remedies necessary for relief, have also given him rank with physicians of large experience and extensive practice. For many years he has been employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company as surgeon and medical adviser at Rahway.

"Resolved, That we will attend his funeral and wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

"Resolved, That the secretary be requested to communicate to the family a copy of the foregoing resolutions, and to procure their publication in the daily journals."

EUGENE JOBS, M.D.—The progenitor of the Jobs family in America was Adam Jobs, who probably emigrated from Holland and settled at Green Brook, north of Plainfield, N. J. He married Katy Covenhoven and had one son, Nicholas Conover Jobs, who lived and died at Liberty Corners, N. J. He was a member of the Legislature, justice of the peace, and postmaster of the village for nearly fifty years. He married Margaret Castner, who was of German parentage, and had children,—Eugene and Mary Elizabeth, who became the wife of Rev. James T. English. Eugene, who is the subject of this biographical sketch, was born Feb. 22, 1821, at the home of his parents, where his early life was spent, his youth having been devoted to attendance at the public school of the neighborhood. Having determined upon a professional career he chose that of medicine, and entered the office of Dr. James Delano. After a period of study under his direction he repaired to Philadelphia and became a student at the Medical University of Pennsylvania, from which he graduated April 4, 1844. He was licensed Sept. 11, 1844, to practice by the Medical Society of New Jersey, and remained for a short time at his house in Liberty Corners. Desiring, however, a wider field of labor, he removed to Springfield, and continued an active practitioner until his decease.

He was married to Miss Mary Lum, daughter of Thomas C. Allen, of Union township, and had children,—Margaret A., who became Mrs. James M. C. Morrison; Thomas Allen, now a resident of Colorado and a lawyer; Nicholas C., and Mary K. Dr. Jobs was a member of the Essex County Medical Society, and also of the Union County Medical Society. His practice was extended and remarkably successful, the result not less of a thorough knowledge of his profession than of fidelity and devotion to his patients. His political views were in sympathy with the platform of the Democratic party, though the doctor rarely participated in the annual contests for office. He was a supporter of the worship of the Presbyterian Church of Springfield, which he attended.

The death of Dr. Jobs occurred at his residence in the village of Springfield. His son, Nicholas C. Jobs, was born Jan. 12, 1851, and having adopted his father's profession, spent three years at Cornell University, after which he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, from which he graduated March 4, 1874. After a year and a half spent at the Charity Hospital, New York, he succeeded to the practice of his father. He was married Nov. 12, 1878, to Miss Marietta, daughter of Silas Miller. They have one son, Walter English Jobs.

LEWIS DRAKE, M.D., physician of Rahway, N. J., was born on the Drake homestead in Piscataway, Middlesex Co., Aug. 25, 1802.

A family tradition connects him with the descendants of the celebrated English navigator of Queen Elizabeth's reign, but no authentic records have yet been found to prove the tradition true further than that the Drakes were among the early English settlers of this part of New Jersey. His grandfather, Ephraim Drake, born in Piscataway, Oct. 31, 1747, married, March 14, 1773, Rachel Fitz Randolph, who was born Aug. 21, 1751, and died Oct. 1, 1816. He died Aug. 21, 1801. They had three children,—Sarah, Reuben, and Catherine.

Ephraim Drake lived during the perilous times of the war for the independence of the colonies, and on one occasion the British entered his house and despoiled him of his entire stock of provisions.

Reuben, only son of Ephraim, was born in Piscataway, March 7, 1775, and there, like his father before him, spent his life as a farmer. He kept aloof from public offices, but took a laudable pride in the cultivation of his farm, which contained some two hundred and fifty acres. He was a member of the Baptist Church at Piscataway, and died March 15, 1843. His wife, Miriam, was a daughter of Ephraim Pyatt, of the same place, who was born March 24, 1779, was married June 8, 1799, and died Aug. 5, 1869.

The children of Reuben and Miriam Drake were: Ephraim, a farmer most of his active business life in his native township, born April, 1800, died July 7, 1867; Lewis, subject of this sketch; and Emily, who died young. Lewis Drake remained at home attending the district school and assisting his father on the farm until twenty years of age, when he resolved to lead a professional instead of a business life. His preparatory education was received at Dr. Brownley's grammar school at Basking Ridge, at Amherst, Mass., and under the private instructions of Rev. Dr. Cook, of Piscataway. In 1826 he began the study of medicine with Dr. Taylor, of New Brunswick, and completed his studies with Dr. Samuel Jackson, professor at that time of the practice of medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, from which institution, after taking three courses of lectures therein, he was graduated in the spring of 1829. Dr. Drake, the same spring, began the practice of medicine at Woodbridge, Middlesex Co., and was associated with the late eminent physician, Dr. Matthias Freeman, who for many years had enjoyed an extensive practice in that part of New Jersey, but who the same year died, Dr. Drake being inducted at once into a large and lucrative practice; settled the same spring at Rahway, where he has resided and continued the practice of his profession since, a period of fifty-two years.

At that time there were no druggists in the village, and Dr. Drake, like other early physicians, purchased his medicines in bulk in New York City, and compounded them himself. This practice he has kept up during his entire professional career, thereby administering to his patients only medicines prepared by himself. As a physician, Dr. Drake has always been esteemed for his skill in the diagnosis and management of complicated cases of disease, and his devotion and kindness to those under his treatment, with his thorough knowledge of cause of disease and effect of certain remedies, has given him a wide reputation and place among the most prominent physicians of his day. As a citizen, although never solicitous of public place or the emoluments of office, he has ever been interested in the growth of the place where he resides and in the welfare of its citizens, and in 1855 and 1856, through his influence largely, an act of the Legislature was passed whereby the mill-dams on the Rahway River within the city limits were removed, it being shown that they were the cause of much sickness to the population. For many years he was a member of the Middlesex County Medical Society, and attended its meetings at New Brunswick. Dr. Drake has devoted his active life strictly to the duties of his profession, and alike to the rich and poor administered relief and given encouragement in cases of suffering, and in 1882 he is the oldest resident practicing physician in Union County.

His first wife, whom he married May 16, 1832, was Charity S., daughter of the late Dr. Matthias Freeman, before alluded to, and granddaughter of Dr. Melancthon Freeman, an old physician of Metuchen. She died April 28, 1842, aged thirty-two years, leaving one surviving child, Cornelia B., who has always resided at home. For his second wife Dr. Drake married Mrs. Julia A. Martin, formerly Julia Barney, of New Haven, Conn., who died Sept. 2, 1874, aged sixty-seven years. Dr. Drake built his present residence on Main Street in 1837, and has occupied it for both office and residence since.

RANDOLPH TITSWORTH, M.D.—His paternal ancestors were of Welsh origin, and the Titsworths of New Jersey are descendants of five brothers who emigrated from Wales and were early settlers in the State.

His paternal grandfather, Lewis, was a farmer, and resided respectively at Spotswood and New Market, in Middlesex County, where he reared a family of ten children. His maternal grandfather, Isaac F. Randolph, a wealthy and influential citizen of New Brooklyn, was a descendant of the Fitz Randolphs, early settlers in Woodbridge.

Abraham, son of Lewis Titsworth, was during his early manhood a merchant tailor at Metuchen, subsequently a farmer, and died at New Brooklyn in May, 1868, at the age of seventy-three years. He was highly esteemed as a citizen for his integrity in all his business relations; was a member of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church, and for several terms served as judge of the Court of Common Pleas. His wife, Juliet Fitz Randolph, survives in 1882, at the age of eighty years, and bore him eight children,—Dr. Randolph, subject of this sketch; Mary Ann, wife of Daniel Rogers, of Metuchen; Caleb S., a lawyer and ex-judge of the city of Newark; Julia E., wife of David L. Randolph, of New Brooklyn; John Howard, a farmer in Pardee, Kansas; Isaac Lewis, deceased; Amanda, wife of William B. Maxson, a lawyer of Plainfield; and Thomas Stillman, deceased.

R. B. Titsworth

Dr. Randolph Titsworth was born Feb. 26, 1821. His early education was received in the schools at home, and his preparatory course at the High School at Shiloh, N. J., and at De Ruyter, N. Y. In his efforts to obtain an education he was obliged to depend upon his own resources, and unassisted pecuniarily he worked his way, struggling against obstacles incident to straitened circumstances, until he finished his preparatory course. In 1847 he began the study of medicine with Drs. E. T. Richardson and J. G. Loomis, of Syracuse, N. Y., but soon after, Dr. Loomis being appointed to the chair of obstetrics in the Homœopathic College in Philadelphia, Dr. Titsworth accompanied him, and continued his studies with him in the college until his graduation in 1853. Prior to this he practiced for about a year in the college, and for some time had charge of the dispensary department. At this time the practice of medicine by what was termed homœopathy was in its infancy, and only here and there could be found an exponent of the new theory. In what is now Union County there was only one, Dr. Green, of Elizabeth, and in Middlesex County there was also only one homœopathic practitioner, Dr. Robinson. Dr. Titsworth settled in Plainfield in the spring of 1853, and was the first to invite the people to examine the new departure in the practice of medicine in that section of New Jersey. He found only two families ready to willingly receive it. With that earnestness and zeal that has characterized his professional career, and with full confidence that it only required time for the more intelligent and thinking public to give credence to this new theory of the practice of medicine, Dr. Titsworth, by his skillful and scientific treatment of cases coming before him, gradually won his way to a place in the profession as a worthy exponent of homœopathy, although he was opposed at every step by doctors of the regular practice. This new school of medicine has rapidly developed its theory before the people, and made a new era in the theory and practice of medicine, and whereas only two families in Plainfield and the surrounding country were its advocates in 1853, when Dr. Titsworth first settled there, it is asserted upon good authority that its practice in 1882 is equal to the regular practice, if not in the majority among the more wealthy, influential, and intelligent families.

Dr. Titsworth is the founder of homœopathic practice in and about Plainfield, and during his nearly thirty years' practice there his skill as a physician, his quick perception in the diagnosis of complicated cases of disease, and his devotion to his patients have won him an enviable reputation, and placed him among the first in his profession in the State. His practice has been continuous since he first settled in Plainfield, with the exception of one year, 1861, which he spent traveling in the Western States for his health, and some three years that he practiced in New York City.

In early life Dr. Titsworth was identified with the membership of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church, but since his residence in Plainfield he has been a member of Trinity Reformed Church there, and has served the church both as deacon and elder. He is a member of the American Institute of Homœopathy, and of the State Homœopathic Medical Society, founded in 1853, for which he served as treasurer during the first two years of its existence.

He married in 1844 Miss Lucinda L., daughter of Samuel Caldwell, of Pompey, N. Y., a native of Massachusetts, who died in May, 1875, leaving one child, Josephine, wife of William M. Runyon, of Plainfield. His present wife, whom he married in July, 1879, is Isabella L. Bragg, of White House, N. J.

CHAPTER XX.

PRESS OF UNION COUNTY.

The New Jersey Journal.—It is a somewhat noticeable fact that the Journal, which is now published in Elizabeth, was established here as early as 1785, soon after the close of the Revolution. Shepard Kollock, who had learned the printer's trade in Philadelphia and had been a lieutenant in the army till the close of the campaign of 1778, established the following year, by the advice of Gen. Knox, a weekly newspaper at Chatham, N. J., among the mountains, then deemed inaccessible by the British, whereby he might aid the patriot cause without fear of being disturbed by the enemy. That paper was called the New Jersey Journal. The first number bears date Feb. 10, 1779. Mr. Kollock was the editor and proprietor. The paper did great service to the cause of liberty, and continued to be published at Chatham till the end of the war. Upon the evacuation of New York by the British he removed his press to that city, and on Dec. 3, 1783, began the publication of the New York Gazetteer and Country Journal, opening also a book-store at No. 22 Hanover Square. This paper made rapid progress. The first month it was issued weekly; with the beginning of 1784 it became a tri-weekly, issued on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays until the 27th of July, then semi-weekly, issued on Tuesdays and Fridays, until August, 1786, when, in partnership with George Carroll and John Patterson, Mr. Kollock issued the paper under the name of the New York Gazetteer or Daily Evening Post until Dec. 14, 1786, when it was discontinued for want of support.

During part of this time Mr. Kollock also conducted a weekly paper called the New Jersey Journal and Political Intelligencer at New Brunswick, N. J. This was the present New Jersey Journal of Elizabeth; it was established at the former place as early as July, 1784, and was removed to its permanent location in this town probably at the beginning of the following year. This appears from the fact that the New York Gazetteer of Nov. 8, 1785, asks patronage for "the New Jersey paper printed at Elizabeth Town." The precise date of the transfer is not known.

A writer in the Newark Daily Messenger, under date of Elizabeth, N. J., July 29, 1858, writes thus of the Journal:

"A copy of this pioneer newspaper is now before us, published 'Wednesday, September 5, 1781,'¹ and marked 'Vol. III., Number CXXXIII.' The copy is a rare specimen of antiquity. It consists of a single sheet of three columns, and is but thirteen by three and one-fourth inches, containing interesting letters from W. Balfour to Right Honorable Lord George Germaine, taken from a packet bound from Charleston, S. C., to London; brief communications from Boston, Salem, Annapolis, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Poughkeepsie concerning the erection of strong works at Gloucester and Yorktown by Lord

Dr. Van Rensselaer, of Philadelphia, had a file of the New Jersey Journal from the beginning in 1858, but we have been unable to find it, although we have made diligent search.

Cornwallis with five thousand men, 'assisted by three thousand negroes;' accounts of the troops under Gens. Sumter and Marion in obliging 'Rawdon to move down the country,' etc., and many other items in relation to the war, which in the 'times that tried men's souls' must have been interesting.

"The editorial, written by S. Kollock at 'Chatham,' and found in an humble position at the bottom of the second page of the Journal, we transmit entire, hoping that either the style or subject-matter may prove of interest to your readers:

"Chatham, September 5th. We are told that Colonel Laurens, lately arrived at Boston from France, has obtained a loan of hard money for the use of these States.

"We are happy to announce to the publick the entire exchange of all our prisoners at New York and Long Island, most of whom have come out, and the rest may be momentarily expected. They received while in captivity one pound of flesh, two pounds of bread (which was often very bad), and a pint of rice per man for three days. Seldom does British munificence extend further.

"On Tuesday, the 28th ultimo, a fleet of thirteen ships of the line and four frigates, under the command of Admiral Hood, arrived at Sandy Hook from the West Indies. They brought over the Fortieth and Sixty-ninth Regiments.

"By the above fleet we learn that Admiral Rodney and Gen. Vaughan are sailed for England to answer for their nefarious conduct at St. Eustatius.

"The British fleet we are told still remain at the Hook, though it has been reported it had sailed.

"Last Wednesday night a party of Ward's plunderers from Bergen Neck came up to the neighborhood of Hackensack, where they collected a number of cattle, but our people assembled with such alacrity that they retook the cattle and killed and wounded several of the miscreants.

"Sunday night the infamous Thomas Ward with a party of black and white negroes came over to Newark Neck, where they concealed themselves until next morning for the purpose of kidnapping people going to the meadows, but being discovered, though not until they had taken five or six prisoners and a number of cows, our people collected and took two of the villainous prisoners. The enemy embarked with precipitancy under cover of their gunboats."

In Italics Mr. Kollock adds the following: "The price of this paper per quarter is half a dollar hard money, and not half a State dollar as some have mistakenly supposed."

Mr. Kollock conducted the Journal successfully until Sept. 1, 1818. On Wednesday, June 13, 1792, the latter part of its long name was dropped, though political intelligence did not cease to be a feature of the paper. Mr. Kollock was a zealous patriot and a strenuous advocate of Republican principles, as the Democratic doctrines were then called, adhering to the party which elected Jefferson to the Presidency. He defended the administration in the war of 1812-15, and supported John Quincy Adams for President. Sept. 1, 1818, he sold out to Peter Chatterton.

Mr. Kollock held the position of postmaster until 1829, and for thirty-five years was a judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Essex, continuing in that office until his death, which occurred July 28, 1839, at the age of eighty-eight years.

Dec. 5, 1797, the day of publication of the Journal was changed from Wednesday to Tuesday, on which latter day it has been issued ever since.

We have found it impossible to obtain information respecting the continuous mangement of the Jour- nal down to the present time. We have, however, gleaned the following facts:

In the file for 1848 we find the names of "William M. Whitehead, editor, and James S. Drake, printer. Published every Tuesday morning opposite the lecture-room of the First Presbyterian Church, Broad Street, Elizabethtown, at two dollars and a half per annum, payable at the end of the first six months, or one dollar and seventy-five cents in advance."

Mr. Frederick W. Foote, for thirty years engaged in the profession of teaching in Elizabeth, purchased of Drake, Davis & Drake the New Jersey Journal, and assumed, with James S. Drake, the work and responsibility of editor and proprietor June 10, 1863. After a partnership of several years, Mr. Foote bought out Mr. Drake's share and became sole owner and proprietor.

About 1868 a venture was made to establish a daily newspaper in Elizabeth, but it failed after a brief struggle, and it was not until July, 1871, that the Elizabeth Daily Journal was firmly established, with Frederick W. Foote and Edward H. Clement as editors. The struggle of the new daily for a foothold in this city was a struggle that cannot be known to those outside of this office, and will never be appreciated by any as it was by Mr. Foote himself, who was often cheered in the fact that he had lived to see his conscientious work so successfully and firmly established. The gradual growth and prosperity of the paper, which, more surely than anything else, was Mr. Foote's characteristic work, are too well known in this city to need more than casual mention.

But Mr. Foote's work in the establishment and continuance of the Journal, great as it was, was scarcely more than half his actual labors. He was associated with every progressive organization in this city, and not as a mere member, but was actively engaged in every department where his valuable services could be of avail, and it seemed as if there were no departments where they could not.

From the time he came here he was a member of St. John's Episcopal Church, and when the late Rev. Dr. Clark became rector he was actively engaged in working for the church's interest. When the new church was built Mr. Foote was on the building committee, and superintended much of the work. In 1849 he was chosen a vestryman, and for many years past he was junior warden of this church, ex-Chancellor Williamson being senior warden. For seventeen years he was superintendent of the Sunday-school, and for many years was treasurer of the church. It is a generation ago since he was first elected a delegate or alternate from this church to the Diocesan Convention, and he attended these conventions every year, in one capacity or the other, ever since. He has served the church in office and in the pew with all his ability, all his example, and all his means. Next to his family and the Journal, St. John's Church suffers the severest loss. Few, excepting those who were intimately acquainted with Mr. Foote, know how much of his time was devoted to his church.

In March, 1853, Mr. Foote, with a number of other leading citizens, organized the Evergreen Cemetery Association, and three years later he was chosen one of the trustees. One month later he was elected secretary and treasurer, and has held that position ever since.

Regularly upon the day appointed for the meeting of this association Mr. Foote appeared in his place, and kept the records and business in such order that a wholly inexperienced hand could take his books at any time and carry forward the business at any meeting of the association.

When the First National Bank of this city was organized fifteen years ago, Mr. Foote was one of the original incorporators, and has been a director ever since. Three years after the establishment of the First National Bank, the Dime Savings Bank was incorporated, and here again Mr. Foote appeared as incorporator, and also vice-president.

One would suppose that attending to the necessary duties of all these institutions and editing a paper were work enough for one man, yet Mr. Foote did much more. During the war he was for five years collector of internal revenue, and though he then created irritation by the stern and conscientious exactness with which he applied the law and discharged his arduous duties, yet those who were then annoyed now admit the justness of his requirements, and cannot but praise his official integrity.

For years, too, Mr. Foote was assessor, and this was about the only office to which he was ever elected. It was not by any means in Mr. Foote's desire to be a public man, in the sense of one elected to public offices.

In still another department of life did Mr. Foote do a vast amount of labor, and that gratuitously. He was chosen in numberless cases as executor or administrator of estates, in settling disputed accounts, and as a peacemaker between parties who could not or would not agree with each other upon some disputed points. Many a time has Mr. Foote set aside work and time, far more valuable to him than the matter in dispute possibly could be, to settle some trifling affair between parties who would hear of no other arbitration than his judgment. Peace was his great desire, peace and good will his ever-potent remedy for all annoyance, and peace is his at last.

The latest accession to the many associations with which he was connected was the Board of Trade of this city, in which he was an active member, and slighted not in the least the duties which an active membership in this board necessitates.

In 1840, Mr. Foote was married. He had a family of nine children, seven of whom are now living to mourn a loving, Christian father's death.

Mr. Foote was born at Newtown, Conn., Oct. 23, 1816, and died at Elizabeth, N. J., March 18, 1879, aged sixty-three years. For years he had been complaining, but his extraordinary energy kept him up. In the summer of 1873 he visited Europe for three months and was greatly benefited in health. Gradually, however, his old disease returned and took firmer hold than ever before, terminating fatally in the early spring of 1879.

From the Daily Journal of March 19, 1879, under the head of "The Vacant Chair," we quote some extracts relating to Mr. Foote's characteristics as an editor and journalist:

"Mr. Foote was, in the best sense of the word, a self-made man. . . . He was but a mere stripling when he came here and identified himself with the fortunes of this city. Henceforth, for many years, his record may be read of all men in the characters he formed and moulded and the intelligences he developed. Here the highest tribute may be paid to his fidelity and trustworthiness. He insisted upon a lofty standard of scholarship and conduct, and he secured not only that end, but also in the strongest manner the respect and affections of his pupils. . . .

"But if his career as a teacher was a success, not less has he made his mark upon the community as a journalist. For this task he had admirable qualities. His industry was unfailing, his experience large and varied, and his local knowledge, both of persons and things, unbounded. As prominently identified with most of the leading institutions of the city, he had acquaintance with our needs, and this local knowledge was lavished upon his paper. He took a strong, practical, common sense view of things, exhibited unusual discretion and tact in shaping the course of his paper, and had a keen sense of what a local sheet should be. Cautious in taking a position, he required very convincing argument to abandon it when once taken. Habitually courteous and moderate in the expression of editorial opinion, he yet knew how to use the most vigorous Saxon when the nature of the case called for it, and his lash has more than once administered merited castigation. His idea of editorial writing was to have something to say and to say it, and not write fine words against space.

"If mistaken in any statement of fact, he was never ashamed to own it and make needed reparation in the columns of his paper, because it was the truth he was searching for more than to gratify any mere pride of opinion.

"And this brings us to the central fact of his newspaper management, its conscientiousness. The chart of instructions which he prepared for himself and his associates was to stick to the truth as they understood it at all hazards. He did not regard his newspaper primarily as a means to make money so much as a vehicle of public instruction. And thus he championed every good cause regardless of any temporary injury. His vigorous appeals in behalf of the Law and Order Society were a specimen of this; it would have been much easier to make no enemies by refraining from attacking a powerful interest. Politically, Mr. Foote had strong and vigorous convictions. While uniformly courteous on such issues, he called a spade a spade. But he never descended to personalities. He admitted honest differences of opinion, assailed the political heresy, but would not throw dirt upon his opponent. He never neglected his duty as a citizen, and therefore could consistently urge it upon others. . . .

"His effort was to elevate, liberalize, and enlighten through his paper, and not to make it a sewer through which filth, both foreign and domestic, could run to the injury of the morals and manners of families. . . .

"So far as local matters were concerned, Mr. Foote's editorial course was guided by what he deemed the best interests of the city. He had no personal axe to grind and no enemies to punish. Through all the difficult and trying circumstances through which we are passing, Mr. Foote consistently strove to find out what was the right thing and to advocate it. And when he did so it was in no shilly-shallying way, but with all the earnestness of profound conviction.

"Mr. Foote's view of politics was not a bread-and-butter view. He was not a candidate for public office, although he would not have shrunk from any such duty had it been placed upon him. His idea was that an editor should not compromise his independence by unworthy compliances, and a plain and honest avowal of one's convictions does not always tend to make friends among politicians. He looked at public affairs from the high point of statesmanship rather than that of personal self-seeking. And this explains why he believed in occasional friendly criticism of even his own party leaders and advocated a high standard for the civil service. His political utterances and opinions will be noted for their consistency and clearness."

"Of the irreparable loss which his death will cause to his family we cannot speak. There are sorrows too sacred to be more than alluded to. He has died as he lived, in the harness, and before his mental force was abated or his eye more than transiently dimmed. He has been fighting against death for several years, but never was his editorial work better, never were his views clearer, his line of policy more fixed than they were just as the curtain was about to drop upon his well-spent life.

"Another phase of Mr. Foote's life was the large amount of unrewarded labor he did for others who had no claim upon him. Even to the last, and sick and wearied as he was, Good Samaritan-like, he took the cares and misfortunes of others upon his tired and sore shoulders and did what he could for them. No business anxiety, corporate nor private responsibility could drive them out of his head. And this same abounding charity he showed to the weak and erring. A gentleman who has known him intimately for forty years told us that he never heard him speak unkindly of any one. He detested the sin, but he pitied the sinner, and he never advocated severe measures against the destitute and the outcast. He had too much the spirit of the Master in him for that.

"We have said thus much in simple justice to our dead friend, but his associates cannot fitly express a sense of their appreciation of his constant kindness to them. The office atmosphere was more like that of a family than of a varied and complicated business. Never did Mr. Foote fail to do justice to good work done by his associates. He preferred a kindly rivalry with them as to who could push the paper furthest and fastest, rather than a selfish appropriation of whatever might deserve praise. In his death his associates lose a kind and considerate friend; his journalistic brethren one who appreciated his noble profession, and made it his pride to do all he could to elevate it; his family a devoted husband and father; the church a tower of strength; the corporate associations with which he was connected a safe adviser; and the city a citizen who never shirked any responsibility, and who set a highly honorable example to the young."

The Journal is now published for the proprietor by Peter W. Rousse, editor; Charles C. McBride, city editor; Augustus S. Crane, cashier.

The present members are simply the editorial staff of Mr. Foote, who had been associated with him since the establishment of the Daily Journal.

The Central New Jersey Herald.—Established first as the Argus in 1861, changed to the Constitutionalist, then to the Union County Herald, and finally to its present name in 1870. From 1868 to the autumn of 1880 the establishment published a daily edition called the Elizabeth Daily Herald, which was discontinued at the commencement of the Hancock campaign. The first publishers were Drake & Cook, then the firm changed to Drake, Cook & Hall, and is at present Cook & Hall, steam printing-house, Nos. 105, 109, and 111 Broad Street.

Among those who have at various times been editors, outside of the proprietors and employés of the office, are M. L. Marks, now of the Art Amateur, New York, who remained on the paper several years. He was succeeded by William Black, and the latter by Col. Morris R. Hamilton, who was followed by John B. Pick. Subsequently Horace F. J. Drake was editor, and also member of the firm till the autumn of 1881. The subscription price of The Central New Jersey Herald is two dollars a year.

Elizabeth Freie Presse, a German semi-weekly newspaper, was established in 1870. Proprietor and publisher, Charles H. Schmidt. Subscription, three dollars per annum. Published in the rear of 1173 Elizabeth Avenue.

Elizabeth Freie Zeitung, German weekly, thirty cents per annum. Established in 1874. Editor and proprietor, L. Bauerband & Co., No. 33 First Street.

The Bridgetown Museum and New Jersey Advocate first appeared as a weekly, printed on Saturday, July 13, 1822. Smith Edgar was the proprietor, and the office was on Main Street, but the printing was done at Elizabeth. The terms of subscription, two dollars per year. In the fifth number of the paper, which appeared on the 10th of August, the name was changed to The Rahway Museum and New Jersey Advocate. The paper had but five columns on each of its four pages, making twenty in all. Under its heading was a motto extracted from one of Shakspeare's plays, "Nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice." The paper was far from being white, but was as good as that on which the majority of journals published at that day were printed. On the first page a story entitled "Iolanda, or the Court of Love," a tale of the fourteenth century, translated from the French, was commenced; it was finished in the second number. Besides the story there were given in the first number several poetical selections under the head "Garland of the Muses." In the first column on the second page appeared an article on some then recent instances of "Turkish Barbarity." In the editorial column the editor offered an apology for the delay that had occurred in bringing out the first issue, which he explained was on account of unavoidable obstacles in getting out a new paper. He also gave notice that a celebration of the national anniversary had taken place in New York on the 4th of July, when there was a greater parade than had been witnessed there for years before, and when a new drama, entitled "The Battle of Lexington," was performed, and was received with unbounded applause. "In our own neighborhood," says the editor, "universal exertion was made to celebrate the day, and Milton shone foremost in its endeavors."

Then, as now, distress in Ireland existed, and from the columns of the first number of the paper we learn that heartrending accounts were received of events transpiring in the Emerald Isle. At a village in County Clare the death of three persons from starvation was reported, and subscriptions were being raised for the large numbers who were in great destitution.

In a literary article mention is made of Washington Irvine (Irving), the novelist Brown, the plays of Dunlap, and the poems of Percival, Judah, and Bryant. The longest article in the number was a review of a poem entitled "Odofreide, the Outcast," with two columns of extracts from it. In the second number a review was given of Cooper's novel, "The Spy," and of Milman's poem, "The Martyr of Antioch."

In the second number of the paper appeared the call for a meeting to be held with a view to change the name of the town from Bridgetown to Rahway. This meeting was held at the Peace Hotel, on Main Street, where Lafayette was entertained when he visited Rahway in 1824. It is the house in which Mr. Jonathan Woodruff now resides.

By the issue of August 31st we learn that considerable damage to the crops had resulted by the excess of dry weather that had prevailed for two weeks. The foreign news in the issue of the above-named date was nearly two months old, the London and Paris dates being July 13th and 14th, and from some of the United States it was still older, being dated so far back as July 9th.

In the issue of September 14th the editor, who was a bachelor, in one article, in answer to a correspondent, spoke what he said he knew to be the voice of the whole society, that "beauty will command admiration when uncontaminated by affectation," and advised his fair correspondent to "follow the conquest of her eyes by the politeness of her manner, conscious that when once the truant glance of beauty passes on the heart a modest gracefulness and manner and conversation will remain fixed forever." This was written in reply to a young lady who had asked his opinion in regard to her bowing to a young gentleman to whom she had been introduced the night before while she was walking on the street with a lady cousin. The cousin had thought her imprudent, and in her own case thought it not genteel to bow to a gentleman unless she was quite intimate with him, or had been introduced to him three or four times.

The first number of the paper had in all three and one-half columns of advertisements. The longest advertisement was that of John C. Morrison, who occupied a column of space in giving an account of his stock of drugs and dye-stuffs. Among the other advertisers were Vail, Thorp & Co., who dealt in dry-goods, clothing, hats, shoes, china, earthen, hollow, and hardware, tea, sugar, coffee, and liquors. Thomas Laing advertised dry-goods and groceries at his new store opposite the office. Michael Brown, one of his advertisements states, dealt in cider, spirits, hams, cheese, mackerel, pork, flour, beef, etc., and the other informed the public that his store was two doors north of the post-office, and that he kept a stock of dry-goods and groceries. Two establishments advertised boots and shoes; the keepers were in one case Benjamin S. Force & Co., in the other J. H. Ransom. Peter Morgan & Co. advertised their hat-store, Meeker & Clarkson their furniture warehouse, Jacob Parker his lumber-yard, and James Edgar wood for sale. All these parties except the last named were no doubt well-known residents within the thickly-settled portions of the town, for with the exception of the instances above noted none of them mentioned where their places of business were located. Mr. Edgar informed the public that he was near Rahway. One advertiser, John Steen (whether he was a resident of the town or not we cannot say), had his place of business at No. 161 Fulton Street, opposite St. Paul's churchyard, New York. His trade was in looking-glasses. The wants of the traveling public at about the period of which we write were attended to by Smith Freeman, who kept the Bridgetown Hotel, and by Joseph Varry, the proprietor of the Six Roads Tavern, which had previously been kept by Freeman. Communication with the outside world was of course carried on by stage, steamboat, and sail, and the advertising columns of the early numbers of the Advocate inform us that the Bridgetown packet plied twice a week between the dock in Bridgetown and Whitehall Slip in New York; also that the steamboat "Atlanta" was running between Elizabeth Town Point and New York, the fare between the two places being thirty-seven and a half cents, and that the Rahway stage left Rahway at six o'clock every morning for Elizabeth Town Point, and arrived there in season for passengers to take the eight o'clock steamboat for New York, and return at 12.30 noon.

Among the advertisements to be found in some of these early numbers was that of Peter Cohen, who kept a woolen-factory near Barnett's Mills. Its location was within the present bounds of Clark township, and not a vestige of the structure, we are informed, now remains. From his advertisement we learn that Mr. Cohen was engaged in the manufacture of black and blue broadcloths and satinets, and manufactured wool to order for his customers.

Before the paper had reached the close of the first volume the name was again changed, its title now having become the New Jersey Advocate and Middlesex and Essex Advertiser, and Tuesday was the publishing day instead of Saturday. It had six columns to the page, and had more than two pages of advertising. James A. Bennet was the publisher, and the office was at the corner of Front and New Streets, one door above the post-office, now the corner of Main and Lewis Streets, opposite the Melick House. Mr. Edgar, the first proprietor, who lived out some four or five miles on the Plainfield road, is still remembered by some of the older citizens. They describe him as a short, stout man. He has now been dead for something more than fifty years; but he may have been alive when the transfer of the paper was made to Mr. Bennet. The latter conducted the paper for several years, and then sold it to Thomas Allen Green. Green after a time, the precise date we have not the present means of verifying (probably about 1837 or 1838), sold the paper to a Mr. Patton, of Newark, with the distinct understanding on the part of both that the former would not again engage in the newspaper business in Rahway. This fact and others that we state in this connection we have from Mr. Lewis Moore, who now resides on Milton Avenue, and who, at the period of which we speak, was an apprentice in the office of Green, and continued in the same position after the sale of the paper was made to Patton. Green, we are informed, was a very pithy writer of short paragraphs and a man of convivial habits. He no doubt loved to wield the pen, for, notwithstanding the tacit agreement he had made with Patton, he in a few months started a little newspaper in opposition to the Advocate, which he called The Rahway Herald and New Jersey General Advertiser. Patton, however, induced him in a very short time to give up the enterprise, buying the new establishment and merging it with the Advocate.

Subsequently Green became proprietor of the hotel at the corner of Main Street and Milton Avenue, now known as Crowell's Hotel.

During the Clay campaign of 1844 the paper was purchased from Mr. Patton by an association of Whigs, and Mr. Moore was for a time the publisher, and E. Y. Rogers, a member of the legal profession, now deceased, its editor. In a few months the association sold the paper to Mr. E. F. W. Gray, and Mr. Moore started a new opposition paper, but its publication lasted only a few months, Mr. Gray purchasing it from Moore. Gray was still the proprietor of the Advocate in 1850. Its title in full was The New Jersey Advocate, a "Whig journal of politics, agriculture, and general miscellany."

John Jackson and John Pierson started the Rahway Register, an independent sheet, in 1847, and printed the paper in a building on Cherry Street. It was not long after this period when the so-called Native American doctrine broke out in this country, and during a part of the time that that doctrine was rife (we are informed) the paper was printed under the name of the Register and American. It was subsequently merged with the Rahway Times.

About 1857 Gray sold the Advocate to Mr. C. W. Haven. This gentleman ran the paper for about a year, when its publication was suspended, and the material of the paper was purchased by Mr. Josephus Shann and removed to the Democrat office.

Subsequently Mr. Uzal Osborn started a paper called The Rahway Advocate, which was afterwards merged with The Rahway Times, and is still published under the name of The Rahway Advocate.

In 1858 the Rahway Times, a Republican paper, was started by a stock company, and Mr. Walter Graham was made its editor. About four years later Mr. Lincoln appointed Mr. Graham consul to Cape Town, South Africa, and on his ceasing his connection with the paper, about February, 1863, it was merged with the Register. Mr. Uzal Osborn now became the owner and editor of the paper. With the retirement of Mr. Graham from the control of the Register, Mr. Jackson became its sole owner. Under a contract which Mr. Osborn made with him the paper until the following January was still run and known as the Register. Mr. Osborn then consolidated it with the Advocate under the name of The Advocate and Times. In 1879 the paper came into the possession of its present proprietors, Messrs. W. L. Mereshon & Co., and the name Advocate and Times was retained by them until the paper was made a semi-weekly.

The National Democrat was first issued as the Democratic Republican in 1840 by Josephus Shann. Mr. Shann was born at Bloomfield, Essex Co., N. J., in 1819. He served an apprenticeship to the printer's trade in the office of the Somerset Messenger at Somerville, N. J., and in 1838 commenced the publication of The Hunterdon Democrat at Flemington, N. J., remaining there two years, after which he removed to Rahway and started The Democratic Republican, afterwards changed to The Rahway Republican, and subsequently to The National Democrat. Mr. Shann published the paper consecutively for twenty-five years, closing his connection with it in 1865, when Mr. Lewis S. Hyer bought the paper. During this period he was postmaster of Rahway seven years, in the custom-house seven years, and a member of the Legislature for three terms, 1852, 1853, and 1871. For sixteen years since 1865 he has followed the occupation of farming, and for the past two years has been engaged in mercantile business in Rahway, firm of J. Shann & Sons.

Mr. Shann was married in 1842 to Ann, daughter of Stewart Crowell, of Rahway, by whom he has nine children living.

Mr. Lewis S. Hyer purchased the National Democrat, and issued the first number March 30, 1865. He enlarged it from a six to a seven-column paper May 9, 1867, enlarged it again by increasing the length May 4, 1868, and enlarged to eight columns May 6, 1875.

LEWIS S. HYER was born March 1, 1839, at Freehold, Monmouth Co., N. J. His father was Aaron P. Hyer, and his mother's maiden name was Gertrude Cottrell, both natives of the southern portion of Monmouth County (now Ocean County).

During the war of 1812 his father was employed in coasting, and frequently conveyed kegs of specie to different points from Philadelphia. Some time after his marriage he settled near the town of Freehold, in which vicinity he lived the remainder of his life, the most of the time on a farm a mile from the town, where the subject of this sketch was born.

Lewis S. Hyer received a common-school education, but improving his talents he mastered all the usual branches taught in the schools in those days, though after he became large enough he worked on the farm during the farming seasons, and also frequently assisted seventy-six, and his mother in 1878, at the age of nearly eighty. Mr. and Mrs. Hyer have had but one child, Freddie C., who is now seven years old.

When the war broke out in 1861, Maj. Yard went with the three months' troops, and Mr. Hyer had principal charge of his printing business during his absence, which continued much of the time during the whole of the war.

All of Mr. Hyer's printing and publishing experience up to the time of his settling in Rahway was obtained in the above-named office, except about three months in the office of the New York Journal of Commerce, whither he went in 1863. He only worked one night there at general composition, and was promoted to assistant day foreman the next day, which position he held most of the three months, and was given the charge of the advertising department. He returned to his former position on the Monmouth Democrat, where he remained until about the 1st of April, 1865, when he came to Rahway, and made an arrangement with the Hon. Josephus Shann, the then owner of the Rahway National Democrat, to lease the paper for one year, with the privilege of buying it at the end of that time.

That was the time that tried the country newspapers generally, just before the close of the war. Mr. Hyer worked day and night for a long time, and with little assistance in any department, to keep the paper running. The war closing shortly after, however, caused the general prospects to brighten, and when the year rolled around he decided to purchase the paper.

Having (contrary to the habit of too many journeymen printers) saved a little money, he had purchased a lot in an eligible position on Main Street, Freehold, and by borrowing the money and giving a mortgage on the premises he erected a fine residence. Shortly after he was married. When he decided to purchase the paper he was not long in finding a customer for his residence, and sold it for more than enough cash above the mortgage to pay for the newspaper establishment, which was his first real estate speculation.

The National Democrat has continued to prosper under his charge, and at this time the circulation is more than three times what it was when he took charge of it. In 1872 he purchased a piece of property in the centre of the business part of Main Street, and had it fitted up for a printing-office and dwelling, besides stores in the front, where he is still located.

He has always taken a great interest in the welfare of the press of the State, which has been recognized by his brethren, as he has for several years been one of the executive committee of the New Jersey Editorial Association, and also upon committees to look after acts in the State Legislature in reference to the press.

Mr. Hyer, while not being an office-seeker, has been honored by holding some important ones, both elective and appointed. In the spring of 1874 he acceded to the wishes of his Democratic friends and accepted the neighboring farmers, working for them by the day.

The 1st of May, 1855, contrary to the expressed wishes of his parents, who wanted him to remain with them on the farm as they were getting advanced in years, he went to the office of the Monmouth Democrat, of which Maj. James S. Yard was the proprietor and editor (as he still is at this time), and commenced to learn the printing business in the usual way, assuming the position of office-boy, or "printer's devil," in the parlance of the profession. An aptitude for the business and a close observance of everything connected therewith rendered his progress rapid, and long before he reached his majority he was foreman of the office. His employer had great confidence in his taste and skill at job-printing, and particular jobs were always intrusted to him, and seldom failed to give satisfaction.

April 29, 1860, he was married to Miss Jennie Young, daughter of Jacob Young, who was a soldier of the war of 1812, and died only a few months ago, at the age of nearly ninety years; her mother is still living. Mr. Hyer's father died in 1870, at the age of the nomination for the office of mayor, to which he was elected by a large majority over a popular opponent, though the Republicans had elected their candidate for some years previous. The same year he was appointed as clerk of the board of chosen freeholders of Union County, which he held for two years, when the political complexion of the board changed. He positively declined to accept a renomination for mayor in 1875, and also resisted solicitations to become a candidate for different elective offices, until in the fall of 1881, when he accepted the unanimous nomination by the County Democratic Convention for State senator, and was defeated by Senator Vail, who had been renominated by the Republicans, though by a majority greatly reduced from that obtained by Mr. Vail over his competitor three years previous, and in the face of many adverse circumstances in connection with the campaign. He was appointed city clerk in May, 1880, which position he still holds, although unsolicited by him. On March 1, 1882, he was appointed one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas for Union County by Governor Ludlow, which appointment was confirmed by the State Senate on the following day.

He has always been temperate in his habits, and can say, what probably few other men can in these days, that he never was intoxicated in his life, and never used a blasphemous word, in the sense of profanity, to his recollection. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for nearly twenty-five years, and has held the office of trustee of the Second Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway for several years. Being a lover of music he has always taken an interest in that direction, has been connected with church choirs from his early youth, and has been the leader of the choir of the above-named church nearly ever since he came to Rahway, and has a music-store connected with his business.

The Plainfield Gazette was established as a Democratic paper in 1849 by William M. Drake & Sons, and by them sold to — Osborn, who published it a few months, when it came back into the hands of the original proprietors, and the management of it was assumed by William Drake, Jr. He died a few months afterwards, and the office was purchased by Enos W. Runyon, Esq., in October, 1853, and E. W. & J. C. Runyon continued the publication until October, 1856, when J. C. Runyon, the junior partner, withdrew and removed to Illinois, and E. W. Runyon engaged in the practice of law, the paper being sold to Luther Martin, who conducted it till the breaking out of the war in 1861. Luther Martin sold to Charles J. Wilson, enlisted in the army, and was killed at the battle of Gettysburg. After a time Mr. Wilson removed the office to Somerville and changed the name to the Somerset Gazette.

The Central New Jersey Times was established by E. Dean Dow, in 1868. In 1869, Rev. Dr. Stockbridge became its proprietor, and so remained for one year. In July, 1871, he sold his interest to Niles & Runyon, who continued to publish it till April 1, 1875, when Mr. Niles sold his interest to Mr. W. J. Leonard, who, with Mr. J. C. Runyon, has conducted the paper to the present time (1882). It is a political, literary, and home newspaper, Republican in its principles, and is furnished at $2.50 per year in advance. There is a book and job printing establishment in connection with it.

The Constitutionalist is a well-conducted journal, published at Plainfield, N. J. It has been in existence about fourteen years, having been started in 1868. At that time it was twenty-three by thirty-eight inches in size; two years later it was enlarged to twenty-six by forty inches, and in 1876 to thirty by forty-five inches, its present size. It has a good circulation, and maintains a book and job office. The Constitutionalist is published by William L. and Albert L. Force, and is an official paper of the State, county, and city. Democratic in politics.

The Daily and Weekly Bulletin are published by E. O. Chamberlain, at Plainfield, and have a fair circulation. The weekly is a large sheet, full of interesting reading matter, and the daily is devoted to home news and the local interests of the city.

CHAPTER XXI.

UNION COUNTY IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

This county was not represented by any organized body of troops in the first militia sent out for three months' service. The quota of New Jersey under that call was so speedily filled that thousands who were anxious to enter the service could not be received, and were obliged to wait until another call was issued for additional men to serve for three years or during the war. The magnitude of the Rebellion had by this time begun to reveal itself, and it was perceived that seventy-five thousand raw militia in a campaign of three months was a very inadequate force to cope with the formidable insurrection which had been organized against the life of the nation. Then it was that both the general and State governments began to contemplate the necessity for organizing war on a more extended scale. The second call for troops was for three hundred thousand men, and was issued by the President of the United States May 3, 1861. On the 17th of May the Governor of New Jersey received a requisition from the War Department for three regiments of infantry (volunteers) to serve three years or during the war, and also a general order detailing the plan of organization. A sufficient number of companies having already offered their services, Governor Olden informed the Secretary of War the following day (May 18th) that the three regiments called for were ready for muster. These organizations were designated respectively the First, Second, and Third Regiments. Under the provision of an act of Congress approved July 22, 1861, and an official letter from the President dated July 24, 1861, authority was issued for raising five additional regiments in the State. Under this call the Fourth Regiment and Battery A were organized and assigned with the three regiments already raised and in the field. These organizations constituted and were generally known as the First Brigade, New Jersey Volunteers.

In the First, Second, and Third Regiments of this brigade Union County had three companies, viz.: Companies A of the First and Second, respectively, and Company K of the Third Regiment, officered as follows: Company A, First Regiment, Captain, David Hatfield; First Lieutenant, Thomas T. Tillou; Second Lieutenant, Luther Martin. Company A, Second Regiment, Captain, James Wilson; First Lieutenant, Bradbury C. Chetwood; Second Lieutenant, William J. Cree. Company K, Third Regiment, Captain, John H. Whelan; First Lieutenant, John B. Lutz; Second Lieutenant, David Fairly.¹

The field- and staff-officers of the First Regiment were: Colonel, William K. Montgomery; Lieutenant-Colonel, Robert McAllister; Major, David Hatfield; Adjutant, William Henry, Jr.; Quartermaster, Samuel Read; Surgeon, Edward F. Taylor; Assistant Surgeon, Charles C. Gordon; Chaplain, Robert B. Yard. Of the Second Regiment the colonel was George W. McLean; Lieutenant-Colonel, Isaac M. Tucker; Major, Samuel L. Buck; Adjutant, Joseph W. Plume; Quartermaster, William E. Sturges; Surgeon, Gabriel Grant; Assistant Surgeon, Lewis W. Oakley; Chaplain, Robert R. Proudfit. Third Regiment, Colonel, George W. Taylor; Lieutenant-Colonel, Henry W. Brown; Major, Mark W. Callett; Adjutant, Robert T. Dunham; Quartermaster, Francis Sayre; Surgeon, Lorenzo Cox; Assistant Surgeon, Edward L. Welling; Chaplain, George R. Darrow.

Company A of the First Regiment (from Elizabeth) was the first company mustered into the United States service under the first call for volunteers to serve three years or during the war. It was mustered in May 21, 1861, at Camp Olden, near Trenton, where the various other companies encamped till the completion of the organization. The material of these regiments was excellent, being composed largely of men who had been identified with some of the best militia organizations of the State.

The First, Second, and Third Regiments left the State June 28, 1861, and immediately on their arrival in Virginia entered upon the active duties of the soldier. They formed part of Gen. Runyon's division of Reserves in the battle of Bull Run, and aided materially in covering the retreat of our forces on that fatal day. Immediately after the battle the First and Second Regiments went into camp near Alexandria, and were soon joined by the other regiments of the brigade.

On the 25th of July, Maj. Philip Kearney, of New Jersey, who had greatly distinguished himself in the Mexican war, was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, and early in August was assigned to the command of the New Jersey troops. These troops were attached to Franklin's division, and the brigade headquarters were established at Fairfax Seminary, three miles distant from Alexandria. The experience of the brigade during the fall and winter months was marked by but few important incidents, the time being mainly occupied in drill and the ordinary camp duties. Gen. Kearney devoted himself to raising his command to the highest possible state of efficiency. His popularity with the command became greater probably than that of any other general officer in the service. While he was wary and cautious, he was also bold and resolute, and chafed exceedingly under the policy of inaction which characterized the War Department at this period. At length an opportunity came for him to show the government an example of an opposite kind. On the 7th of March, 1862, his brigade was ordered to Burke's Station, on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, for the purpose of guarding a party of laborers, and reaching there on the following day, he made an extended reconnaissance of the country for several miles around. Subsequently he was notified by some negroes that the enemy was preparing to leave Manassas. He was not slow to act upon this hint. Apprising Gen. Franklin of the information he had received, but without awaiting orders, he at once pushed on with his troops, throwing out skirmishers over a wide extent of country, and driving steadily before him the scattered pickets of the enemy. On the 9th the Second and Third Regiments, with a squadron of the Lincoln Cavalry, occupied Sangster's Station, a point on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, about five miles from Bull Run and nine from Manassas Junction, the Fourth Regiment acting as a support to the advance. Here they surprised a detachment of rebel cavalry, killing three and capturing a lieutenant and eleven men, and losing one officer of the cavalry, killed at the first fire. The First Regiment had meanwhile advanced to Fairfax Court-House, whence, on the morning of the 10th, a detachment under Maj. Hatfield and Capt. Vansickle was sent forward to Centreville, which place was entered about noon, the remainder of the regiment coming up shortly after under Lieut.-Col. McAllister. Thus this regiment, which was the last to leave Centreville at the first Bull Run, had the honor of being the first to occupy the place in the second advance.² On the same day the remainder of the brigade pushed cautiously forward, reached, and at ten o'clock in the morning entered the abandoned works at Manassas Junction, eight companies of the Third being the first to take possession and hoist the regimental flag. The withdrawal of the enemy at this point had evidently been precipitated, and an immense amount of hospital and commissary stores was found, together with eighty baggage-wagons, several locomotives, four or five cars, two hundred tents, and other property of value. Among the trophies also were seven flags, one of white silk, with the motto, "Carolínians in the Field: Traitors Beware," and another bordered with heavy silver fringe, with the inscription, "State Rights: Sic semper tyrannis."

Thus at all points the advance had been successful. It had demonstrated the feasibility of a forward movement, and discovered to the country the indefensibility of the policy of "masterly inactivity."

Early in April the brigade was attached to the First Division of the First Army Corps, and on the 7th of that month proceeded to Bristow Station, and thence to Catlett's Station, two miles from Warrenton Junction. The object of this movement was to engage the attention of the enemy while Gen. McClellan transferred the main body of the army by transports to the Peninsula. Having discharged this duty the brigade joined the main army at the mouth of the York River on the 17th. At this time Gen. Kearney, having been assigned to the command of the Third Division, Third Army Corps, Col. Taylor, of the Third Regiment, took charge of the brigade, Yorktown having been evacuated.

Franklin's division was sent forward on the 5th of May, and disembarking at West Point, on the York River, pickets were immediately thrown out into the woods in front to guard against a surprise by the rebel forces in that vicinity. During the night skirmishing was briskly carried on between the opposing pickets, and at daylight the whole division was put under arms. Soon after the enemy advanced and a sharp engagement ensued, but the New Jersey Brigade being held in reserve suffered no loss. Later in the evening, however, the First Regiment, led by Lieut.-Col. McAllister, while making a charge in the woods had four men slightly wounded. In the charge the First Regiment took and held a position which two New York regiments had been unable to maintain. A correspondent of the New York Times said of this charge, "The line was as firm as a division in its columns at a review. Not a man flinched. Lieut.-Col. McAllister, when the enemy broke, bravely pursued them some distance, when he received orders to return and hold the fence which ran across the forest. This firm and determined movement decided the result. The rebels made good their retreat."

This engagement or battle of West Point was fought on the 7th of May, 1862. On the 15th Franklin's entire division effected a junction with McClellan's army near the White House, whence it advanced to the Chickahominy, and remained in camp about a fortnight. In the mean time the fighting about Richmond had commenced, and the first collision on the Chickahominy had occurred on the 24th of May. This was followed by a battle near Hanover Court-House, in which the Fifth Corps repulsed the rebels with heavy loss. On the 6th of June Franklin's division was ordered forward to Mechanicsville, on the extreme right of our lines, where McClellan was holding his position awaiting reinforcements. Here the division remained several days. On the 18th the corps took possession at Fair Oaks, near the battlefield of May 31st and June 1st, where the First Regiment on the night of May 21st was detailed to guard a party of workmen. Little of interest occurred in the history of our regiments till the battle of Gaines' Farm, which occurred on the 27th of June. On the 26th, "Stonewall" Jackson having engaged our forces at Mechanicsville, was repulsed, but did not abandon the field. The battle was savagely renewed on the following morning, the rebels pursuing our troops to Gaines' Mill, whither they had been ordered to withdraw by Gen. McClellan. Here the onslaught was terrific, the rebels charging again and again upon our lines, and at length compelling them to give way. Up to this time the New Jersey Brigade had not participated in the engagement. But on the afternoon of the 27th, leaving its intrenched camp on the Chickahominy, it crossed the river and moved down to Woodbury's Bridge, where it found Gen. Fitz John Porter and McCall sorely pressed. What followed can be better given in the language of Gen. Taylor's official report of this battle, which is as follows:

"My command, by order, left our intrenched camp on the right bank of the Chickahominy on Friday afternoon, the 27th of June, and crossed the said stream by the Woodbury bridge.

"The battle begun the day previous had been renewed near Gaines' Farm, where we arrived about four o'clock P. M. I immediately formed my brigade in two lines, the Third and Fourth Regiments in front, and the First and Second Regiments in the second line.

"My line was securely formed when the Third Regiment under the command of Lieut.-Col. Brown was ordered to advance forward into the woods, where a fierce combat was raging.

"Col. Brown immediately formed his regiment in line of battle, led it into the woods, and began a rapid fire upon the enemy. As this was the first of my regiments engaged, I will complete my report of it by saying that they continued the fight in the woods until the close of the action. They were all this time under a galling fire, often a cross-fire, but maintained their ground until near sunset, when the whole line fell back. They had at this time expended (a large majority of the men) their last cartridge, sixty rounds to the man. It is but justice to say that this regiment bore itself most heroically throughout the entire action. Their conduct was all that could be desired. With their comrades falling around, they stood up like a wall of iron, losing over one-third of their number, and gave not an inch of ground until their ammunition was expended and the retrograde movement became general; they were under this fire one hour and a half.

"The First Regiment entered the woods about half an hour after the Third and remained until the close of the action. Col. Torbert being unwell, the regiment was led by Lieut.-Col. McAllister, and well sustained by his presence and courage. I shall, however, say that Col. Torbert, though suffering from low fever, followed us to the field and was present.

"I take great pleasure in saying, for both these regiments fought under my own eye, that the First Regiment showed the same indomitable courage as the Third Regiment, exposing themselves to the leaden hail of an often unseen foe, advancing with the Third Regiment, and stood steadily under a most galling fire until the close of the action. Their loss was: enlisted men killed, twenty; wounded, eighty; missing, fifty-seven. The loss of commissioned officers was one killed, four wounded, and one missing, making a total of one hundred and sixty-three.

"I have now to speak of the Second and Fourth Regiments, the first of which, under Col. Tucker, numbered only four companies, the other six being on duty in the field-work at Camp Lincoln, and left behind under Lieut.-Col. Buck. While absent to the front these four companies, by order of Gen. Porter, without any knowledge, were sent into the woods, suffering a most galling fire. Their loss was: enlisted men killed, twelve; wounded, forty-five; missing, forty; making a total of ninety-seven enlisted men. I also regret to record the death of Col. I. M. Tucker, and probably Maj. Ryerson, both of whom were left upon the field; also Capt. Danforth, mortally wounded, and Lieuts. Blewitt, Root, and Bogert, severely wounded, and Lieut. Cullan, missing. They, however, sustained themselves most gallantly, and proved their courage against superior numbers. The fate of the Fourth Regiment, one of the most efficient regiments as regards officers and men, was most painful.

"At the moment when victory seemed wavering in the balance an aide of Gen. McClellan took them from my command and ordered them into the woods. All the account I can give of them is that but one officer (wounded) and eighty-two men have joined my command; all the rest, if living, are believed to be prisoners of war.

"I learn from those who have come in that up to the time the regiment was surrounded they had received from and returned the enemy a most galling fire. I annex a report of the casualties of the day, showing the total loss of my brigade.

"In conclusion, I would say that, so far as I am at present informed, my officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, nobly performed their duties, and it might therefore be invidious to particularize. Still, in justice to the gallant dead, who have devoted their lives to their country, I must record the names of Captain Brewster, of the First Regiment, and Captain Buckley, of the Third; also Second Lieutenant Howsall, of the Third, all officers of distinguished merit. These officers fought under my eye. As regards the conduct of the Second and Fourth Regiment officers, I am told that it was all that could be desired, but these regiments having been taken from me I did not see them during the action.

"It is due to my staff-officers to say that they carried out my orders intelligently and promptly, and did not hesitate, and were often exposed to the hottest fire of the day."

Company A of the Second Regiment, from this county, was not engaged in the action, being one of the six companies left behind and engaged on the work at Fort Lincoln. Col. Tucker brought with him into the action Companies D, H, I, and K. The absence of Company A at the time of the action will account for the lack of casualties in the record of the company at this period, which we give at the close of these regimental sketches.

It will be impossible, owing to the lack of space, to give anything like a detailed history of all the movements of these companies, including the regiments and brigade to which they belonged. Some idea of the extent of the service which they rendered from the beginning to the close of the war may be gained from a list of the battles in which they were engaged.

These companies, with their regiments and brigade, participated in the following engagements: Bull Run, Va., July 21, 1861; Benson's Tavern, Va., Oct. 15, 1861; West Point, Va., May 7, 1862; Gaines' Farm, Va., June 27, 1862; Charles City Cross-Roads, Va., June 30, 1862; Malvern Hill, Va., July 1, 1862; Manassas, Va., Aug. 27, 1862; Chantilly, Va., Sept. 1, 1862; Crampton Pass, Md., Sept. 14, 1862; Antietam, Md., Sept. 17, 1862; Fredericksburg, Va.,

Dec. 13, 14, 1862; Fredericksburg, Va., May 3, 1863; Salem Heights, Va., May 3, 4, 1863; Gettysburg, Pa., July 2, 3, 1863; Fairfield, Pa., July 5, 1863; Williamsport, Md., July 6, 1863; Funktown, Md., July 12, 1863; Rappahannock Station, Va., Oct. 12, 1863; Rappahannock Station, Va., Nov. 7, 1863; Mine Run, Va., Nov. 30, 1863; Wilderness, Va., May 5 to 7, 1864; Spottsylvania, Va., May 8 to 10, 1864; Spottsylvania Court-house, May 12 to 16, 1864; North and South Anna River, Va., May 24, 1864; Hanover Court-House, Va., May 29, 1864; Tolopotomy Creek, Va., May 30, 31, 1864; Cold Harbor, Va., June 1 to 3, 1864; before Petersburg, Va. (Weldon Railroad), June 23, 1864; Snicker's Gap, Va., July 18, 1864; Strasburg, Va., Aug. 15, 1864; Winchester, Va., Aug. 17, 1864; Charlestown, Va., Aug. 21, 1864; Opequan, Va., Sept. 19, 1864; Fisher's Hill, Va., Sept. 21, 22, 1864; New Market, Va., Sept. 24, 1864; Mount Jackson, Va., Sept. 25, 1864; Cedar Creek and Middle-town, Va., Oct. 19, 1864; Hatcher's Run, Va., Feb. 5, 1865; Fort Steedman, Va., March 25, 1865; capture of Petersburg, Va., April 2, 1865; Sailor's Creek, Va., April 6, 1865; Farmville, Va., April 7, 1865; Lee's surrender (Appomattox, Va.), April 9, 1865.

In all these engagements the regiments and companies of the brigade made for themselves an honorable record. After the battle of Crampton's Pass, Sept. 15, 1862, Col. Torbert, commanding, promulgated the following general order:

"SOLDIERS OF THE FIRST NEW JERSEY BRIGADE.—The 14th day of September, 1862, is one long to be remembered, for on that day you dashingly met and drove the enemy at every point. Your advance in the line of battle under a galling artillery fire and final bayonet charge was a feat seldom if ever surpassed. The heights you took show plainly what determined and disciplined soldiers can do.

"You have sustained the reputation of your State, and done great credit to your officers and yourselves. While we lament the death of our brave comrades who have fallen so gloriously, we can only commit their souls to God and their sorrowing friends to His sure protection. May you go from victory to victory in the hope and wish of the colonel commanding the brigade."

From Col. Torbert's official report of this brilliant affair, dated September 16th, we extract the following:

"It being decided to attack the enemy posted in the Pass, the division was ordered to advance in six lines, two regiments front, the First Brigade in the rear. About three o'clock I marched my brigade in two lines by the right flank, under cover till we gained the open ground, when the advance was made in line of battle as follows: First line, First and Second Regiments. They advanced about half a mile with great regularity through clover- and corn-fields, intersected by high wood and stone fences, being exposed the greater part of the time to the enemy's artillery fire. Arriving within supporting distance of Colonel Bartlett's brigade, which was engaging the enemy, I halted. Soon after I ordered the Second Regiment forward to relieve one of Bartlett's regiments which was out of ammunition, which they did with promptness. The enemy was posted behind a stone wall at the base of the mountain, with a wood just behind them. At this time the distance between the contending parties was between three and four hundred yards, an open field intervening. Thinking the distance too great, Gen. Newton ordered me to charge forward to the woods. Accordingly I ordered forward my second line, Third and Fourth Regiments, to charge across the open field into the woods. The first line was ordered to cease firing. A cheer, and the men went forward at double-quick to a most gallant manner, leaping the fence on the way behind which our men had been fighting. When they had advanced about a hundred and fifty yards, I ordered the second line, First and Second Regiments, to charge in the same manner as the first, which they did most handsomely. The enemy, although holding a very strong position, and having the advantage of artillery, could not stand these charges, so broke and fled up the mountain-side in great disorder, closely pursued by our men, who drove them through the Pass and some distance in the valley on the other side, when night put an end to the pursuit.

"Too much cannot be said in praise of the bravery and gallantry of both officers and men; they certainly did credit to themselves and the State they represent. . . . The loss to the brigade has been as follows: One officer killed and nine wounded, thirty-nine non-commissioned officers and privates killed, and one hundred and twenty-five wounded; total, one hundred and seventy-four."

At the first battle of Fredericksburg the brigade contained in addition to the four regiments, or what remained of them, the Fifteenth and Twenty-third New Jersey Infantry. In this action it was conspicuous for gallantry, the new regiments seeming to have caught the spirit of the old ones. The brigade lost in killed, wounded, and missing one hundred and twenty-two men. At Chancellorsville, Col. Brown, who commanded the brigade during the early part of the engagement, was severely wounded; Col. Cattell, of the First Regiment, was killed in the thickest of the fight; and Col. Buck, of the Second Regiment, sustained an injury from the fall of his horse. The command therefore devolved temporarily upon Col. Penrose, of the Fifteenth New Jersey. In a congratulatory order, published on the 12th of May, 1863, Col. Buck said,—

"The sad casualty to the brave Col. Brown, of the Third Regiment, having placed the brigade under my command, I cannot in justice to you or myself refrain from expressing my heartfelt thanks for the prompt and energetic manner in which you obeyed my commands. . . . You have earned for yourselves imperishable fame, and nobly redeemed the pledge you so recently made on the receipt of your new colors, which have been gallantly borne and bravely defended, as the life-blood of the brave Col. Cattell and many others sadly testify."

The following incident of the brigade is related in connection with the battle of Winchester:

"Our brigade of nine hundred men and one regiment of cavalry, the Third New Jersey, sustained the shock of an overwhelming force, estimated at five thousand. The enemy attacked with three lines of battle. Our men were deployed as skirmishers, fifteen feet apart. They would lie down behind a wall, waiting the enemy's approach, and fire to check him as much as possible. Then, at the order to retire, they would run to the next place of shelter, whether stone wall, hill, or tree, and wait the rebel approach again, give them some deadly volleys, and again retire. This mode of fighting was kept up till Winchester was reached and passed. While passing through the town many of our men were shot down by the citizens, who fired from the windows of the houses. In the darkness it was impossible always to tell friend from foe. Once Col. Campbell found himself in the midst of a number of men pressing rapidly forward, or, as he supposed, hurrying away to the rear. He was on the point of halting them and calling them to rally at a point in a little graveyard when an outcry from one of them proved that they were rebels. Turning an angle in the wall, where he could be shielded from their fire, he left them in haste. A soldier came among our men, and they demanded, 'Who are you?' to which he answered, 'I belong to Breckenridge's division.' They said, 'Lay down your arms,' but the fellow cried, 'I am a rebel!' 'Very well,' said our boys, 'but we are Yanks'; and through all the confusion of the night some held fast to him, and in the morning delivered him up a prisoner of war."¹

At the surrender of Lee, on the memorable 9th of April, 1865, the brigade was not far from Appomattox Court-House. The news was received with demonstrations of the wildest enthusiasm. The fighting was ended, the Union cause victorious, and now all looked for a speedy discharge. A long and weary march, however, was before the brigade, it being ordered to Danville instead of to Washington.

On the 24th of May it marched through Richmond on its way homeward, going into camp at Georgetown on the 2d of June. It was soon mustered out, and returned to Trenton, N. J.

Mr. Foster, in his "New Jersey and the Rebellion," thus closes his elaborate history of the brigade:

"On a score of fields it had exhibited the rarest heroism. In discipline, in sturdy, faultless courage, in unwavering and sublime devotion, it justified, down to the latest field, the high expectations of that knightly soldier who made it what it was. Tried in many a fierce and pitiless fire, it had never flinched. Exposed sometimes to peculiar hardships, thinned by disease, weakened by heavy loss, it never for an hour lost its faith in the cause. The hospital devoured and the trench swallowed up many of its bravest and best, but the First Brigade, even when but a remnant of its strength remained, was still undaunted. No danger appalled, no privation dismayed, no loss disheartened the veterans, who with a lofty pride fought and died for freedom's sake. When at last, with tattered standards and lean ranks, it marched from the field where it had helped to achieve an honorable peace, it was welcomed home with right royal greeting, the people hailing it with glad acclaim, and with it rejoicing that the sound of war had ceased from the land. To-day scattered in all the walks of life, those of its members who yet survive perform the old duties and bear the old burdens familiar before they were marched afield; but their proudest boast is that once they fought with Kearney and the grand old Army of the Potomac for the flag which to him and to them was dearer than all things else."

CHAPTER XXII.

UNION COUNTY IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Ninth Regiment.—The Ninth Regiment contained two companies, G and K, from Union County. They were officered as follows: Company G, Captain, John P. Ritter; First Lieutenant, William Zimmerman; Second Lieutenant, William Benton. Company K, Captain, Elias J. Drake; First Lieutenant, W. B. S. Boudinot; Second Lieutenant, Jonathan Townley, Jr. Joseph W. Allen was colonel of the regiment; C. A. Heckman, major; Francis S. Weller, surgeon; Louis Braun, assistant surgeon; Abram Zabriskie, adjutant; Samuel Keyes, quartermaster; Thomas Drumm, chaplain.

The regiment was raised under an authorization from the War Department to recruit a regiment of riflemen in the State of New Jersey. Its recruitment was begun in September, 1861, and the first muster was made at Camp Olden, Trenton, on the 5th of October. The regiment was soon filled to the maximum, and remained at camp, engaged in continuous drill, until the 4th of December, when it proceeded to Washington, D. C., having upon its rolls an aggregate of one thousand one hundred and forty-two men. It was armed with Springfield rifles, and more fully and splendidly equipped than any regiment which up to that time had left the State.

Without going too much into particulars, it may be said that the regiment on its arrival in Washington went into camp on the Bladensburg turnpike, where it remained until Jan. 4, 1862, when it proceeded by rail to Annapolis, where a large portion of the troops composing Burnside's expedition to North Carolina had already assembled. Here the regiment was assigned to the brigade of Gen. Jesse L. Reno, and embarked on the 10th for Fortress Monroe, whence, on the 12th, sail was made towards the point of destination at Hatteras Inlet. Soon after arriving off the inlet a violent storm arose, the wind blowing fiercely on shore and imperiling the lives of all on board, which would probably have been lost but for the enterprise and daring of a member of the regiment from this county, Corp. Samuel J. Dilkes, of Company K. The historian of the regiment gives the following account of the disaster:

"Extra anchors were cast, but even this precaution did not avail to save several vessels of the fleet, which were drifted ashore and became total wrecks. The steamer 'City of New York,' laden with ammunition, foundered at the mouth of the inlet, while the 'Connecticut' was sunk inside the bar. The steamer 'Pocahontas,' laden with horses, on the passage down was driven ashore in the gale, its engines having become unmanageable, and but for the gallantry of Corp. Samuel J. Dilkes, of Company K, Ninth Regiment, the lives of all on board might have been lost. Dilkes bravely swimming ashore with a rope, fastened it securely by means of a stake driven firmly into the sand, and so enabled the crew to reach the land in safety. The cook, an aged colored woman, being unable in this way to escape, Dilkes, with a heroism which filled all beholders with admiration, returned to the ship, now rapidly going to pieces, and bidding the frightened woman to his person leaped into the sea, and by almost superhuman exertions succeeded in safely reaching the shore, where he was hailed by his comrades with deserved and the utmost enthusiasm.

"On the following day, the 15th, the sea having somewhat calmed, Col. Allen, Lieut.-Col. Heckman, Surg. Weller, Adj. Zabriskie, and Quartermaster Keyes proceeded in the gig of the captain of the ship 'Ann E. Thompson' to the shore, for the purpose of reporting to Gen. Burnside. The gig was manned by a picked crew, in charge of the captain, and contained twelve persons in all. Having concluded their interview with the general-in-chief, the party returned to their boat, which was rowed swiftly and safely towards the ship until the breakers just outside the inlet were reached, when suddenly a heavy sea, or water-spout, burst over the bow, sweeping to the stern, unslipping the oars, and occasioning the greatest consternation among the passengers. Before the boat could be righted a second and stronger wave struck it from beneath, hurling it some distance in the air and precipitating all its occupants into the sea. The situation was fearful indeed, and the struggle with the seething waters desperate in the last degree. With great difficulty the boat was reached by several of the party and efforts made to right it; but this was soon found to be impossible. . . . Lieut.-Col. Heckman and Adj. Zabriskie, being expert swimmers, finding that Col. Allen and Surgeon Weller were in greater danger than others, made several heroic attempts to save their lives, but all were unsuccessful, these officers, bravely struggling to the last, going down into the watery depths. By this time the capsized boat was drifting rapidly seaward, but the lieutenant-colonel and adjutant finally succeeded in raising an oar, having fastened thereon a sailor's shirt, which signal being shortly afterwards discovered the alarm was given, and the steamer 'Patuxent' at once hastened to give assistance. So overcome were the survivors by their exertions that upon reaching the decks of the steamer some of them sank into insensibility, Lieut.-Col. Heckman remaining in a state of prostration for several days. The bodies of Col. Allen, Dr. Weller, and the second mate, who was also drowned, were recovered during the day, and every effort made to resuscitate them, but entirely without avail."

Upon the sad and untimely death of Col. Allen, Lieut.-Col. Heckman took command of the regiment, and remained in command until Jan. 16, 1864, when he was appointed to the command of the district of Suffolk, Va. Adj. Zabriskie then became colonel, and held the command until he fell mortally wounded at Drury's Bluff, May 16, 1864. Lieut.-Col. James Stewart, Jr., then commanded the regiment till the close of the war.

The operations of the regiment were confined to the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. On the 18th of November, 1862, in compliance with an order from the War Department, the regiment was reduced from twelve to ten companies, A and L being disbanded, and the enlisted men transferred to other companies of the regiment. Company M was designated Company A. In January, 1864, a majority of the regiment re-enlisted in the field, and being entitled to a veteran furlough, visited their homes in New Jersey, returning again to the service on the 15th of March. Those who did not re-enlist, and whose terms of service had expired, were mustered out at Trenton, Dec. 7, 1864. The regiment maintained its organization till the close of the war, being strengthened from time to time during 1863, '64, and '65 by recruits from the draft rendezvous at Trenton. It participated in the following engagements:

Roanoke Island, N. C., Feb. 8, 1862; Newberne, N. C., March 14, 1862; Fort Macon, N. C., April 25, 1862; Young's Cross-Roads, N. C., July 27, 1862; Rowell's Mills, N. C., Nov. 2, 1862; Deep Creek, N. C., Dec. 12, 1862; Southwest Creek, N. C., Dec. 13, 1862; before Kinston, N. C., Dec. 13, 1862; Kinston, N. C., Dec. 14, 1862; Whitehall, N. C., Dec. 16, 1862; Goldsboro', N. C., Dec. 17, 1862; Comfort Bridge, N. C., July 6, 1863; near Winton, N. C., July 26, 1863; Deep Creek, Va., Feb. 7, 1864; Deep Creek, Va., March 1, 1864; Cherry Grove, Va., April 14, 1864; Port Whitehall, Va., May 6 and 7, 1864; Procter's, Va., May 8, 1864; Swift Creek, Va., May 9 and 10, 1864; Drury's Bluff, Va., May 12 to 16, 1864; Cold Harbor, Va., June 3 to 12, 1864; Free Bridge, Va., June 16, 1864; before Petersburg, Va., June 20 to Aug. 24, 1864; Gardner's Bridge, N. C., Dec. 9, 1864; Foster's Bridge, N. C., Dec. 10, 1864; Butler's Bridge, N. C., Dec. 11, 1864; Southwest Creek, N. C., March 7, 1865; Wise's Fork, N. C., March 8, 9, and 10, 1865; Goldsborough, N. C., March 21, 1865.

The Ninth Regiment received great credit for their gallant and successful operations in a swamp during the action at Roanoke Island, which is believed to have secured the great success of the day by enabling our army to operate successfully upon the enemy's flank. Foster speaks of their conduct as being "from first to last in the highest degree courageous." Gen. Burnside promulgated an order on the 10th of February that the Ninth Regiment should have the words "Roanoke Island, February 8, 1862," emblazoned on their banners in compliment for their gallantry on that day. The only ordinance which could be brought to bear upon the enemy, owing to the deep morass which our troops traversed and the almost impenetrable thickets, was a small rifled cannon, manned altogether by men detailed from the Ninth. Besides, the gunboat which did most execution upon the fort had her guns manned by Jerseymen detailed from the Ninth. "On the 10th," says the Newark Daily Advertiser, "this detail asked to be sent back to their regiment, but the commodore replied that 'the Jersey Blues' had shown themselves too good managers of the big guns to allow him to part with them; that they were true Blues, and no mistake."

One Jerseyman, who had been wounded by a bullet through the head, said it was not much, and walked alone back to the hospital tent, as he said, "to get something to keep the blood out of his eyes, when he would come back to his company." The poor fellow fell just as he got to the tent.

Testimony as to the gallantry of this regiment in different engagements might be multiplied to almost any extent. The New York Tribune, speaking of the battle of Newberne, says,—

"In the capture of Newberne the Ninth New Jersey Regiment sustained the honor of their State with characteristic gallantry. Though their position in that brilliant engagement was one of great exposure, they bore themselves through the conflict like veterans, suffering more severely than any other regiment on the field. Out of a total loss of three hundred and sixty-four killed and wounded they lost sixty-two, or one-sixth of the whole, although twelve regiments were in the battle. Bravo for the Jersey Blues!"

Private Thomas Macquaid, of Elizabeth, was struck by a spent ball on the shoulder, and tumbled down; but when being carried back he suddenly broke away and said, "Let me take off my coat and see that first," and finding the shoulder much swollen he went on a few steps, and concluded to "take another look," when he said he guessed he'd take a few more shots, came back, and fought bravely till the victory was won. Sergt. Joseph Wright was shot through the shoulder, and sat down in his place a moment, and then slowly turned to his commander, saying, very coolly, almost dryly, "Captain, I am wounded." That officer, finding his company pretty well cut up, and not wishing to send back more men with the wounded than was absolutely necessary, asked if he was much hurt. He didn't know, he said, but thought he would let the surgeon see, and had gone some distance, when he came back and requested of the captain that he might take his rifle with him.

On the 24th of December, 1862, the regiment was made the recipient of a beautiful stand of colors, costing seven hundred dollars, presented by the Legislature of New Jersey, accompanied by the following resolutions passed by that body:

"Resolved, That the Ninth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers, by their patient endurance under privation and fatigue, and by their courage at the ever-to-be-remembered battles of Roanoke and Newberne (a courage evinced by the havoc made in their own unwavering columns better than by the reports of partial journals), have sustained the high reputation which since the days of the Revolution has belonged to the soldiers of New Jersey, and as evidence of our appreciation of that arm of every manly virtue, 'patriotic devotion to country,' the Governor of the State is requested to have prepared and forwarded to said regiment a standard, on which shall be inscribed these words: 'Presented by New Jersey to her Ninth Regiment in remembrance of Roanoke and Newberne.'

"Resolved, That Col. Charles A. Heckman, who so gallantly led his well-ordered men to the conflict, is requested, at the proper time, to report to the clerk of the House of Assembly the names of those who fell, killed or mortally wounded, on either of the said battle-fields; and that the clerk of the House is, by virtue of this resolution, ordered to enter their names, with the place where they fell, on the minutes of the Assembly of New Jersey, as men who have fallen in defense of the best government of the world.

"Resolved, That New Jersey looks with pride upon her soldiers in the field, without exception or distinction, and is prepared to honor them; and while extending congratulations that the occasion has not yet occurred when they have been put to flight by an enemy, entertains entire confidence that such occasion will never be recognized by them.

"Resolved, That New Jersey highly appreciates the disinterested fidelity of Brig.-Gen. Philip Kearney in declining proffered promotion rather than separate himself from the command of Jerseymen to him intrusted.

"Resolved, That with the families, relatives, and friends of those members of the Ninth Regiment who, on the 14th of March, met death in that form courted by the true soldier, on the battle-field with their faces to the foe, we most deeply sympathize and sincerely condole.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the generals and colonels commanding the New Jersey troops."

We regret that we have not space for fuller and more consecutive details of the operations of this regiment. Those who desire a more complete history will find it in Foster's excellent work, "New Jersey and the Rebellion," from which much of our information relating to this and other regiments has been drawn. New Jersey will ever be proud of the achievements of her Ninth Regiment. "Its story," says Mr. Foster, "is the story of the war; its eulogy its own great deeds. During its term of service it participated in forty-two battles and engagements, and traveled by rail and on foot a distance of seven thousand six hundred and forty-two miles, making while in North Carolina some of the most remarkable marches on record. Entering the service with one thousand one hundred and forty-two men, and at various times strengthened by recruits, the mean strength of the regiment when mustered out was only six hundred men. Eight officers offered their lives a sacrifice on the nation's altar, while twenty-three received wounds in battle, most of them of a serious nature. Sixty-one enlisted men were killed in battle, and four hundred wounded. Forty-three men died from wounds, and one hundred from disease. The total loss of the regiment from all causes was sixteen hundred and forty-six men. No fact could more strikingly exhibit the consuming nature of the campaigns in which the regiment participated than this, clearly authenticated by official reports. The entire number of men and officers taken prisoners was about one hundred and thirty, forty-seven of this number dying while in the hands of the enemy."

CAPT. JONATHAN TOWNLEY, the subject of this biographical sketch, is the grandson of Capt. Jonathan Townley, who enjoyed the distinction of having been a captain at an early period in the State militia. Among his children was John M., born in 1801, and married to Miss Eveline Cooper. The birth of their son Jonathan occurred Dec. 14, 1833, in the township of Union, where his early life was spent in studies preliminary to entering Princeton College, where his graduation took place in 1858. He found congenial employment in the labors of an instructor, and continued them until the year 1861, which developed the civil war. Being imbued with the spirit of patriotism he enlisted in Company K, Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, and began his military career as second lieutenant. He was, March 9, 1862, promoted to a first lieutenantcy, and March 4, 1864, received his commission as captain. He was wounded at Newberne, N. C., on the 14th of March, 1862, and again before Richmond, May 14, 1864.

Capt. Townley participated during the year 1862 in the battles of Roanoke Island, Newberne, Fort Macon, Young's Cross-Roads, Rowell's Mills, Deep Creek, Southwest Creek, Kinston, Whitehall, and Goldsborough Bridge. In 1863 he was in engagements at Comfort's Bridge, near Winton, and in 1864 at Deep Creek, Port Walthall, Swift Creek, Drury's Bluff, and was before Petersburg from June 20th until August 24th of that year. His discharge was obtained Feb. 4, 1865, when he retired again to civil life, and has since devoted himself to agricultural employments.

Capt. Townley is in his political preferences a Republican, the platform and principles of the party having been espoused by him, not from motives of policy, but from earnest conviction.

He at all times lends a willing hand to all projects having for their aim the advancement of both education and morality, and may justly be regarded as one of the most useful citizens of the township of Union.

Eleventh Regiment.—This county furnished two companies of men in the Eleventh Regiment, viz., Companies B and D, with the following officers: Company B, Capt. William H. Meeker; First Lieutenant, Lott Bloomfield; Second Lieutenant, Alexander Beach, Jr. Company D, Captain, Luther Martin; First Lieutenant, Sydney M. Layton; Second Lieutenant, James H. Carr.

Robert McAllister, who had been lieutenant-colonel of the First Regiment, and who subsequently became brigadier-general, and finally major-general by brevet, was commissioned colonel of the Eleventh Regiment on the 30th of June, 1862, and on the 25th of August following the regiment left for Washington; was assigned to duty in that department until November 16th, then attached to the brigade of Gen. Carr, Sickles' division, at Fairfax Court-House, whence, on the 18th, it proceeded to Falmouth, where Gen. Burnside was concentrating his forces preparatory to his famous attack on Fredericksburg. The first initiation of the regiment into actual war was in that merciless slaughter, wherein thousands of Union soldiers, hurled recklessly against the impregnable batteries of the enemy, bristling the heights for miles in extent, were uselessly sacrificed. "On the morning of the 14th," says the historian, "the Eleventh crossed the river under orders of Gen. Carr, and took position in the second line of battle, being shortly afterwards sent forward to the front line to relieve the Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Regiment, two companies being dispatched to take the place of the pickets of the regiment thus relieved. These companies, with others that were afterwards sent in under a galling picket-fire, behaved with the greatest steadiness. While thus engaged the regiment sustained a loss of two enlisted men killed, four wounded, and six missing. On the 15th the regiment recrossed the river to its old position, and soon after returned to its former camp near Falmouth, Gen. Burnside having wisely abandoned, upon the remonstrance of Gen. Sumner and others, all thought of a second assault, and directed the withdrawal of the entire army from the south side of the river."

Col. McAllister congratulated his command on the 23d of December upon their steadiness and bravery in the action, saying, "You who went in under the galling picket-fire, when the eyes of thousands of our comrades were upon you, and like veterans stood the raging storm of battle, not only holding but gaining ground, deserve my warmest praise." Speaking of the dead he said, "We have before us the consoling fact that they died as brave soldiers fighting for their country, and that those of our day and posterity will do them justice."

It will be well to record here, in honor of the sturdy patriotism of the Eleventh Regiment, that they stood manfully for the vigorous prosecution of the war in those "dark days" of the winter and spring of 1862-63 when a temporizing policy at the North was actively engaged in trying to bring about a dishonorable peace. The regiment took a lively interest in the political questions then occupying the attention of the country, and at a meeting held early in March, at which the utmost enthusiasm was manifested, bonfires being lighted and speeches made in honor of the event, a series of patriotic resolutions were adopted, and being signed by the officers, were forwarded to the Governor as expressing the hostility of the regiment to any attempt to distract public sentiment by untimely partisan clamors for a dishonorable peace. We give below these resolutions with the officers' names attached:

"Whereas, The Legislature of our native State—a State hallowed by the remembrance of the battles of Princeton, Trenton, and Monmouth, fields stained by the blood of our forefathers in the establishment of our government—has sought to tarnish its high honor and bring upon it disgrace by the passage of resolutions tending to a dishonorable peace with armed rebels seeking to destroy our great and beneficent government, the best ever designed for the happiness of the many; and,

"Whereas, We, her sons, members of the Eleventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, citizens representing every section of the State, have left our homes to endure the fatigues, privations, and dangers incident to a soldier's life in order to maintain our republic in its integrity, willing to sacrifice our lives to that object, fully recognizing the impropriety of a soldier's discussion of the legislative functions of the State, yet deeming it due to ourselves that the voice of those who offer their all in their country's cause be heard when weak and wicked men seek its dishonor; therefore,

"Resolved, That the Union of the States is the only guarantee for the preservation of our liberties and independence, and that the war for the maintenance of that Union commands now, as it has done, our best efforts and our most heartfelt sympathy.

"Resolved, That we consider the passage, or even the introduction of the so-called 'Peace Resolutions' as wicked, weak, and cowardly, tending to aid by their sympathy the rebels seeking to destroy the republic.

"Resolved, That we regard as traitors alike the foe in arms and the secret enemies of our government who at home foment disaffection and strive to destroy confidence in our legally chosen rulers.

"Resolved, That the reports spread broadcast throughout the North by sympathizing feints and voices that the army of which we esteem it a high honor to form a part is demoralized and clamorous for peace on any terms are the lying utterances of traitorous tongues, and do base injustice to our noble comrades, who have never faltered in the great work, and are not only willing but anxious to follow the gallant and chivalric leader against the stronghold of the enemy.

"Resolved, That we put forth every effort, endure every fatigue, shrink from no danger until, under the gracious guidance of a kind Providence, every armed rebel shall be conquered, and traitors at home shall quake with fear as the grand emblem of our national independence shall assert its power from North to South, and crush beneath its powerful folds all who dare to assail its honor, doubly hallowed by the memory of the patriot dead.

"ROBERT MCALLISTER, Colonel Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"STEPHEN MOORE, Lieutenant-Colonel Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"JOHN SCHOONOVER, Adjutant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"GARRET SCHENCK, Quartermaster Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"E. BYINGTON, Assistant Surgeon Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"G. RIBBLE, Second Assistant Surgeon Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"F. KNIGHTON, Chaplain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"LUTHER MARTIN, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"JOHN T. HILL, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"WILLIAM H. MEESER, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"THOMAS J. HALSEY, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"PHILIP J. KEARNEY, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"WILLIAM B. DUNNING, Captain Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"S. M. LAYTON, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"IRA W. CONRY, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"LOTT BLOOMFIELD, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"A. H. ACKERMAN, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"EDWARD S. E. NEWBURY, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"JOHN OLDERSHAW, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"W. H. LLOYD, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"MILTON S. LAWRENCE, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"E. T. KENNEDY, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"S. W. VALK, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"SAMUEL T. SLEEPER, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"EDWIN K. GOOD, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"JOHN SOWTER, Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers.

"ALEXANDER BEACH, JR., Lieutenant Eleventh New Jersey Volunteers."

These resolutions and signatures show of what sort of patriotic material the regimental officers were composed. And certainly few statesmen could do more intelligent justice to the situation than that which the resolutions embody and express. During the winter, in camp at Fitzhugh Farm, a school for the captains, lieutenants, and non-commissioned officers was organized, tactics and deportment studied theoretically and practically, and every pains taken to promote the efficiency of the regiment. The result was an admirable esprit de corps prevailing throughout the ranks. Hooker, relieving Burnside on the 21st of March, devoted all his influence and authority for two months to improve the discipline, perfect the organization, and elevate the spirits of his men, and on the 27th inaugurated his movement for turning the flank of Lee, who still remained in position at Fredericksburg. The result was the well-remembered battle of Chancellorsville. The casualties of the Eleventh in this action—twenty killed and one hundred and thirteen wounded—show that they had by no means an easy position. "The corps had sustained the whole weight of 'Stonewall' Jackson's force, had repelled five fierce charges, mainly with the bayonet, had captured eight flags (all taken by the New Jersey troops), had taken many prisoners without losing any, and it was not without reason that the officers and men of the Eleventh, having shared in these achievements, felt that to them, in fact, belonged the honor of having saved the army in one of the most desperate and terrible battles of the war."

Col. McAllister, Adj. Schoonover, and Lieut.-Col. Moore were among the last to leave the field, and at one time, fighting alone, were almost surrounded by the enemy. As to the general bearing and audacity of the regiment in the very face of disaster, a letter written at the time says, "When the regiments of our brigade were forming, away back in the rear, some officer asked for the Eleventh New Jersey; another officer replied, 'Oh, they are fighting on their own hook, and still hard at it with the rebels.'" The same letter refers to the fact that by holding its position and fighting desperately against odds the Eleventh saved the Second New Jersey Brigade from being flanked, and enabled the Fifth Regiment of that brigade to take the colors whose capture gave them so much distinction."¹

Two officers—Lieuts. Bloomfield and Kelley, Company B—were killed and ten wounded. The conduct of Lieut.-Col. Moore, Capt. Kearney, and Adjt. Schoonover is spoken of by the colonel commanding as especially meritorious. "Lieut. Lott Bloomfield," says the report, "a young officer of great promise, was killed in the early part of this battle while nobly performing his duty in encouraging his men to stand firm, and again urging them forward in the storm of battle, rendering valuable assistance in the great struggle of that day."

Gen. Hooker, while visiting the hospital of the Eleventh, some days after the battle, said to Dr. Welling, the surgeon, "This is a gallant regiment; it fought splendidly; officers and men alike deserve credit."

The reputation of the regiment for fighting qualities thus early acquired was maintained through all the campaigns to the surrender of Lee and the close of the war, the regiment participating in the following engagements: Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13 and 14, 1862; Chancellorsville, Va., May 3 and 4, 1863; Gettysburg, Pa., July 2 and 3, 1863; Wapping Heights, Va., July 24, 1863; Kelly's Ford, Va., Nov. 8, 1863; Locust Grove, Va., Nov. 27, 1863; Mine Run, Va., Nov. 29, 1863; Wilderness, Va., May 5 to 7, 1864; Spottsylvania, Va., May 8 to 11, 1864; Spottsylvania C.-H., Va., May 12 to 18, 1864; North Anna River, Va., May 23 and 24, 1864; Tolopotomy, Va., May 30 and 31, 1864; Cold Harbor, Va., June 1 to 5, 1864; before Petersburg, Va., June 16 to 23, 1864; Deep Bottom, Va., July 26 and 27, 1864; mine explosion, Va., July 30, 1864; Barker's Mills, Va., June 10, 1864; north bank of the James, Va., Aug. 14 to 18, 1864; Ream's Station, Va., Aug. 25, 1864; Fort Sedgwick, Va., Sept. 10, 1864; Poplar Spring Church, Va., Oct. 2, 1864; Boydton Plank-road, Va., Oct. 27, 1864; Fort Morton, Va., Nov. 5, 1864; Hatcher's Run, Va., Feb. 5 to 7, 1865; Armstrong House, Va., March 25, 1865; Boydton Plank-road, Va. (capture of Petersburg), April 2, 1865; Amelia Springs, Va., April 6, 1865; Farnville, Va., April 6 to 7, 1865; Lee's surrender (Appomattox, Va.), April 9, 1865.

We append a few notices of the regiment at different times. In concluding his report of the two days' fighting at Gettysburg, Adjt. Schoonover remarks, "In the action of the 2d the regiment suffered very heavy loss. Out of the two hundred and seventy-five officers and men taken into the fight, eighteen were killed, one hundred and thirty wounded, and six missing, making a total of one hundred and fifty-four." In this action Col. McAllister was severely wounded. This officer was distinguished for cool bravery, and was always at the post of danger. In the battle of the Wilderness he had two horses shot under him.

CHAPTER XXIII.

UNION COUNTY IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.

Fourteenth Regiment.—Companies C and E of this regiment were from the county of Union, the former being under the command of Capt. Chauncey Harris, with Ebenezer Muddell as first lieutenant, and Joseph W. Walker as second lieutenant; and the latter commanded by Capt. James L. Bodwell, with First Lieut. Isaac S. Tingley, and Second Lieut. James O. Bedell. William S. Truax was colonel; Caldwell K. Hall, lieutenant-colonel; Peter Vredenburg, Jr., major; F. Lemuel Buckalew, adjutant; Enoch L. Cowart, quartermaster; Ambrose Treganowan, surgeon; Joseph B. Martin, Herbert B. Chambers, assistant surgeons; Frank B. Rose, chaplain.

The organization of the regiment was completed, and it was mustered into the United States service at Freehold, N. J., Aug. 26, 1862. It left the State on the 2d of September, and on its arrival at Baltimore, the rebels being expected to invade Maryland, was sent forward to Frederick Junction, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, for the purpose of guarding the bridge across the Monocacy River. Almost immediately upon its arrival information was received that the advance of Lee's army had crossed into Maryland and was moving upon Frederick. "The Fourteenth was at once ordered to fall back, and a coal train being seized, the command was transferred to Elysiville, twenty-one miles from Baltimore, where it remained for ten days doing guard and picket duty." The rebels reached Monocacy only an hour after the departure of the regiment, burnt the bridge, and laid waste the country. But they were overtaken and beaten at South Mountain and Antietam, and on the night of the 18th compelled to retreat across the Potomac. The Fourteenth Regiment having been ordered to return to Monocacy and rebuild the bridge, reached that place on the 17th, when the work was begun and vigorously prosecuted to its completion, the troops remaining all winter in that vicinity, doing little except guard duty and the active drill and discipline of the camp. During the early portion of this time there was much sickness in the regiment, which, however, diminished as the men became accustomed to the rigors and hardships of the soldier's life. In January, 1863, Companies E and K were detailed for guard duty along the railroad, the former being stationed at Monrovia, seven miles from camp, and the latter at Mount Airy, fourteen miles distant. "About this time Col. Truax was appointed acting brigadier-general, with headquarters at Frederick City, and the Third Delaware Regiment and Purnell Legion being temporarily brigaded with the Fourteenth, all were placed under his command, Lieut.-Col. Hall commanding the latter. Early in the spring six companies were detached from the regiment (Companies B and G being left at Monocacy) and sent to Martinsburg, for the purpose of reinforcing Gen. Milroy, who was threatened by the enemy, but no attack being made the detachment six weeks later returned to camp."¹

After the battle of Chancellorsville Lee's army again moved towards the Potomac, and the Fourteenth was ordered to Harper's Ferry. It took position on Maryland Heights, where it was engaged upon the fortifications and in other duties for about a fortnight. On the 30th June, Gen. Meade having ordered the evacuation of the Heights, French's division (including the Fourteenth Regiment) proceeded towards Frederick City, and after several unimportant movements was ordered to the relief of Meade's army engaged with the army at Gettysburg. The Fourteenth at this time was brigaded with the One Hundred and Fifty-first New York, Sixth New York Heavy Artillery, and Tenth Vermont, commanded by Brig.-Gen. Morris. It being supposed that the rebels would retreat by the way of Boonsborough Gap, the division was ordered to that point, where it formed in line of battle, but Lee having pursued another route no engagement occurred. Leaving the Gap on the 9th of July, the division, now assigned to the Third Army Corps and designated the Third Division, marched to the front and joined the main army, whose fortunes it shared from that time to the close of the war.

Lee having retreated into Virginia pursued by the Union army, the Fourteenth with its division crossed the Potomac at Edwards' Ferry on the 17th, and without taking part in any of the conflicts which attended the pursuit of the enemy went into camp near Bealton Station, where, and at other points along the Rappahannock, it remained encamped for five weeks, the rebels in the mean time lying quietly at Culpeper. On the 15th of September, the rebels advancing from Madison Court-House on our right, Meade fell back across the Rappahannock, and the rebels still advancing, the retrograde movement was kept up to Centreville Heights. During this march the Fourteenth lost forty men taken prisoners. Lee failing in his movements retreated to the Rappahannock, followed leisurely by the Union forces. While the rebels were engaged in constructing formidable works our army effected a crossing, driving the enemy from the river with considerable loss. "After a halt of a few days at Brandy Station the corps again advanced, crossing the Rapidan and overtaking the enemy at Locust Grove, a dense forest of pine-trees, where he was strongly posted. At this time the brigade to which the Fourteenth was attached (the First of the Third Division) had the advance, and, skirmishers being sent out, it soon became engaged, the men fighting bravely for four hours, at one time charging with great gallantry and driving the rebels from their position with a loss of several prisoners."

This was the first active engagement in which the Fourteenth Regiment participated. It is recorded that "they fought with great steadiness throughout." Companies B and K, being on the extreme left, became separated from the regiment, so that they did not get the order to fall back, and remained in the fight for an hour longer than the rest of the command, retiring only when their ammunition was exhausted. The regiment lost in this action sixteen killed and fifty-eight wounded. "Gen. Morris rode to the front, congratulating the men for their bravery. In a few words he told them that as new troops a brigade never fought better; that they had accomplished all that was desired of them."² On the 1st of December Gen. Morris issued the following congratulatory order:

"The brigade commander deems it his gratifying duty to express to the officers and men of the Fourteenth New Jersey Volunteers, commanded by Col. William S. Truax, his appreciation of their bravery and endurance throughout the engagement on the 27th of November.

"The occasion was one which pre-ented the perils of the battle-field in the most discouraging form. It was necessary to form the line of battle in a dense woods and at the base of a hill, with the enemy in position on its crest protected by breastworks. The regiment was under fire for three hours, and for a portion of that time the cross-fire of the enemy's rifles made rapid and terrible havoc in our ranks. Its duty being to hold the line without advancing beyond a limited distance, the regiment performed its entire mission, drove the enemy from the crest, and held it until their ammunition was exhausted and the veterans of the First Division arrived to relieve them.

"Our distinguished division and corps commanders have spoken of the regiment in terms of high commendation.

"The brigade commander is proud to lead such gallant and patriotic hearts.

"By command of Brig.-Gen. Morris."

The darkness of night coming on, the enemy retired from the battle, and withdrew to their strong position on Mine Run. The formidable character of these works prevented Gen. Meade from making an assault upon them, as was contemplated, and on the 1st of December he ordered a withdrawal of his forces across the Rapidan. This was effected without molestation on the part of the enemy, and the Fourteenth went into winter-quarters in an old rebel camp at Brandy Station. At this time the regiment numbered but six hundred men fit for duty, three hundred and fifty less than when it entered the field. Nearly one hundred had died, sixteen had been killed in battle, some were on detached service, some in hospitals, some had been discharged for disability, while a few had deserted.

During the winter a deep religious interest was awakened in the regiment through the earnest labors of Chaplain Rose. Regimental churches were built of logs, covered with tents furnished by the Sanitary Commission. Tracts, books, and papers were freely distributed among the soldiers. The 6th of February came and found the corps under marching orders, moving out to engage the enemy at Culpeper Ford, in order to effect a crossing of the river. But the enemy being found in force, with his line extending from the Rapidan to Orange Court-House, the object was abandoned. Gen. Grant assumed command, and the army was reorganized, preparatory to the grand forward movement begun in May, 1864, in the advance upon the Wilderness. In this reorganization the Third Corps was broken up, and the Third Division, containing the Fourteenth Regiment, was placed in the Sixth Corps, now reduced to two brigades instead of three. The Fourteenth still remained in the First Brigade, consisting of the Tenth Vermont, One Hundred and Sixth and One Hundred and Fifty-first New York, and Eighty-seventh Pennsylvania.

Foster's "New Jersey and the Rebellion" says of the engagements at the Wilderness:

"At length on the 3d of May, 1864, orders were issued for a forward movement, and on the following morning the whole army commenced its grand advance against the enemy now concentrated at the Wilderness. Here, early on the 5th, our advance under Warren met and engaged the enemy, the battle raging furiously all day. Sedgwick's corps, reaching the field, went into action shortly after noon, the Third Brigade of the Third Division being sent to reinforce the centre. Here the Fourteenth was engaged for several hours, fighting gallantly and losing heavily. On the following day, the enemy attempting to turn our right flank, the battle was renewed, and continued with great fury, the First Brigade still holding its position near the centre, but losing few men. During the night the enemy retired, when Grant advanced his columns with a view of concentrating around Spotsylvania Court-House. Upon emerging from the Wilderness, Warren's corps became actively engaged on the 8th with Longstreet's veterans, who sought to delay his progress, and the Sixth Corps going to his relief late in the afternoon, the Fourteenth again went into action, the enemy being driven back with a loss of one thousand five hundred men."

Gen. Morris was wounded in this action, and Col. Truax was placed in temporary command of the brigade. Fighting continued on the 11th and 12th, resulting greatly to the loss of the enemy; the six following days were occupied in manoeuvring and skirmishing at various points, up to the night of the 21st, when Gen. Grant ordered a flanking advance to the North Anna, and on the 24th the Fourteenth crossed with its corps at Jericho Ford. Thence the brigade proceeded to Nole's Station, thirty miles from Richmond, where it destroyed the Virginia Central Railroad for a distance of eight miles, and returned to its corps without the loss of a man. In the next grand flanking movement of Gen. Grant, whereby he avoided the enemy's invulnerable position in front by a movement to the eastward and then southward upon the Richmond road, the Sixth Corps led the advance, crossing the Pamunkey, and skirmishing to Hanover Court-House and Cold Harbor road. Here on the 31st a general advance was made upon the rebels' position north of the Chickahominy, resulting in the capture of a good part of the advanced rifle-pits of the enemy. Our troops held and bivouacked on the ground they had gained. During this action the Fourteenth was in the skirmish-line, and lost severely in killed and wounded, Orderly Black, of Company I, being shot through the heart and instantly killed, while Col. Truax was slightly wounded in the hand, but did not leave the field.

On the morning of June 1st the march began to Cold Harbor, the Sixth Corps in the rear. The distance was about fifteen miles to the enemy's position, which was reached in the afternoon, and at five o'clock an assault was made, with the Third Division in advance, and the Fourteenth in the front line. "The enemy at this point was posted in a wood, which concealed his strength, facing a level, open field. Across this field our men advanced with great spirit under a heavy fire, and a terrific battle ensued, the losses on both sides being very heavy. The Fourteenth suffered severely, losing in two hours two hundred and forty in killed and wounded, Lieut. Stults, of Company H, and Lieut. Tingley, of Company E, being among the former. The enemy being in overwhelming force, our lines were obliged to fall back a short distance, intrenching strongly during the night. Other corps held in readiness now came up, getting in position for an attack on the 3d. At sunrise on that morning the enemy's works were again assaulted, but with no other substantial result than the loss of some thousands of men who had in vain dashed themselves heroically against an impregnable position. In this assault the Fourteenth again lost several men. Gen. Grant, now satisfied that the rebel works could not be carried, wisely decided to pass the Chickahominy far to Lee's right, and thence move across the James to demonstrate against Richmond from the south."

Not to enter into the particulars of the transportation of the army to Bermuda Hundred, whence Grant's forces united with Butler's army, then investing Petersburg, the corps, on the 21st of June, was placed in position on the left, with the view of finding and turning the right of the enemy, holding or cutting the Weldon Railroad. The Third Division was again in the advance. The road was reached on the 23d, and the track torn up for some distance. A large force of the enemy, however, suddenly appeared, struck the corps a heavy blow on the flank, inflicting considerable loss, that of the Fourteenth being forty men killed and made prisoners. After that, on the 29th, the corps was moved to the support of Gen. Wilson, who, with two divisions of cavalry, had torn up many miles both of the Weldon and Lynchburg Railroads, and was hotly pressed in attempting to effect his junction with the main army. The rebels, however, retired upon their advance, and after spending three days in further destroying the railroad, the Fourteenth New Jersey and One Hundred and Sixth New York returned to their old position. Up to this time the actual loss of the Fourteenth had been twenty-nine killed, one hundred and seven wounded, and fifteen missing, as reported June 27th. Many of those who had been slightly wounded in the earlier battles of the campaign are not included in this report, as they had previously recovered and returned to duty.

The next fighting of the division was on quite a different field. Hunter, with a large Union force, having abandoned the Shenandoah Valley, Lee sent Early northwards with all the force he could muster. Our force at Martinsburg retreating precipitately to Harper's Ferry, and Grant deeming it necessary to send more forces into Maryland, on the 6th of July detached the Third Division of the Sixth Corps, and hurried it forward to Locust Point, near Baltimore, where it arrived under Gen. Ricketts on the morning of the 8th. From this point the division, numbering five thousand men, proceeded to Monocacy, the old familiar ground of the Fourteenth Regiment, which was now the first to arrive on the spot. By this time the rebels were in force at Frederick City, but were closely watched by Gen. Wallace, in command of our forces. On the night of the 8th Wallace had taken position on the left bank of the Monocacy, which afforded fair facilities for defense. His disposition for battle was completed on the 9th, Gen. Ricketts being placed with his division on the left, holding the road to Washington. In Foster's "New Jersey and the Rebellion" we find the following account of the battle:

"At nine o'clock the rebel skirmishers appeared in front and soon drove our skirmish-line across the river, thereupon planting guns and opening the battle. The disparity of artillery was great, the enemy having sixteen Napoleons, while we had only six smaller pieces, and the superiority of his fire was soon apparent. Gradually the skirmishing grew warmer and more general, and soon the fighting became serious. At length a body of the rebel army, moving out of range of our guns and flanking our left, forced a passage of the Monocacy two miles below the bridge, on the Washington road, at once advancing in battle array upon Ricketts, who had charged front to the left to meet their advance on his flank, his right resting on the river. Steadily the rebel columns advanced to the assault, but they were met by a steadiness as inflexible as their own. The brave division, fighting with a desperation rarely matched, again and again repelled the rebel assaults, strewing the ground with dead, for six hours maintaining the unequal contest, waiting in vain for reinforcements that did not come. At length the enemy, gathering all his strength for a final blow, again moved from our left in two massive lines to the charge, and gradually enveloping our lines, nothing was left but to retreat. The Fourteenth being on the extreme left of the line had suffered severely, but it had stood manfully to its work, and only retreated when Gen. Wallace, seeing that further fighting was useless, ordered it to do so. During the engagement Lieut.-Col. Hall, Adj. Buckelew, and several officers had been wounded; Capts. Stults, Kanine, and Conover were killed, while every remaining officer of the line was either killed or wounded except Capt. J. J. Janeway, of Company K."

Capt. Chauncey Harris, of Company C, was wounded through the left breast while in command of the regiment, and after being placed in an ambulance was shot through the right knee-joint by a rebel bullet. The command of the regiment then devolved upon Capt. Janeway, of Company K, the only officer left able to take charge of it. He bravely led the forlorn hope, but all further fighting was useless, and the line gradually fell back, disputing every inch of ground. Just before the close of the action the enemy pressing in poured a destructive fire of grape and canister into the retiring ranks, cutting down the defiant veterans by scores and fifties. Happily, however, the pursuit was not persistent, and the weary division, extricating itself from its peril, found pause and safety at New Market, six miles distant. A report of the battle says, "Several recruits had arrived after the battle of Cold Harbor, and the regiment was partly filled, entering the fight with three hundred and fifty men, but ninety-five came out, two hundred and fifty-five being killed, wounded, and captured in that terrible battle. Of the nine hundred and fifty men that left New Jersey but ninety-five were left for duty on the night of July 9th, without an officer to command them." Capt. Janeway was wounded in the shoulder shortly after taking command, and was forced to leave.

The following from an officer narrates some of the experiences and incidents of the regiment subsequent to its arrival in the vicinity of Monocacy:

"Reaching Frederick July 8th, we formed lines west of the city facing the Katodon Mountains. Capt. John C. Patterson was placed in command of the picket line, about two miles long. At eight o'clock in the morning the troops were ordered by Geo. Wallace to recross the Monocacy River by moving down the Baltimore pike and thence south, to take up a position on our old camp-ground (Camp Hooker). The pickets were left until a quarter past ten o'clock, when we were ordered to join the main column at Monocacy bridge. We had to move very quietly, owing to the closeness of the rebel pickets. The commandant cautioned the pickets (two were stationed about fifteen steps apart) to be very still, and to each move back some distance before assembling on the pike. One poor fellow overpowered by sleep remained on the line, his post being in cove about knee-high. He remained asleep until daylight next morning; as soon as it was light enough to discern objects at a distance he began to look around, rising to his feet. His rising was the signal for a hundred rebels to fire upon him. Strange to say he was unhurt, and dashed away in the direction of Frederick. But three rebel cavalrymen at once started to cut him off. As he was running across the field he was joined by a citizen armed with a rifle. The latter told him (Minton) to continue on and he would attend to the three cavalrymen. Then stepping behind a tree he leveled his rifle and fired; one of the rebels reeled from his saddle, the other two dismounted, and the pursuit ended. Minton continued on, and rejoined the regiment just as the battle commenced, and took part in the fight."

An officer of the Fourteenth furnishes also the following incidents of the battle:

"When the enemy at Monocacy first struck us, three lines deep against our single line, the fire was terrific. Our color-sergeant (William B. Cottrell), while bravely waving his colors in front of his regiment, received a ball which before striking him passed through and severed the flag-staff just below his left hand. He fell forward and died upon the flag, his life blood staining its folds. Our colors were immediately raised by one of the color-guard. He also was almost instantly shot down. Then another raised it up; he was badly wounded and turned it over to the next corporal, who was mortally wounded. These four were killed and disabled in almost the time it has taken me to write it, showing the terrible fire we were exposed to at the battle of Monocacy."

"Our lieutenant-colonel was at the first badly wounded, his arm being broken. Capt. Conover, of Company D, the next ranking officer, was mortally wounded. The command then devolved upon Capt. Harris, who was shot through the lungs and carried from the field. The next in rank, Capt. Stults, Company H, was shot a few moments after, and died almost instantly. The next in rank, Capt. Janeway, Company K, was wounded and left the field, the command devolving on Capt. John C. Patterson. In the mean time Lieut. Craig, Company D, was badly wounded, and Capt. Canine, Company A, was killed, leaving our regiment with only three officers,—the adjutant, Lemuel F. Buckalew, First Lieut. Samuel C. Bailey, Company F, and Capt. Patterson."

It is generally believed by historians of the war that but for the battle of Monocacy, which had the effect of retarding the march of the rebels until other troops reached the capital, Early might have pushed on and captured Washington, the undoubted objective-point of the rebel general. This thought tinged the recollections of that bloody day with something like a halo of satisfaction, assuring us that the blood of our brave soldiers was not shed in vain.

After various expeditions under Gen. Wright, through Leesburg, Snicker's Gap, Harper's Ferry, and Bolivar Heights, the object being to watch and intercept the movements of Early, the forces were ordered back to Frederick City and thence to Monocacy, where a conference was held by Gen. Grant with Gens. Wright and Hunter on the 4th of August, and it was determined to concentrate a large force under Gen. Sheridan at Harper's Ferry, for the purpose of a campaign in the Shenandoah Valley. On the 6th of August, Gen. Sheridan, arriving at Harper's Ferry, took command, the force now numbering nearly thirty thousand men, including two divisions of cavalry. On the 10th the column moved against the enemy, coming up with his rear-guard on the 12th at Cedar Creek, the main body being strongly intrenched at Fisher's Hill. No general action was brought on till the 19th, when the battle of Opequan Creek was fought. In the mean time recruits had reached the Fourteenth Regiment, augmenting its numbers to about three hundred men. The position of the rebels was naturally a strong one, and had been thoroughly fortified. To assail it our army had to advance through a narrow ravine shut in by steep, thickly-wooded hills, to form in an irregular, undulating valley in the enemy's front, and then advancing through a wood, attack desperately his centre, while flanking and crushing in his left. We need not give the details of the battle, but say simply that the victory was complete, although attained at serious loss. The Third Division of the Sixth Corps lost heavily, the Fourteenth Regiment alone losing seven killed and sixty-two wounded and missing. Among the killed was Maj. Vredenburg, who was struck by a shell in the breast while at the head of his regiment ordering a charge upon a rebel battery. He expired in a few moments. A brave and faithful officer, he was widely esteemed and his death lamented by the whole command. Lient. Green, commanding Company I, was also killed, and Capt. Bodwell, of Company E, wounded. Three thousand prisoners and five guns were taken from the rebels. At Fisher's Hill, on the 22d of September, our arms were equally victorious. The battle lasted some three hours, when the rebels were driven from their fortifications in great disorder, losing one thousand one hundred prisoners, sixteen pieces of artillery, and fifteen stands of colors taken by our soldiers. The Third Division captured six pieces of artillery, two of which were taken by the Fourteenth Regiment. The casualties in the Fourteenth numbered but ten killed and thirty wounded.

But the great battle of the campaign was yet to be fought, that of Cedar Creek. After the battle above described our forces held the line of this creek, and Sheridan, deeming them secure, had gone to Washington on business. Early, more wily than was deemed by his antagonist, on the 18th of October moved his entire army across the mountain separating the branches of the Shenandoah, forded the north fork, and under cover of fog and darkness early on the next morning surprised our camps, turning both flanks, and crushing back our astonished troops with terrible loss, including twelve hundred prisoners, twenty-four guns, and all our equipage. So silently did the enemy advance, and so suddenly did he pounce upon our sleeping camp, that the men were in many cases prisoners before they were awakened. The Eighth Corps, which met the first onset of the enemy, was able to make little resistance; but the Sixth Corps, which had more opportunity to rally, held the rebels in check for a time. It soon became apparent, however, that it was impossible to hold our positions, and a general retreat was accordingly ordered. Our forces had fallen back five miles, and Gen. Wright had succeeded in partially reforming them in line of battle, when Sheridan appeared upon the scene, having made his famous ride from Winchester. "He saw only too soon the wreck and disaster of the day, and instantly set about the work of repairing the mischief. Riding along the lines and speaking inspiringly to the men, he stimulated them to new endeavor, revived their hopes, and prepared them for a fresh encounter, meanwhile also strengthening his formations, studying the ground, and gathering every item of information necessary to his purpose. At length everything was complete. 'We are going to lick them out of their boots,' said Sheridan, and the men with the words ringing in their ears once more assumed the offensive. After considerable manœuvring a charge was ordered, and soon the enemy in turn was driven back with great slaughter, with the loss of his trains and artillery and all the trophies captured from us in the morning, our cavalry pursuing rapidly and cutting down the fugitives without mercy." The inspiring genius of Sheridan had converted defeat into victory, all the more grand and surprising from the helpless condition which had preceded it. This was an exploit which for daring rapidity and brilliancy of execution is rarely equalled in the annals of war. The Fourteenth Regiment, which took an active part, lost heavily, Adjt. Ross, who had been promoted from the ranks for gallant conduct, being killed. The rebel loss included one thousand five hundred prisoners, twenty-three guns (exclusive of the twenty-four lost by us in the morning and recovered at night), one thousand five hundred small-arms, besides most of their caissons, wagons, etc.

The further operations of the Fourteenth till the close of the war were performed in another field. The campaign having rescued the Shenandoah Valley and insured the safety of the national capital, the main body of the army, except the cavalry scouts left to complete the driving of the fugitives, was transferred to the theatre of operations against Richmond. The officers of the Fourteenth were now mostly enlisted men risen from the ranks, who had won for themselves a lasting reputation. Capt. Janeway for brave and meritorious conduct was promoted to the colonelcy of the regiment. Besides this veteran officer there were Capts. Wanser, Manning, and Marsh and Lieuts. Foster, Buckalew, Fletcher, Hanning, White, and Mandeville, noted for conspicuous gallantry, who had entered the ranks as privates. Col. Truax was still in command of the brigade as acting brigadier-general. The regiment had been recruited to the number of two hundred. It was transferred to City Point, whence it advanced and occupied a position on the Weldon Railroad which had been seized and held by the Fifth Corps. Feb. 5, 1865, the regiment participated in the engagement at Hatcher's Run; the assault on Fort Steadman followed on the 25th of March, resulting in the speedy downfall of Petersburg, and the surrender of Lee two weeks later at Appomattox. Col. Truax in his report of the capture of Fort Steadman makes the following statement:

"The brigade was formed in column of regiment, and advancing on the left flank of the fort compelled its surrender. Without halting we advanced on the next fort, which was evacuated almost without a struggle, leaving in our possession four guns, caissons, and horses. . . . I have every reason to be proud of the regiments composing my brigade."

Another report says,—

"From first to last the Fourteenth fought with the greatest bravery, and to it equally with the most efficient regiment of the corps belongs the credit of the magnificent success of that glorious day."

Early on the 3d of April, being informed that Petersburg was evacuated, and that the pickets of the Twenty-fourth Corps had advanced into the city, the Fourteenth joined in the pursuit of the enemy, pushing forward to Sailor's Creek, where it assailed the enemy's flank, doubling it up and driving the rebels for the distance of a mile. Here reaching the hill directly in front of the creek, where the rebels were found strongly posted in the rear of some works, a charge was made by the brigade across the stream, some seventy-five yards in width, the soldiers advancing through water up to their hips and under a galling fire from the enemy. Immediately reforming on the other side of the stream the brigade charged over the crest of the hill, driving and completely routing the enemy. Wheeling to the left and pushing his column against the left flank of the enemy, a few moments of vigorous fighting were crowned with the trophy of the surrender of Ewell's command. Maj. Pegram, inspector-general on Ewell's staff, at this point rode up to Col. Truax, bearing a flag of truce, and said, "I surrender Lieut.-Gen. Ewell and staff and his command." This was a glorious termination of the long and weary campaigns in which our brave soldiers had been engaged. The Fourteenth, now reduced to about one hundred men, proceeded to Barksdale, where the command remained in camp till the 24th, and then proceeded to Danville with a view of co-operating with Sherman against Johnston. But on their arrival news of Johnston's surrender was received. The war was ended. The Fourteenth Regiment was mustered out of the United States service at Washington, D. C., on the 18th of June, 1865, having been in the service nearly three years. It left New Jersey nine hundred and fifty strong; the remnant that returned was two hundred and thirty, notwithstanding the many recruits which had strengthened its ranks from time to time. During that time the regiment had been distinguished in many battles and skirmishes for its uniform gallantry and courage. It had traveled by rail one thousand and fifty-one miles, by water six hundred and twenty-eight miles, and on foot two thousand and fifteen miles.¹

Thirtieth Regiment.—The Thirtieth Regiment, which contained one company, viz., Company B, from this county, was organized under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 22, 1861, and under existing orders governing the enrollment of troops. A draft for ten thousand four hundred and seventy-eight men to serve for nine months unless sooner discharged had been made upon the Governor of this State by the President of the United States, Aug. 4, 1862, and soon after full instructions for conducting it were received from the War Department. The draft so ordered was not to interfere with orders governing recruiting, and all enlistments up to Sept. 1, 1862, would be placed to the credit of the State. A general desire manifested and expressed by the State authorities, as well as by prominent citizens throughout the State, to avoid the draft gave an enthusiasm to recruiting which caused the entire quota to be raised by voluntary enlistments and in camp by the 3d of September, 1862, the time appointed for commencing the draft. The organization of the regiment was fully completed, officered, and equipped by the 17th of September, 1862, at which time the command was duly mustered into the United States service for nine months at Flemington, N. J. The regiment was raised in different parts of the State, and placed under command of Col. Alexander E. Donaldson, who resigned March 4, 1863, and the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieut.-Col. John J. Cladek, who served till the regiment was mustered out, June 27, 1863. The officers of Company B from this county were: Captain, John N. Lewis; first lieutenant, James D. Vanderveer; second lieutenant, Thomas Moore. Capt. Lewis resigned Dec. 26, 1862, and Lieut. Vanderveer took his place, serving as captain till June 27, 1863, when the regiment was mustered out. James H. Ogden, who entered the company as first sergeant Aug. 25, 1862, became first lieutenant March 16, 1863, vice Elias W. Brant, resigned, and resigned April 27, 1863, when John M. Case became first lieutenant in his stead. Oscar Conklin, first sergeant of Company I, became second lieutenant upon the resignation of Thomas Moore, February, 1863.¹

The regiment left the State Sept. 30, 1862, numbering one thousand and eleven, officers and enlisted men. It was assigned soon after arriving in Washington to the Provisional Brigade, Casey's division, defenses of Washington, and participated in but one battle, that of Chancellorsville, May 2 and 3, 1863.

CHAPTER XXV.

TOWNSHIP OF ELIZABETHTOWN.

Original Dimensions of the Patent.—The land covered by Governor Nicolls' patent was of large dimensions. It extended from the mouth of the Raritan on the south to the mouth of the Passaic on the north, a distance, in a straight line, of not less than seventeen miles, and running back into the country twice this distance, or thirty-four miles, embracing the towns of Woodbridge and Piscataway, the whole of the present Union County, part of the towns of Newark and Clinton, a small part of Morris County, and a considerable portion of Somerset County, containing about five hundred thousand acres, upland and meadow in fair proportions, well watered by the Raritan, the Passaic, the Rahway, and Elizabeth Rivers, Thompson's (Morse's) Creek, and Bound Brook, diversified with level plains and ranges of hills of considerable elevation, ordinarily classified as mountains, the soil of the uplands mostly red shale and clay loam, and a large part of it susceptible of a high state of cultivation.

Town of Newark set off.—The territory purchased by the Associates of the Indians and patented by Governor Nicolls was evidently ample enough for several towns, vastly too large to be soon occupied by the original purchasers. But arrangements were in progress for the reduction of its limits. Robert Treat, of Milford, who, in November, 1661, had, with others, endeavored to come to an agreement with Governor Stuyvesant for the settlement of a plantation in these parts, and had failed to secure satisfactory conditions from the Dutch government, had, some time in the winter of 1666, or in the early spring, been again deputed, with others of his townsmen, to visit this section and secure land sufficient for a town. On their arrival they found themselves at once among old and valued friends and neighbors, men and women, with whom, at Wethersfield, Milford, New Haven, and Guilford, they had taken sweet counsel together. The Branford people, who were meditating a union with the others in the new plantation, were many of them emigrants from Southampton, from which place and its neighborhood a large portion of the people of Elizabethtown had come. This was evidently a principal attraction to the new settlers from Connecticut.¹

It was not difficult, in such a case, to agree upon terms. The townspeople welcomed their old friends, and cheerfully consented to part with that portion of their purchase which lay on the other side of what has from that day, and on that account, been called "Bound Brook;" and Carteret agreed to extinguish the Indian title to the land beyond the town line to the northern bend of the Passaic River. Treat and his associates returned, and made so favorable a report that about thirty families determined at once to remove to New Jersey; and on the very day, May 21, 1666, that Pierce and his company had arranged for the settlement of Woodbridge and Piscataway, the Milford people arrived in boats, and held their first town-meeting on the western bank of the Passaic River, and thus laid the foundations of another township, since the flourishing city of Newark. The limits of Elizabeth Town north and south were in this manner considerably reduced, the town thus extending only to Rahway River on the south, and to Bound Brook on the north.

Progress of Settlement and Surveys.—The affairs of the town, so far as can be discovered, moved on quietly and harmoniously during the first two years after Governor Carteret's arrival. Large accessions were made to the sister town of Newark from Branford and Guilford, Conn., in the course of the summer and autumn of 1667, and the venerable Abraham Pierson, the old pastor of some of the settlers of Elizabethtown before their removal here, had now, Oct. 1, 1667, taken up his residence, with many of their kinsmen also, within six miles of their new home in the wilderness. This doubtless served to reconcile them still more to the hardships incident to a new plantation in the midst of savage tribes, on whose friendship but little reliance could be placed. It made their position vastly more secure, as well as pleasant. It is not unreasonable to suppose that, until they had secured a minister for their own town, some of them occasionally were found wending their way through the wilderness to Newark on the morning of the Lord's Day, to enjoy the privilege of hearing the gospel preached once more by the pastor of their earlier days. They were sturdy men, and not unaccustomed to such journeys.¹

The work of surveying the house-lots and planting lands had been performed very imperfectly, possibly by Wolphertsen, who had been the city surveyor of New Amsterdam. The description of these lots is so imperfect, as recorded in the books of the province, that their location and the bearing of their boundary lines cannot now be determined. This would indicate that the lots had been laid out before the arrival of the surveyor-general, Vauquellin, with the Governor. Circumstances had occurred that made it necessary that Vauquellin should be "sent on business to England by the Governor," and no one else was authorized to act in the matter of laying out lands. A few of the inhabitants in consequence were put to some inconvenience, and drew up the following paper:

"We, whose names are under-written, do humbly petition unto the Governor and his Council that we may have our lands laid out unto us, according to the agreements made by the Inhabitants and consent of the Governor with them, as may more fully appear in the Town Records; which if it cannot be granted, we do not see how we can possibly subsist in the Town, but shall be forced to look out somewhere else for a livelihood. Nathaniel Bonnell, Joseph Bood, Leonard Headley, Benjamin Homan, Joseph Meeker, Benjamin Meeker, Jonathan Ogden, Joseph Ogden, Joseph Osborn, Stephen Osborn, Benjamin Price, Benjamin Price, Jr., Joseph Seers, Thomas Tomson, Hurrt Tomson, Moses Tomson, and Isaac Whitehead."²

The signers were seventeen in number, and most of them either of the second generation or new-comers. The others were probably in difficulty about their boundary lines. The petition is without date, but it must have been presented in the early part of December, 1667. The services of Brackett were only temporary, and confined most likely to the few cases of difficulty which gave rise to the petition. It is not to be concluded from this occurrence that no surveys had thus far been made, nor that the difficulty was at all general or extensive. The earliest records of surveys were made in the lost Town Book, as was frequently attested in subsequent years, and as was provided for by the people of Newark in their own case.³

The boundary line between this town and Newark needed adjustment, and John Ogden, Sr., Luke Watson, Robert Bond, and Jeffry Jones were deputed to arrange the matter with the commissioners from Newark. They met together for this purpose May 20, 1668. It appears from an affidavit of Joseph Woodruff, of this town, made July 26, 1743, before Judge Joseph Bonnel, also of this town, that being at Milford, Conn., about the year 1699, he heard Governor Treat say,— "That the inhabitants of Newark did first settle under the Elizabeth Town Purchase; and did allow the Newark river to be the bounds of the said Purchase; and said that the Elizabeth Town people was so kind to the Newark people that they could never reward them enough. And further this deponent saith, That he, at that time, heard the said Governor tell after what manner the Line was settled between the two towns; and that it was done in so loving and solemn a manner that he thought it ought never to be removed; for he (the said Governor) himself being among them at that time, prayed with them on Dividend Hill (so called), that there might be a good agreement between them; and that it was agreed upon, by the settlers of each town, that the Line between them should stand and remain from Dividend Hill, to run a northwest course; and the Governor said, that, after the agreement, Mr. John Ogden (being one of the first purchasers) prayed among the people, and returned thanks for their loving agreement."

It was thus that the founders of these two towns sought the blessing of the Almighty, and His guidance in all their transactions. They were, the most of them, men of faith and prayer.⁴

Boundaries of the Township Defined by Law.

—At the meeting of the Assembly in October, 1693, an act was passed defining the bounds of the respective townships of the province, in which, for the first time, the territory of this town is described by legislative authority:

"The Township of Elizabeth-Town shall include all the Land from the mouth of Raway River West to Woodbridge-Stake, and from thence Westerly along the Line of the County to the Partition Line of the Province, and from the mouth of the said Raway River up the Sound to the mouth of the Bound-Creek, and from thence to the Bound-Hill, from thence Northwest to the Partition Line of the Province."¹

Mr. Hatfield, speaking of these boundaries, remarks,—

"The territory thus defined embraced the whole of the present Union County, and considerable portions of Somerset, Hunterdon, Morris, Warren, and Sussex Counties, including Morristown, Stanhope, Schooley's Mountain, and Newton, according to Keitt's partition line, then understood to be the true dividing line between East and West Jersey. The township was thus extended beyond the western bounds of the Indian Purchase, which at no point was more than thirty-four miles from Newark Bay, or double the distance from the mouth of the Raritan to the mouth of the Passaic Rivers."²

The error of Mr. Hatfield in extending the boundaries of the township so far to the northwest evidently grew out of his not understanding the partition line between East and West Jersey. The act does say that the line shall extend on the "North-west to the Partition Line of the Province." But where was that partition line located? It was not the final line surveyed by James Lawrence, for this was not run till the autumn of 1743; nor was it the Keith line, as Mr. Hatfield supposes. The Keith line proper was never run beyond the southwest corner of Somerset County. Starting on the east side of Little Egg Harbor, and running in the direction assumed, it was soon objected to by the West Jersey proprietors as taking off too much of their share of the province, and was stopped at the end of the straight line which appears on the maps between Hunterdon and Somerset Counties, and never carried beyond that point. Had it been continued to the Delaware River, it would have included the territory described by Mr. Hatfield, but it was not. A compromise line was subsequently agreed upon by Coxe and Barclay, Governors respectively of West and East Jersey, which ran from the point where the Keith line had terminated to the bend of the Passaic, thence to the mouth of the Pequannock, and up that stream to the forty-first degree of north latitude, and thence east on that parallel to Hudson River.³ This line ran a little south of Morristown, so that the township of Elizabeth Town in 1693 included a portion of Morris County, as well as the whole of Union and a part of Somerset. It never included any of Hunterdon, Warren, or Sussex Counties. In Somerset County it embraced the present townships of North Plainfield, Warren, Bernard, and part of Bridgewater.

Resurvey and Allotment of the Township.—About six years after the township was laid out, as above described, it was resurveyed and portions of it allotted which had not been previously assigned to actual settlers. The new generation and the newcomers were eager for more land. It was determined, therefore, in town-meeting in the autumn of 1699 to proceed to an orderly distribution of the back country lands and the remaining meadows on the Town

Creek among the Associates, now one hundred and twenty in number. For this purpose John Harriman, Jr., the eldest son of the minister, was chosen surveyor, and Messrs. Jonathan Ogden, Benjamin Lyon, John Clarke, Samuel Carter, and Cornelius Hatfield his assistants, "to Lay out, Divide, and Equally assise all the Lands and meadows within the whole Bounds and purchase of Elizabeth Town, to every one Interested therein by Right of purchase under the honourable General Richard Nicholls, their Several and Respective parts and shares of the whole."⁴

They entered upon their work Dec. 26, 1699, and completed it March 5, 1700. The ground surveyed was watered by the Rahway River in its southerly course, and extended from the Newark line on the north to the Woodbridge line on the south, reaching to the foot of "the mountain" on the west. It included a considerable part of the present towns of Union, Westfield, and Plainfield, and part of the town of Rahway. It comprised about seventeen thousand acres, and was divided into one hundred and seventy-one one-hundred-acre lots, mostly forty by twenty-six chains, the general direction of the length being from east to west, and of the breadth from north to south. The first lot, assigned to Isaac Whitehead, Sr., deceased, bordered on "the North-west line between Elizabeth Town and Newark;" the 107th, 111th, 112th, and 119th bordered south on the Woodbridge line, the intervening lots, in the order of their enumeration, filling up the interval, and the remaining lots lying to the west of the others. The settlement of Connecticut Farms and Westfield dates from this allotment, the staple of the population of these townships being the descendants of the old planters among whom these lands were apportioned.

"At a meeting of the freeholders of Elizabeth Town, October 20, Anno 1699, the following conclusions were made (viz):

"By a unanimous vote of the freeholders aforesaid, it was and is agreed and concluded, that if any have been at Charges in the Clearing and Fencing of Land which no Particular Purchases in the whole of this Township Can Justly Claim a Mile or more out of the Town Plott, shall have so much then where he has so Fenced and Cleared as is sufficient to make a plantation; Provided always, that the Possessor or Settler of all such Lands have a Real Right in the whole of this Township by Purchase, and also that such have not taken up more than there proportion of the whole, or if clearer shall have a sufficient field."⁵

A portion of the common township lands lying in Somerset County were disposed of by vote of a town-meeting held July 1, 1734, described as follows:

"All that Tract of Land or any part or parcel thereof; Beginning at Cedar Brook where Essex Line crosses the said Brook, and from thence Running west six miles, and from thence the nearest Course to the mountain, and from thence as the said mountain runs to the hundred acres Lots formerly surveyed according to the Town order and agreement, and from thence to the first mentioned place to the said Cedar Brook."

"(Also), To dispose of what money shall arise from the sale of the said Lands, or any part thereof, for the General Interest of the said Associates and freeholders. In defending them or any of them in the possession of their property, or in dispossessing any that shall unjustly intrude upon any part of the aforesaid purchase and Grant."⁶

This tract was wholly in Somerset County, including a considerable part of the township of Warren, with a small part of Bridgewater. Previous to this time seven trustees had been appointed by the town to superintend the disposal of public lands, and we find that at a town-meeting held Sept. 16, 1735, these trustees were empowered to dispose of town lands at Basking Ridge and that vicinity, described as

"A certain Tract or Parcel of Land Lying west from a place known by the name of Basking Ridge and between the West Jersey line not to exceed Eight Miles upon the East and west line and to Extend to our utmost bounds upon the North and south Lines Provided always That the said Tract of Land be not convey'd and sold for Less than two Thousand Pounds Current Money of New Jersey and so in Proportion for a Lesser Quantity of said Land and it is further agreed and Concluded That we the said Associates and freeholders Do Reserve one Third part of said Tract of Land to ourselves if Required by said freeholders and then and In such case to Deduct one Third part of said Two Thousand Pounds all which money is to be Improv'd for the General Good of said freeholders.¹

This tract, remote as it was from the locality of the original settlement, was clearly included in the township of Elizabeth Town as defined by the act of 1693, and as clearly in the land conveyed by the Indian purchase and the Nicolls patent. No wonder that the proprietors, astonished by the vigorous action of the Associates, should speak of "the Lines of their vast Pretensions," nor that James Alexander, the surveyor-general, should write, Oct. 1, 1733, to Col. John Hamilton, of Amboy, advising him "to call a meeting of the Proprietors of East Jersey to devise measures to stop the proceedings of the Elizabeth Town people in extending their bounds and granting lands."²

A large body of land in the township yet remained unappropriated, lying to the west of the surveys and allotments of 1700, including what are familiarly known as the First and Second Mountains as far as the Newark line on the north, with the intervening valley drained by Blue Brook, the eastern branch of Cedar Brook, on either side of which the village of Feltville has since grown up, and the whole region watered by the Passaic River above Chatham, embracing the whole of the present township of New Providence, Union County, and the southern parts of Chatham and Morris townships, Morris County. Portions of the tract were exceedingly rugged, and others low and swampy; but other portions, of large extent, were quite good, productive lands. Immigration had already found its way thither, in search of fruitful soil, healthful residences, and valuable mill-sites.

Allotments of 1736.—It was, therefore, deemed best to repeat the measure of 1699, and make a further distribution of the landed domain of the town. A new generation, the grandchildren of the old planters, had come to years, and needed room to plant and build for themselves. A town-meeting was held accordingly Nov. 8, 1736, and measures were taken to effect the desired object. Joseph Morse (the son of Joseph, and the grandson of Peter Morse, both deceased) was chosen and duly qualified as the town surveyor; and John Megie was chosen, Nov. 14, 1737, one of the seven men, in place of Samuel Miller, whose growing infirmities of body unfitted him for service.³

The work confided to the seven men and the surveyor was duly and faithfully performed. The first forty-three lots were surveyed Dec. 27-29, 1736; Lots 44-164, Nov. 22 to Dec. 3, 1737; the additional survey, 1-109, Jan. 17 to Feb. 22, 1738; and Corson's survey of seven lots, Jan. 6, 1737. The whole of this large territory—the back country of the town—was regularly laid out, and divided into two hundred and eighty one-hundred-acre lots, of all which due report was made at a town-meeting held March 28, 1738, for the distribution by lot of the respective shares to which each of the Associates, by their heirs and assigns, was entitled. The mode of allotment was determined by the following vote:

"All such persons as shall have a first, second or third Lot Right within the said Elizabeth Town purchase and in the first Division of the Lands to the Northward of the South mountain (Now to be drawn for) and have Disposed of or Conveyed any such Right or Rights to any person or persons whatsoever that he or they to whom said Disposal or Conveyance of said first, second or third Lot Right has first been made or Conveyed as aforesaid may and shall by virtue of this vote (as aforesaid) first made and conveyed) have the first Draught of the allotment of the Lands Now to be Drawn for in the Division of the said Lands and those that have the second Conveyance shall have the second Lot and so on as aforesaid."⁴

Joseph Williams having died, and Jeremiah Crane by reason of age having become infirm, Messrs. Jonathan Dayton and John Ogden were chosen, March 13, 1739, committeemen in their place.

The new allotments gave occasion for renewed litigation with the proprietors and their assigns. Daniel Cooper held a proprietary claim to a portion of the lands thus surveyed and allotted. An action of trespass was therefore brought in his name "against Joseph Moss, John Crane, John Dennon, John Scudder, John Terril, Samuel Norris, Sr., and Samuel Norris, Jr., the then Committee or Managers for the said Clinker Lot Right men." So they were styled in the bill, but erroneously, as only one of the number, John Crane, belonged to the committee. The cause came on for a hearing in the May term of the Supreme Court, 1738, and the defendants pleading "not guilty" it was deferred for proof.⁵

James Logan, also about the same time holding by a proprietary claim, brought sundry actions of trespass and ejectment against a number of his tenants in the western part of the Elizabeth Town purchase, who had also bought or taken leases of the town committee. Similar actions were brought in the August term of 1738 against Benjamin Manning and Wright Skinner, in the name of Daniel Axtell, deceased. In respect to one of these actions, the following record was made in the Town Book of the proceedings of a town-meeting held June 18, 1739:

"Agreed and Concluded, that Mr John Blanchard Mr Eduard Sale Mr Jonathan allen Mr william miller and Mr thomas Clark are to collect money of the Inhabitants of the purchase of Elizabeth town for Defraying the Charges in running out the said purchase By a Jury of Raviene In an action Depending Between James Logan plaintiff and Joseph manning Defendant and a rule of Court made for y^e same. (Also), Mr John Crain and Mr Jonathan Dayton are Impowered to Receive the money collected By Mr John Blanchard Mr Eduard Sale Mr Jonathan allen Mr william miller or thomas Clark and Dispose of the same in Defraying the Charges of Rubing out the s^d purchase to the Jury of Raviene or any other Charges which they the s^d Mr. John Crain or Mr. Jonathan Dayton shall think necessary in that affair."

As Logan's claim was in the extreme west of the purchase, and it was doubtful whether it was included therein, the court had ordered the question of fact to be determined by a jury of review.

At the same town-meeting the question of the Newark boundary line came up again for consideration, and it was agreed "That Justice Andrew Joline and Mr. John Blanchard and Mr. Daniel Potter are Impowered by the Associates and Freeholders above said to agree with the people of Newark to settle and ascertain a Division Line between the Town of Newark and Elizabethtown, and to take such measures and means as to them, the s^d Justice Andrew Joline, Mr. John Blanchard, Mr. Daniel Potter, shall seem proper, in order to obtain the said Division Line to be Established, and to have Reasonable Satisfaction for their services in that affair."

The Newark people appointed, Oct. 24, 1739, Jonathan Crane, Esq., Col. Josiah Ogden, and Samuel Farrand, Esq., "a committee to treat with the people of Elizabeth Town about settling a Line between the two Towns."¹ The line appears not to have been settled at that time, as it was still an open question fifteen years later.

We have thus traced the principal allotments of land in the old township of Elizabethtown, from which it appears that the colony of the original Associates was the mother colony, from which went out most of the first settlers into the townships, which were parceled off to the children and grandchildren of the original patentees as parts of the family patrimony. It was a princely inheritance, but it cost them a vast deal of time, expense, and perplexity to determine its exact bounds and to defend it against all trespassers.²

Organization and Civil Officers.—The township was not fully organized until 1693. Such a government, however, as the original colony required for its local purposes, in addition to the government of the province itself, was established among the first planters in 1665. The infant plantation of Elizabethtown was not only the seat of the first general English government in East Jersey, but also of the first English government in the province. It was the capital of the province and port of entry for twenty-one years, having the government-house and custom-house, the resident Governor and principal provincial officers, and the highest courts of judicature.

As has been seen elsewhere, Governor Philip Carteret arrived at Elizabethtown and assumed the government of the province in August, 1665. John Ogden was commissioned justice of the peace Oct. 26, 1665. Feb. 12, 1666, Capt. Thomas Young was appointed one of the Governor's Council. Luke Watson was made constable, an office which at that time answered in the place of a sheriff, there being no general district or county requiring the services of the latter officer.

The town records prior to 1719 having been lost or secretly disposed of, the record of officers for the early years is somewhat meagre.

Aug. 24, 1668, Luke Watson was commissioned lieutenant and commander of a military company then organized, and John Woodruff ensign.

Robert Vauquellin and William Pardon were the first judges appointed, associated with Capt. William Sandford and Robert Treat in a special court convened in May, 1671.

In 1668, Robert Bond, Robert Vauquellin, and William Pardon were members of the Council; John Ogden, Sr., and John Bracket, representatives in the House of Burgesses; James Bollen, secretary.

From 1682 to 1857 the territory we are considering was in the county of Essex.

Isaac Whitehead was appointed, Sept. 16, 1692, high sheriff of the county of Essex; Isaac Whitehead and Benjamin Price, Jr., October 10th, justices of the peace for Elizabeth Town; Henry Norris and John Lyon, November 2d, deputies to the Assembly; George Jewell, December 3d, county clerk; Isaac Whitehead, Benjamin Price, Jr., and John Lyon, Jr., January 29th, judges of small causes; and, February 21st, Isaac Whitehead, lieutenant, and Daniel Price, ensign of the Elizabeth Town company of foot. Isaac Whitehead was also appointed, Nov. 4, 1693, captain of the foot company, Daniel Price being appointed at the same time lieutenant, and John Lyon ensign. Richard Townley also had been appointed, March 7, 1692, a member of Governor Fletcher's Council of the province of New York. Mrs. Townley had a large estate on Long Island. James Emmet received the appointment in 1683 of chief ranger, an officer chosen by the county to look after the strays.

Rev. John Harriman and Jonas Wood were appointed, Nov. 3, 1693, deputies, and again in 1694. Benjamin Ogden received, Oct. 10, 1694, the appointment of sheriff; Ephraim Price, Jan. 15, 1695, ensign; and John Woodruff, January 29th, judge of small causes.

Daniel Price was appointed, May 3, 1697, captain of the train-bands; William Brown and Ephraim Price, lieutenants; and Richard Baker and Samuel Oliver, ensigns. John Woodruff (son of the old planter) received, May 30th, the appointment of high sheriff of Essex County; John Harriman (Rev.) and Andrew Hampton, Dec. 1, 1698, were chosen deputies; Robert Smith (the first of the name in the town) became, Dec. 26, 1699, high sheriff; and Feb. 15, 1699-1700, George Jewell, county clerk.

In 1707 the town chose Capt. Daniel Price as member of Assembly; 1708-9, Benjamin Lyon; 1710, Joseph Marsh.

In 1710, Col. Richard Townley, Benjamin Price, Jr., Daniel Price, and Jonas Wood, were justices of the peace; John Hains, constable; and Samuel Melyen and Thomas Price were overseers of the highways for this town. Andrew Hampton and Richard Baker were on the committee for regulating the highways of the county. In 1711, Isaac Whitehead, Benjamin Price, Benjamin Lyon, John Woodruff, and John Blanchard were justices; John Hains and Benjamin Meeker were constables; and Benjamin Ogden, Jr., and Samuel Ogden were overseers of the highways. In 1712 the justices were the same; James Seeres and Samuel Ogden were constables; and Samuel Winans and John Scudder were overseers of the highways. In 1713, constables, Ebenezer Lyon and William Clarke; overseers of the highways, John Craine and Joseph Kelsey. In 1714, constables, John Thomson and Benjamin Spinning; overseers, Daniel Gale and Robert Little; assessors, Capt. Price and John Harriman. In 1715 and 1716, constables, Richard Harriman and Elijah Davis; overseers, James Hains, Jr., and Jacob Mitchell. In 1717, constables, Benjamin Bond, Nathaniel Whitehead, and William Strayhearn; overseers, Joseph Bond, John Lambert, Jeremiah Peek, and Benjamin Parkhurst; on the county committee of highways, Benjamin Lyon and Samuel Potter. In 1718, constables, John Gould, Nathaniel Whitehead, and William Strayhearn; overseers of the highways, Edward Frazey, Benjamin Spinning, Robert Wade, and Daniel Woodruff; surveyors of the highways, Capt. Daniel Price and James Sayre. In 1719, constables, William Strayhearn, Samuel Oliver, Jr., and Thomas Currey; overseers, David Morehouse, Samuel Oliver, Jr., and Joseph Marsh, Jr. In 1716 and 1721, Joseph Bonnel was chosen to the Legislature.¹

These appointments, embracing a period of about ten years, may serve to show who they were of the second generation that were chosen to office, and were looked upon as men of activity and influence by their townsmen. In almost every instance they were the sons or grandsons of the old planters, whose names are still represented in the town.

In 1740 the town committee consisted of John Crane, Jonathan Dayton, John Magie, Thomas Clarke, Andrew Joline, Joseph Mann, and Andrew

Craig. Robert Ogden (the second son of the name), a young lawyer twenty-four years old, was chosen, Oct. 2, 1740, town clerk. June 4, 1741, John Ogden was justice, and John Halsted and John Stiles freeholders. The same in 1742. William Chetwood sheriff of the county.

The town committee in 1750 for conducting the defense of the bill in chancery were John Crane, Andrew Craig, William Miller, John Halsted, Stephen Crane, Thomas Clarke, and John Chandler.

Subdivisions of the Township.—For a period of one hundred and twenty-eight years from the date of the original settlement the township remained undivided, the town laws and regulations and the authority of its magistracy extending over the whole area. At an early date, however, various hamlets and clusters of farm-houses gradually sprung up in different localities. The facilities for navigation and the attractions of water privileges drew quite a number of the early settlers to the banks of the Rahway River. Another group of planters, mostly of one family, gave name to the neighborhood called "Lyon's Farms." Still another, locating a few miles to the west, gave name to "Wade's Farms," better known as "Connecticut Farms." Soon after, a little to the north of west, just under the mountain, a few neighbors called their settlement by the name of "Springfield." Seven miles to the west of the town proper "Westfield" began to attract settlers quite early in the eighteenth century. Two or three miles still west of this settlement were the "Scotch Plains," where a large part of the Scotch immigration of 1684-86 found a pleasant home on the eastern side of the Green Brook; while at a later period, on the same side of the brook, two or three miles lower down, a few scattered habitations served as the nucleus of "Plainfield," sixteen miles from the town proper, and yet within the township. Four or five miles over the mountains to the northwest of Westfield, and nearly as far to the east of Springfield, the beautiful valley of the Upper Passaic very early drew from the other parts of the town a considerable number of hardy pioneers, to whose settlement was originally given the name of "Turkey," afterwards changed to "New Providence."

In the administration of the township laws the several parts or neighborhoods were denominated "wards," as the Rahway Ward, the Westfield, the Springfield, the Farms Ward, etc., the latter referring to Connecticut Farms. In the selection of civil officers for the town—aldermen, councilmen, town committee, constables, overseers of the poor, surveyors and overseers of highways, assessors, collectors, pound-keepers, as well as sheriff, coroner, marshal, or mayor of the borough—due regard was had to the claims of these several wards.

As the population increased, and churches and school-houses were built, these respective settlements began to feel the inconvenience of living so remote from the central authority, the seat of government in the town proper, and of being compelled to travel so far to the town-meetings. Hence, one after another, they began to agitate the question of subdivision of the township, so as to give to each of these localities a township of its own. Thus originated the townships, one after another, taking their legal places at the following dates: Springfield, 1793; New Providence, 1794 (organized independently in 1809); Westfield, 1794; Rahway, 1804; Union, 1808; Plainfield, 1847. The remaining townships were subdivisions of these at later dates. We shall do no more than mention them here, as their separate histories will be found in another department of this volume.

Name of the Town.—The name of the town had evidently not been determined at the date of Baily's deed (Sept. 8, 1665), or it would have been mentioned in that document. It is, therefore, quite probable that in this case tradition reports truly when it affirms that the town took its name from the Lady Elizabeth, wife of Sir George Carteret. Of this lady Samuel Pepys, one of her familiar friends, bears this testimony during the following year, Oct. 15, 1666: "She cries out at the vices of the Court, and how they are going to set up plays already. She do much cry out upon these things, and that which she believes will undo the whole nation." It is well to know something of her from whom is derived the honored name of ELIZABETH TOWN.¹

CHAPTER XXVI.

BOROUGH OF ELIZABETH.

It was doubtless the difficulties experienced in conducting the extensive and intricate affairs of public business in town-meeting, and the doubtfulness of the authority claimed in some instances by the committeemen, that led the principal men of the town to seek a CHARTER OF INCORPORATION, by means of which they could more promptly and thoroughly transact the public business. The time was opportune. New Jersey, after having been for thirty-five years an appendage of the province of New York, under a succession of Royal Governors residing in the city of New York, had at length, after repeated remonstrances and entreaties, obtained a position independent of the other provinces, with one of her own citizens, Lewis Morris, as Governor. His long familiarity with the territory and with the people as a private citizen and in public office had made him acquainted with the towns and their need. Joseph Bonnel, a man of commanding influence at home, had represented the town in Governor Morris' first Legislature (1738-39), of which he had been chosen Speaker, from which position he had been transferred by the Governor to the bench of the Supreme Court, having been appointed, May, 1739, second judge, Robert Hunter Morris being chief justice.²

A petition, therefore, was prepared and circulated praying Governor Morris to procure from his Majesty the King a charter of incorporation for the town as a free town or borough. It was extensively signed, the first names being in order as follows: "Joseph Bonnel, Andrew Joline, Thomas Price, John Ross, John Blanchard, John Crane, Thomas Clark, Matthias Hetfield, Noadiah Potter, John Halstead, Nathaniel Bonnel, Samuel Woodruff, Samuel Marsh, Jonathan Hampton, William Chetwood, Edward Thomas, and Cornelius Hetfield." These were the leading men of the town, representing both of the parties into which it was divided, and both of the religious denominations. As Judge Bonnel's name leads the petition, it is quite likely that he himself had prepared it and presented it.

The petition was favorably received and a charter granted by his Majesty George II., bearing date Feb. 8, 1740. It constituted the Passaic River, from the mouth of Dead River to the Minisink Crossing,³ the western boundary of the borough. The territory was nearly coterminous with the present Union County. On the southwest, however, it included nearly the whole of the town of Warren in Somerset County. It was to be known "by the name of the Free Borough and town of Elizabeth." It appointed Joseph Bonnell, Esq., "Mayor and Clark of the Market," and coroner also; John Blanchard, Esq., recorder; "Andrew Joline, Matthias Hatfield, Thomas Price, John Ross, John Crane, & Thomas Clark Esq^{rs}," aldermen; "Noadiah Potter, John Halstead, Nathaniel Bonnel, Samuel Woodruff, Samuel Marsh & Jonathan Hampton Gent.," "Assistants and Common Council," "William Chetwood Esq^r," sheriff; Jonathan Dayton, chamberlain; Thomas Hill, marshal; "John Radley, George Ross, Junior, Daniel Marsh & John Scudder, assessors; Robert Ogden, John Odle, John Terrill & William Clark, collectors; James Townley, high constable; and Robert Little, Nathaniel Price, Richard Harriman, John Looker, John Craige, Daniel Dunham to be petit Constables; Henry Garthwait, Cornelius Hetfield, John Radley Sen^r, John Allen, Ephraim Marsh & Daniel Day," "Overseers for the Poor;" and "Michael Kearney, Esq^r," common clerk.

It accorded to the mayor, aldermen, and Common Council all the rights, immunities, and privileges usually granted to bodies corporate, as will be seen by reference to the exceedingly voluminous document itself.⁴

from 1734 to 1738, and justice as early as 1735. His death occurred not later than 1742. William Chetwood had been sheriff of the county as early as 1735, succeeding Benjamin Bonnell. Joseph Bonnell, Thomas Price, and Matthias Hatfield had been justices.

The town had from the first been the leading town in East Jersey. In 1734 the rates for Essex County were as follows: For Elizabeth Town, £56 0 0; for Newark, £44 14 0; for Acquackanong, £14 7 3. Agreeably to the action of the town, June 18, 1739, the line was drawn separating Essex County from Middlesex and Somerset Counties, for which the following charges were paid:

During the first sixty years of the settlement the newspaper was unknown. Posters and verbal traditions were institutions in those days. The meeting-house door was the principal bill-board where advertisements were posted, so as to be read by the people who gathered there on Sunday, which occasion was also the chief one for the diffusion of intelligence and gossip, whether of domestic and local occurrences or of provincial and foreign events. The Boston News-Letter, a half-sheet paper (twelve by eight inches), started April 24, 1704, the Boston Gazette, commenced in 1719, and the New England Courant (issued at Boston Aug. 17, 1721) may, one or all of them, have scattered a stray sheet in this community now and then, but of that there is no evidence. So far as known the New York Gazette, the first weekly paper ever published in that city, was the first to make an appearance in Elizabeth Town. It was issued by William Bradford, Oct. 16, 1725; a small affair, to be sure, at first, but the herald of a new era to the city and all the country round about. This humble periodical brought the people of New York and the neighboring places into familiar and accurate acquaintance with passing occurrences of the greatest interest, and was made also the vehicle of communicating one with another. The advertisements were few and brief, and the news items exceedingly meagre. But occasionally a paragraph appears shedding light on the social and commercial interests and history of the town. Some of the items in this old paper are as follows:

"Run away from Solomon Bates of Elizabeth Town, a Negroe Man, called Chune, aged about 27 years old, has got with him a Homespun Coat of Linen and Wool, with Brass Buttons, an Ozenbrigg Vest with black Buttons and Button holes, and an old striped Vest, Leather Breeches, new Homespun Wadded Stockings, black Shoes with Buckles; he has a Hat and Cap, and he can play upon the Fiddle, and speaks English and Dutch. Whoever can take up the said Negro, and bring him to his said Master, or secure him and give Notice, so that his Master can have him again, shall have reasonable Satisfaction, besides all reasonable Charges."¹

Mr. Bates' name first occurs Nov. 9, 1714, in the old "Record of Ear Marks for Elizabeth Town;" but he seems to have had no connection with the Associates. His name occurs also in "the Morristown Bill of Mortality," p. 13, as having died of old age (100), November, 1771. His widow died also of old age, March 18, 1787, ninety-seven years old. They must have removed to Morristown at an early day. Claus, or Nicholas, formerly belonged to Daniel Badgley. He was arrested and restored to his master. But he had a persistent propensity to have his own way, and less than two years afterwards Mr. Bates complains that he had taken himself away again, and this time,

"He has taken with him a grey Honespun Drunged Coat trim'd with Black, a white linnen Vest trim'd with black, and a homespun Kearsay Vest, a Pair of Leather Breeches, with red Puffs and Shoes and Stockings."²

"Mr. Benjamin Price, Attorney at Law in New York," has for sale a house and lot in New Brunswick. Mr. Price was a grandson of one of the Associates and bore his name.³

The public are informed that

"there is good Entertainment for Men and Horsea to be Let at all Times by William Donaldson at the Rose and Crown in Elizabeth Town, New Jersey."⁴

"The House, Stable and Garden of Benjamin Hill in Elizabeth-Town in New Jersey, is to be Let from year to year, or for a term of years. It is a very convenient place for a Trades-man or a Shop-keeper."⁵

"At the Sign of the Ship in Elizabeth-Town lives Benjamin Hill, who keeps Horses to Let, and where all Travellers and others may be accommodated with good Entertainment for Man and Horse at all Times in the White House which Mr. Schuyler bought of Mr. Townley."⁶

This was the house built by Governor Carteret shortly before his death, of which Col. Townley became possessed by marrying the Governor's widow.

"On Wednesday the 23 of April next at the Paper Mill in Elizabeth-Town, there will be Sold at Public Vendue to the highest Bidder, all sorts of Household Goods, Cattle, Horses, Hugs, Cart, Plows, Harrows, with Iron Teeth, and other Utensils: The Plantation adjoining to the said Mill will also be sold, which contains about Ninety Acres, &c."⁷

It was at this mill that the paper was made on which the Gazette was printed. It is not known by whom the mill was built, but in 1728 it was purchased by William Bradford, of New York, who in 1730-31 was a resident of the town. His son Andrew was at the same period printing the American Weekly Mercury. The father and son had quite a monopoly of government printing, and needed a mill independent of the foreign manufacturers. This was the first paper-mill in New Jersey.⁸

"To be Sold at Publick Vendue, on Tuesday the 26th of August instant, at Elizabeth-Town in New Jersey, a Grist Mill and fulling Mill, also a Lot of Ground, adjoining to the Dwelling House of Edward Thomas, in the said Town, very convenient for a dwelling house and Garden, and near the said Mill, as also sundry Household Good. All which were lately belonging to Wm Williamson late of said Town, deceased, and power of selling the same given by his last Will to Margaret Williamson his Widow Now living at Elizabeth Town aforesaid."¹

This was the old mill that was still standing until within a few years at the stone bridge in Broad Street, originally constructed by the pioneer John Ogden, the last vestiges of which have now disappeared before the march of modern improvement.

"In the Month of December last an Apprentice Lad named Abraham Hendricks ran away from his Master John Ross of Elizabeth Town New Jersey; said Lad is about Years of Age, was of small Stature, had a brown great Coat and a Linsey Wosley under a Beaver Hat half worn having light colored hair and took a set of Shoemakers Tools along with him, being a Shoemaker by Trade." (A reward of 30s. and charges of-fered.)

Mr. Ross was named in the borough charter one of the aldermen of the corporation, and became, in 1748, mayor of the borough. Hendricks was probably the brother of Isaac, and the son of John Hendricks, who came here as early as May, 1721, from Piscataway, where Daniel and Jabez Hendricks, brothers, and Leonard Hendricks were numbered among the original settlers. Abraham returned, and his name is found among a large number of citizens attached to a memorial forwarded in 1743 to the king, George II.

We have an account also that two boys, the sons of Matthias Hatfield, of Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey, being in the woods hunted a rabbit into a hollow tree, and in order to get it cut down the tree, which fell upon the younger brother and killed him dead on the spot.

Mr. Hatfield was one of the magistrates of the town, became sheriff and alderman, and by his daughter Phebe, wife of Robert Ogden, Esq., was the grandfather of Gen. Matthias and Governor Aaron Ogden, and an ancestor of Governor Daniel Haines.

Improvement of Streets.—But little attention was given to the improvement of the streets till about 1810. Overseers of highways had been appointed by the town from a very early day, roads had been laid out, bridges built, and roadways kept in a passable condition. But in the town plot no statute regulations had been made for footpaths, sidewalks, and similar conveniences. A committee was at length appointed, April 24, 1810, to report an ordinance for the appointment of a street commissioner, and to regulate the laying out, paving, graveling, and keeping in repair sidewalks or footways in the principal streets of Elizabeth Town, and to prevent obstructions in the same. This was probably the first ordinance passed either for the purpose of improving the streets or constructing sidewalks, and it is safe to presume that the corporation authorities had the same difficulties to contend with in its practical operations as have been encountered by those of more modern times.

Ferries and Steamboats.—From the founding of the town intercourse by water with the city of New York had been kept up with considerable regularity, mostly from the point at the mouth of the creek. Dankers and Sluyter found there in 1679 a tavern or ferry-house, kept by a French papist. This must have been one of the men from the Isle of Jersey brought over by Governor Carteret. Frequent reference is made in various documents to this ancient ferry. Several of the planters and of their descendants had also boats running from various landings on the Sound and the creek to Staten Island and New York. Constant intercourse was thus maintained with the great emporium of trade until and after the Revolutionary war.

The boats employed in this traffic were propelled, as a matter of course, by sails and oars. The barge, the yawl, the scow, the skiff, the yacht, the sloop, the schooner, the pettianger (petiagna) were all employed. After the Revolution, in 1790, the ferry came into possession of Edward Thomas, and was known by the name of Thomas' Ferry.

Casualties were not of infrequent occurrence. One of the East Town ferry-boats upset near Bergen Point on Saturday, Nov. 10, 1798, and Benjamin Bonnell, James Carter and wife, of Chatham; David P. Tuttle, of Morris County; the wife of Daniel Moore, of Rahway; the wife of Ezekiel Smith, of Scotch Plains; Mrs. Abigail Maxwell and child, of New York; and Mr. Hedges, of Turkey, were drowned.²

In August, 1807, Livingston and Fulton succeeded in their experiment of steam navigation, and the "Clermont" became a regular packet between New York and Albany, her name being changed when enlarged the next year to the "North River." An exclusive right to navigate the waters of New York by steam had been obtained by Chancellor Livingston and Robert Fulton, by act of the New York Legislature, Appendix 5, 1803, and extended, Appendix 11, 1808. The right to run a steam packet from New York to New Brunswick, N. J., was in 1808 conveyed to John R. and Robert J. Livingston, who thereupon built the steamer "Raritan," one hundred and thirty by twenty feet, and put her on the route.

The ferry at the Old Point had some years before passed into the hands of Col. Aaron Ogden. The owners of the "Raritan" agreed with Col. Ogden for the privilege of receiving and landing passengers at Elizabethtown Point, to give him for every passenger what he would have received as profit in his own boats. The "Raritan" thus became the first boat that connected Elizabethtown with New York by steam.

Not content, however, with this arrangement, Col. Ogden early in 1811 contracted with Cornelius Jerolaman, of North Belleville, N. J., to construct a vessel of fourteen feet beam and seventy-five feet keel, and with Daniel Dod, of Mendham (who in consequence removed to this town), to furnish the boat with a steam-engine of twelve horse-power. This boat was called the "Sea-Horse." Before, however, it was completed (April 9, 1811) an act had been passed by the New York Legislature by which it was put in the power of the Livingstons to seize any steamboat that should be found infringing on their monopoly. An act had also been passed by the Legislature of New Jersey for the protection of steamboats owned and navigated by citizens of the State. For the more effectual enforcement of this act, and to counteract the New York law of 1811, another act was passed by the Legislature of New Jersey, Feb. 12, 1813.

Ogden had designed running his boat to New York, where he had obtained the lease of a wharf, where his sailing-boats were moored. In order, however, to avoid the seizure of his steamboat he determined to run her to Jersey City. It was publicly announced May 18, 1813, that "An elegant STEAM BOAT has also been provided to run between Elizabeth Town Point and Paulus Hook. Fare 4s. At 9 A.M. and 2 P.M. from the Point, and at 11.30 A.M. and 4.30 P.M. from Paulus Hook." The fare was reduced June 22d to 3s. 6d. The boat was taken off November 23d and laid up for winter. The next summer, June 21, 1814, it was announced that "The steamboat 'Sea-Horse' will run to Jersey City, and meet at Bedloe's Island the steamboat 'Substitution.'" In the mean time the Legislature of New Jersey had granted, by an act passed Nov. 3, 1813, to "Aaron Ogden and Daniel Dod, and the survivors and their assigns, an exclusive right to navigate steamboats in the waters of this State."

The Livingstons, thus excluded from the waters of New Jersey, and in danger of losing the "Raritan," which had cost them twenty-six thousand dollars, presented a memorial and petition to the Legislature of New Jersey, October, 1814, giving their representation of the case, and asking to be heard by counsel. Ogden and Dod presented a counter memorial, also asking to be heard. Leave was accordingly granted, and the exclusive attention of the Legislature was given to the case, Jan. 24-29, 1815. Thomas Addis Emmett appeared as counsel for the Livingstons; Ogden appeared in his own behalf, assisted by Mr. Hopkinson, of Philadelphia, and Samuel L. Southard, of New Jersey. In consequence the act granting to Ogden and Dod a monopoly of steam navigation in New Jersey was repealed.

The Old Point Ferry property was now owned conjointly by Ogden and Thomas Gibbons. The latter was a wealthy planter of Savannah, Ga., who had a handsome country-seat in town on the Philadelphia turnpike road. Here he spent his summers and autumns. Ogden had leased of Gibbons his interest in the Point property for a term of years, which had nearly expired. Gibbons refused to renew the lease, but proposed to run the ferry in partnership. They differed about the terms. Gibbons determined to start an opposition line. He fitted up another landing at the mouth of the creek, procured the steamers "Stowdinger" and "Bellona," and established a new ferry. Of the latter boat the well-known millionaire, Cornelius Vanderbilt, was captain, and it is thought that this was the beginning of his great fortune.

Governor Ogden thereupon (May 5, 1815) purchased of the Livingstons for a period of ten years the exclusive right of steam navigation between the Point and New York, and so became himself a monopolist. The "Sea-Horse" was announced April 3, 1815, to run directly to New York. Governor Ogden, who in March, 1817, had put the new steamer "Atlanta" on the route, obtained from the Chancellor of New York an injunction against Gibbons. A motion to dissolve the injunction was denied. An appeal was taken to the Court of Errors, but was not sustained. Gibbons then carried the case to the Supreme Court of the United States, when, at the February term of 1824, the acts of the New York Legislature granting a monopoly of steam navigation in the waters of the said State were declared to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore null and void. The injunction was dissolved, and steam navigation opened to the competition of all the world, an event of untold and incalculable importance to the commerce and prosperity of the United States. The town whose rival citizens were thus bringing to a final issue a question of such momentous consequence was greatly interested in the contest, siding with the one or the other as interest or conviction determined, and thus forming themselves into opposing parties throughout the contest.

Daniel Dod, the partner of Governor Ogden, after his removal to this town became celebrated for the manufacture of machinery, especially for steamers. He furnished engines for boats at Kingston, Can., Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., Philadelphia, Norfolk, Va., Mobile, and New Orleans; also for the "Savannah," the first steamer that crossed the ocean to England. "He was, moreover, a sort of universal genius, was a profound and accurate theologian, wrote poetry, and could scarcely turn his hand to anything in which he was not quickly at home." Governor Ogden failed, involving him and others in the financial ruin, and compelling Mr. Dod's removal to New York in 1820. He was killed by the bursting of the boiler of the "Patent," on the East River, N. Y., May 9, 1823. His son, the Rev. Albert Baldwin Dod, D.D., was Professor of Mathematics in the College of New Jersey.¹

Court-House of the Borough.—The first court-house of the borough of Elizabeth was burned by the British, together with the Presbyterian Church edifice, in 1780. The next court-house was erected in 1797, and had been occupied only about eleven years when it was reduced to ashes, April 2, 1808, and a poor lunatic, Andrew Ross, perished in the flames. Moses Austin, high constable of the town, had been the occupant and keeper of the house for many years. Measures were immediately taken by the corporation for its reconstruction. Aldermen Thaddeus Mills and Richardson Gray, with the recorder, Andrew Wilson, were appointed a building committee, and means taken to obtain the needed funds. A year passed and the work was not done. Capt. William Dayton was substituted on the committee for Mr. Wilson. It was not until the winter of 1810-11 that the building was in a condition to be occupied. This building continued to be used for the town courts until after the formation of the county of Union in 1857, when it was enlarged and reconstructed into the present commodious county court-house.

GOVERNOR JONATHAN BELCHER resided in the borough of Elizabeth from November, 1751, until his death, Aug. 31, 1757. He had previously, from the time of his appointment as Governor of New Jersey, resided in Burlington, where the Legislature also convened. Finding the air of that place did not agree with him, he removed to Elizabeth Town, where his official business and correspondence were carried on ever after.

Governor Belcher was the son of Andrew Belcher, a Boston merchant of great wealth, and was born at Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 8, 1682. He graduated at Harvard College in 1699. He was Governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire from 1730 to 1741, having twice previously visited England, where he was "held in great respect by the best society." He went abroad again in 1744, and returned with a commission as Governor of New Jersey, arriving in New York Aug. 8, 1747. He entered upon the duties of his office at Burlington on the 20th of August, where he resided, first with Richard Smith, the Quaker, and then in his own house, continuing to remain there till 1751.

He was induced to remove to Elizabeth Town on account of the better air of the latter place, though probably society had a good deal to do with the change. The meetings there and the religious and moral status of the people were a subject of complaint. The Sabbath was not strictly observed. He went to Quaker Meeting and to the Episcopal Church, and yet he was not happy. He frequently drove his coach and four twenty miles to Philadelphia to attend at the church and visit with his old friend, Rev. Gilbert Tennent, whom he had known, and who was now pastor of a Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. Whether he got tired of this, or came to the conclusion that he was as great a Sabbath-breaker as some others of whom he complained, is not certain. But he left Burlington, probably concluding that the New England society of Elizabeth Town and the church of his choice there were to be preferred to the alternative of hearing Quakers or Episcopalians, or of driving twenty miles to meeting on Sunday. That

Belcher and his associates were regarded by some of the unsympathizing citizens as highly Puritanic appears from a curious letter written by Jonathan Hampton, of Elizabeth Town, to James Alexander at New York, dated Aug. 28, 1751:

"Our Prime Minister has sent two boats to Burlington for Governor Belcher's Goods—when he comes we expect everything will be Done in our favor, but I pray the Lord may send his Ilaheus Corpus, and discharge our Borough of such a heavy Load of Honor (as our People call it) to have a Numerous Train of Bostonians whining, Praying and Cauting continually about our Streets; from such Evils (Deliver us).

"I hope I shall not be carried by Sheriff Hatfield before Governor Belcher for not answering, etc."

The "Prime Minister" referred to was Samuel Woodruff, mayor of the borough. Mr. Woodruff had sent Sheriff Hatfield to Burlington to bring the Governor's goods. On the 10th of September the Governor writes that he "wants a sloop of thirty or forty tons to complete the matter." It appears to have been sent, for he writes again in a few days, "I am engaged in putting my clothing and furniture on board of three small sloops to take them round to Elizabethtown." On the 19th he writes Mr. Woodruff that "the man with the coach and the cows and the three sloops, with what they had on board," were to leave that day. One of these sloops carried the smallpox to Elizabeth Town, and the Governor writes in October expressing his regrets and hoping that it may not spread. In one of these letters we learn that Governor Belcher would be seventy years old on the 8th of January following. He was a lover of wine, and on the 30th of May he asks Mr. Woodruff, who has a vessel going to Madeira, to "import for his use three pipes of the best Maderia wine, and a quarter cask of Malmsey."¹

It is said of Governor Belcher that while Governor of Massachusetts and New Hampshire "his style of living was elegant and splendid," and that he was "distinguished for his hospitality." His prodigality of living had reduced him to comparative penury, so that here he had not the means of supporting such profuseness, and he was also quite infirm, having been attacked with paralysis in September, 1750, from the effects of which he never recovered. Previous to this, it is said, he possessed uncommon gracefulness of person. President Edwards writes in his journal September, 1752,—

"I had considerable opportunity to converse with Governour Belcher; and was several times at his house at Elizabethtown. He labours under many of the infirmities of age, but savours much of a spirit of religion, and seems very desirous of doing all the good he can while he lives."²

Dr. Hatfield says,—

"From his first coming into the province he proved himself the staunch friend of education and religion. To the infant College of New Jersey he not only gave a new charter with enlarged privileges, but used the whole weight of his personal and official influence in behalf of its endowment and permanent establishment. After his removal to this town, at the request 'of a great number of' the members of the First Presbyterian congregation, a charter of incorporation was granted them by the Governor, Aug. 22, 1753, appointing Stephen Crane, Cornelius Hatfield, Jonathan Dayton, Isaac Woodruff, Matthias Baldwin, Moses Ogden, and Benjamin Winsans the first trustees of the congregation, with power 'to erect and repair Public Buildings for the Worship of God and the Use of the Ministry, and School-Houses & Almshouses, & Suitably to Support the Ministry & the Poor of their Church; and to do & perform other Acts of Piety & Charity,' a boon which was so long and persistently denied by the royal Governors to the First Presbyterian congregation of the City of New York.²

"Through the favor of Governor Belcher also, on application of 'divers of the Inhabitants and Freemen' of the borough and town, an act was passed, June 21, 1754, by the General Assembly at Perth Amboy, 'to enable the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen of the free Borough and Town of Elizabeth to build a Poorhouse, Workhouse, and House of Correction within the said Borough; and to make Rules, Orders, and Ordinances for the governing of the same; and to repair the Gaols of the said Borough; . . . to the Intent the Poor of the said Borough may be better employed and maintained; poor Children educated and brought up in an honest and industrious Way; as also for setting to work and punishing all Vagrants, Vagabonds, Filchers, and all idle and disorderly Persons, Servants, and Slaves within the said Borough; . . . for the Encouragement of Honesty and Industry, and suppressing of Vice and Immorality, and better Government of said Borough.'³

"During the excitement and alarm consequent on Braddock's defeat, July 9, 1755, and the consternation created by the Indian outrages on the western borders of New Jersey, Governor Belcher did all in his power to rouse the province in defense of their habitations. The Nineteenth General Assembly, on account of its growing infirmities, held their second session, Feb. 24, 1755, and their six subsequent sessions, during the next two years, in this town, giving the town peculiar prominence at the time in provincial affairs. The principal legislation of the period had respect to the arming of the militia, and making provision for their support while in active duty against the French and the savage tribes of the interior. Of the armed force sent out of the province on this service a full proportion went forth from this town.⁴

"A letter from this town, July 28, 1756, gives the following information:

"This Day was published here, by Order of his Excellency the Governor, His Majesty's Declaration of War against the French King; at which was present his Excellency the Governor, attended by the Mayor and Corporation of this Borough, together with five Companies of Foot, and two Troops of Horse, who on the Occasion fired three handsome Volleys.⁵

"Governor Belcher did not long survive these agitations. He departed this life at his home in this town on Wednesday, Aug. 31, 1757, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. As Mr. Ketteltas, the youthful minister of the congregation, had not yet been ordained, and doubtless felt incompetent for the service, President Burr was called upon to preach the Governor's funeral sermon. A vast congregation assembled in the Presbyterian Church on Lord's Day, September 4th, when Mr. Burr (just twenty days before his own decease) preached from Daniel xii. 13."⁶

Governor Belcher had been twice married: first to Mary, daughter of Lieutenant-Governor William Partridge, of New Hampshire, Jan. 4, 1706; she died prior to his visit to England in 1744, and while there he became engaged to an English lady, whom he married in Philadelphia in September, 1748. In his will, dated July 14, 1755, he mentions his wife Louisa, his son Andrew (whom he appoints his executor), his son Jonathan (chief justice of Nova Scotia), and his daughter Sarah, wife of Byfield Lyde, Esq.

Joseph Bonnel, Esq., the first mayor of the borough, died in the winter of 1748. He lived in the neighborhood of Connecticut Farms, where, in the graveyard of the Presbyterian Church, his remains are buried. A monument was erected over the grave with this inscription:

"Who knew him living must lament him dead,
Whose corpse beneath this Verdant Turf is laid,
Bonnel, in Private Life, in Public Trust,
Was Wise and Kind, was Generous and Just.
In Virtue's rigid Path unmoved he trod,
To Self Impartial, pious to his God.
Religion's Patron, and a Patriot True,
A general Good, and private blessing too.
What Bonnel was, and what his Virtues were,
The Resurrection day will best declare.

Joseph Bonnel, Esq., deceased March ye 14, 1747-8, in ye 63d year of his age."

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE CITY OF ELIZABETH.

The City Charter.—The first charter of the city of Elizabeth was granted March 13, 1855, by act of the Legislature of New Jersey. The act required its submission to the people for their ratification or rejection, which being done at a special election in April the city government went into effect on the 1st of May, 1855. By an act of the Legislature, approved March 4, 1863, the charter was revised and enlarged to its present form, conferring upon the city the highest powers, privileges, and immunities usually accorded to such municipalities.

"With this change in its government the ancient town, until then of slow but steady growth, entered upon a career of rapidly-increasing prosperity. That portion of its territory which lay beyond a northwest line running from the mouth of Morse's Creek to the Galloping Hill road, comprising two thousand eight hundred and fifty-three acres, was set off to the township of Linden in February, 1861. A small portion had also been lost on the north in the erection of Union County in 1857; so that the city now scarcely contains a tenth part of the area of the old borough in the days of the Revolution. . . . But what is lost in extent is more than made good by compactness.

"The opening of the New Jersey Railroad, and subsequently of the New Jersey Central, with its noble bridge spanning Newark Bay and connecting the city directly with New York,—an accomplishment both feared and ridiculed some sixty years since by the ¹ Mr. Baldwin was the son of Jonathan, and the grandson of John Baldwin, of Newark. His father died when he was but seven years of age. He was born in 1719, married Mary, a daughter of Alderman John Ross, of this town, and thus became a resident here. His only sister, Joanna, married Isaac Nuttman, who also removed to this town, where he died, November, 1749, leaving three children, John, Phoebe, and Sarah. His wife survived him. He died July 1, 1759, leaving his wife and several children. The late Matthias W. Baldwin, of Philadelphia, so memorable both for his wealth and unificence, was his grandson. The stone that marks the resting-place of his remains is inscribed with the following epitaph: "He was a good Neighbor; a generous Friend; an earnest promoter of the [PUBLIC GOOD;] a Kind Father, a tender Husband. [In short he was] A CHRISTIAN. [PASSENGER] Imitate him, & be for ever [HAPPY.]

Robert W. Townley

Robert W. Townley was born at Springfield, N. J., on July 13, 1813, and was the eldest son of Richard and Hannah (Wade) Townley. His father was a man of great force of character, energetic and industrious, and passed his life as a farmer near Elizabeth, where several successive generations of the family resided. The line of descent of the Townley family is traceable back to an honorable origin in the mother-country, England, as far as the days of William the Conqueror. Col. Richard Townley, the eighth son of Nicholas Townley, of Littleton, England, and of Joanna White, of Northam, Sussex Co., England, took up his abode at Elizabeth as early as 1684, where he occupied high social position, and filled many offices of trust and responsibility. In 1685 he married Elizabeth, widow of Governor Philip Carteret. He was made one of Lord Neil Campbell's Council in October, 1686, and in the Revolution of 1688-89 adhered to the Stuart dynasty. In 1692, though a resident of New Jersey, he was appointed one of the Council of Governor Fletcher, of New York, and in 1697 one of the Earl of Belmont's Council. He was a useful, energetic citizen, and at the time of his death, in April, 1711, was presiding judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions. Almost wholly by his means St. John's Church was gathered soon after the beginning of the eighteenth century, his own house having been the home of the first Episcopal missionaries, and the place where the services of the church were held. The church lot was his gift, and he was the principal contributor toward the building of the church edifice.

The earlier years of Robert W. Townley were passed upon his father's farm, where he received a common-school education at a neighboring district school. Subsequently he enjoyed a classical course of two years in Elizabeth. In 1828 he entered a general country store in that place as a clerk, and a few years later embarked in business on his own account. He continued in trade at Elizabeth until 1840, when he followed his brother, James W. Townley, to the West, and with him located at Fort Wayne, Ind., then in its infancy, where he became one of the pioneer settlers of a section of that State which was then largely inhabited by Indians. He engaged actively in trade at Fort Wayne until 1859, when he returned to Elizabeth to reside, retaining his business interests, however, at Fort Wayne until 1870.

From the time of Mr. Townley's return to his native county he took an active interest in all matters relating to its material and social growth, and in the city of Elizabeth he was known as one of the most energetic and useful citizens. Possessed of great determination of character, inflexible, earnest in the performance of the duties imposed upon him in both the private and public walks of life, he identified himself closely with the development of the community in which he resided. During the trying days of the great Rebellion he supported the Union cause with both his influence and purse, and actively assisted in the raising and fitting out of the troops furnished by his city.

During the years 1872 and 1873 he was a member of the City Council of Elizabeth, and in 1874 was elected mayor of the city, and re-elected in 1875 and 1876. He performed the duties of the chief magistracy with ability and faithfulness, and amid the municipal corruption of the period earned the approbation of all honest and fair-minded citizens by the rigorous discharge of his executive duties. Aside from politics he was closely identified with various local institutions in Elizabeth, was a member of the board of directors and vice-president of the State National Bank, and connected with other local enterprises. He was a member and liberal supporter of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, and contributed freely of his means to other evangelical and eleemosynary purposes. He passed away on Oct. 20, 1880, at the ripe age of seventy-seven years, leaving to his family an ample competency honestly earned, and the richer legacy of a good name acquired by the consistent practice of those moral and social virtues which all admire and few emulate. His widow, née Eliza H., daughter of J. J. Baldwin, of Newark, N. J., occupies the family homestead on North Broad Street. His daughter, Abby Baldwin Townley, is the wife of Edward P. Williams, of Fort Wayne, Ind.

Newark people,—gave a great impulse to business here, and made the city still more desirable as a place of residence. The tract of land bordering on the bay, extending from what was so long known as the Old Point to De Hart's Point on the north, as soon as it became the railroad terminus,—but it was for many years, and still continues to be to some extent, for freight,—at once increased rapidly in value, in business, and in population. It is the depot of a large commerce, and has already a numerous shipping list.

"Almost immediately after the adoption of the city charter old farms were brought into the market, laid out into city lots, and met with a ready sale. The late Edward N. Kellogg, who died in New York Jan. 8, 1867, aged fifty-one, bought about three hundred acres of what was formerly known, mostly, as 'Woodruff's Farms,' laid it out in streets and parks, and offered it to purchasers. His example was followed by Messrs. P. B. Amory, Benjamin Harris, and others, effecting thus a wonderful transformation in the northern part of the city. A similar change has been brought about both on the west and south of the city. Neat and attractive cottages, spacious warehouses, extensive manufactories, and elegant mansions have sprung up on every road with remarkable celerity. . . . A thorough system of paving, sewerage, and lighting the streets' was inaugurated in connection with other improvements calculated to render the city a healthy and desirable place of residence. Great facilities for locomotion were also introduced by means of horse-railroads on the principal thoroughfares. A spacious edifice of brick, occupied on the first floor as a market, and on the second as a city hall, costing eighty thousand dollars, took the place of the old Adelphian Academy, at the junction of Market Street and Elizabeth Avenue. A plentiful supply of gas and water, with miles of paved streets, and well-flagged crossings and sidewalks, afford the inhabitants all the advantages of city life.

The multiplication of churches and schools has kept pace with the population. The number of churches and missions in the city is thirty-five, while the schools, public, private, and parochial, are numerous. Elsewhere will be found the statistics of the schools and a history of each of the churches, except perhaps a few of the most recently formed.

The population of Elizabeth in 1830 was 3455; in 1840 it had reached only 4184; in 1850 it was 5583; in 1860 it amounted to 11,561; in 1865, with a reduced area, it was 17,383; in 1870 it had increased to 25,000, while during the next decade about three thousand more were added, making the present population fully 28,000. The greatest ratio of increase was between 1865 and 1870.

From the city comptroller's report of Jan. 3, 1881, it appears that the receipts of the city from all sources for 1880 were $312,089.19, which added to a balance on hand, Jan. 1, 1880, of $16,028.79, makes the total sum of $328,117.98. The expenditures for the same time, leaving a balance on Jan. 1, 1881, of $75,565.91, were $252,552.07. In order that the various interests of the city for which this money was expended may appear, we give the items as follows:

Although this debt is at present a serious hindrance to the progress of the city, the improvements which it represents remain a substantial benefit. It is hoped that the time will soon come when some satisfactory settlement may be made of it, so that the usual enterprise and prosperity of the city may be resumed. This is all that is wanting to give a future to Elizabeth quite as promising as that of any of the other cities of the State. The situation for manufacturing is unsurpassed, the shipping and transportation facilities abundant, the means of access to any part of the great country, east, west, north, or south, as advantageous as that of the metropolis itself, there not being an hour in the day when a train on one or the other of the great railroads may not be taken for any place to which it is desirable to go. Being within a few minutes' ride of the city of New York, on the best ordered and safest roads in the country, it offers great inducements for residence to men doing business in that city, who will find ample church facilities, good society, and good schools, things which are among the most essential requisites of the life which every true American seeks for himself and family. If we cannot add the prediction with which the venerable Dr. Hatfield closes his history of the old borough, that "the time is not far distant when every available building lot within the present bounds of the city will be occupied, when a large proportion of its meadow land, now flooded occasionally by the sea, will be reclaimed, and the humble settlement of 1664 will become one of the fairest and most prosperous cities of the land, the home of wealth, intelligence, refinement, and true religion," we may at least indulge in the hope that all these things may be.

We give below a list of the principal city officers since the adoption of the charter:

MAYORS.

May 1, 1855, to May 1, 1860, Elias Darby.
 May 1, 1860, to May 1, 1861, James Jeakine.
 May 1, 1861, to May 1, 1862, James B. Burnet.
 May 1, 1862, to Jan. 1, 1871, Philip Grier.
 Jan. 1, 1871, to Jan. 1, 1873, Francis B. Chetwood.
 Jan. 1, 1873, to Jan. 1, 1875, William A. Courseen.
 Jan. 1, 1875, to Jan. 1, 1878, Robert W. Townley.
 Jan. 1, 1878, to Jan. 1, 1879, James S. Greco.
 Jan. 1, 1879, to Jan. 1, 1880, Robert W. Townley.
 Jan. 1, 1880, to Jan. 1, 1882, Peter Bonnett.
 Jan. 1, 1882, Seth B. Ryder.

CITY CLERKS.

May 1, 1855, to June 2, 1856, William M. Whitehead.
 June 2, 1856, to May 1, 1860, Apollos M. Elmer.
 May 1, 1860, to Jan. 1, 1873, Jacob Seiple.
 Jan. 1, 1873, to Jan. 1, 1882, William B. Coleman.

CITY TREASURERS.

May 1, 1855, to May 1, 1865, Archibald S. Woodruff.
 May 1, 1865, to May 1, 1866, William P. Thompson.
 May 1, 1866, to May 1, 1872, Archibald S. Woodruff.
 Sept. 2, 1872, to Jan. 1, 1874, William W. Pioneo.
 Jan. 19, 1874, to Sept. 8, 1874, Thomas Carlton.
 July 13, 1874, to Sept. 8, 1874, Alfred De Witt.
 Sept. 8, 1874, to March 31, 1880, William D. Bruen.
 March 31, 1880, to Jan. 1, 1883, Charles C. Stevenson.

COMPTROLLERS.

June 12, 1872, to March 1, 1875, Henry Aiken.
 March 1, 1875, to March 31, 1880, Thomas B. Leggett.
 March 31, 1880, to April, 1883, Samuel D. Bowers.

Elizabethtown Water Company.—In 1854, one year previous to the adoption of the city charter, a number of persons whose names are mentioned below, seeing the necessity of an abundant supply of water, not only for the city but for the manufacturing interests that might be induced to locate in the vicinity, procured from the Legislature an act of incorporation, constituting them a body politic and corporate under the name and style of the Elizabethtown Water Company. The names of the incorporators are Francis B. Chetwood, Francis Harris, Jr., John D. Norris, George R. Chetwood, Reuben Van Pelt, Keen Purden, John Kean, John H. Rolston, Cyrus Manvel, and all other persons who might afterwards be associated with them for the purpose named in the charter. The act constituted nine stockholders a board of directors for the management of the affairs of the company. The capital stock was placed at $200,000, or 8000 shares at $25 each, afterwards reduced to $144,000.

The supply of water is drawn from a receiving reservoir called Lake Ursino, formed by a dam thrown across the Elizabeth River at Parker road, about one mile from the city. At this point the largest pump is stationed, and is driven by a turbine water-wheel. There are two other pumps driven by steam located near the pumping basin. The receiving reservoir has a capacity of a hundred million gallons; the high service reservoir, at the corner of Chilton and West Grand Streets, has a capacity of about six million gallons; and the pumping basin, on Westfield Avenue, has a capacity of about two million gallons. This latter is provided with a large filter in the centre, through which all the water for the city passes. The company has about forty miles of street mains, which run to Elizabethport and supply the manufacturing interests there, including the Singer Sewing Machine Works, Central Railroad shops, etc. The cost of these works was about one million dollars.

The present officers of the company are William Stiles, President; G. M. Ross, Secretary and Treasurer; William Whelan, Superintendent; L. B. Battin, Engineer.

We subjoin the following analysis of the water, from a report made by Torrey & Eaton, chemists, New York:

"30 WALL STREET, N. Y., Oct. 7, 1873.

"To the Elizabethtown Water Company:

"GENTLEMEN,—The following is our report upon the sample of water taken from the distributing reservoir of your company at Elizabeth, N. J., Monday morning, Sept. 22, 1873.

"Five gallons of the water were taken from the centre of the reservoir and sealed in our presence by L. B. Battin, engineer, and sent to the United States assay laboratory, where the examination was promptly undertaken.

"The total solid residue was 3.5 grains United States standard gallon (of 58.3725 grains); loss by ignition, 1.5 grains per gallon, consisting of organic matter and carbonic acid.

"Its hardness is very slight, being equivalent to nearly 1.5 grains of carbonate of lime per gallon. Chlorine present, calculated as chloride of sodium, gave 1.2 grains per gallon.

"The ammonia and nitrogenous organic matter were determined by the Nessler test of Wauklyn and Chapman, which is the latest, and believed by most chemists to be the best method in use. Free ammonia was .0007 grain in the one gallon, or .012 parts in 1,000,000. Albuminoid organic matter .017 grain in one gallon, or 3 parts in 1,000,000.

"A comparison by means of the permanganate method was made between the Elizabeth and Croton water, which was quite favorable to the former. It contains 1-5 less of oxidizable organic matter.

"The water was tested for arsenic, lead, and copper, but no trace was detected of any of these injurious substances.

"As the result of the above examination we give it as our opinion that there are no metallic poisons that can possibly be detrimental to the health of the citizens of Elizabeth, nor does the organic matter exist in sufficient quantity to indicate the presence of any injurious amount of sewerage.

"And, further, we see no objection to its use in steam boilers, or for general manufacturing purposes.

"Yours respectfully,

"TORREY & EATON."

AMOUNT OF SOLID MATTER REQUIRED TO RENDER DRINKING-WATER UNWHOLESOME.—The drinking-water of the city of London contains 15.55 grains per gallon. This seems like an amount sufficient to make the water unfit for use, and yet it has been shown conclusively that even forty grains to the gallon would not do the slightest injury to any person drinking such water. In view of this the amount of solid matter present in our water can very safely be disregarded.

Educational.—THE OLD ACADEMY.—In the autumn of 1766, Messrs. Tapping Reeve and Ebenezer Pemberton opened a grammar school in Elizabeth Town. Mr. Reeve was afterwards the son-in-law of President Burr, of the College of New Jersey, and became principal of the celebrated law-school of Litchfield, Conn. He was the son of Rev. Abner Reeve, and was born at Fire Place, Brookhaven, L. I., Oct. 17, 1744. He graduated at Princeton in 1763, and shortly after was employed by Mr. Timothy Edwards, of Elizabeth Town, as a private tutor to the children of his deceased sister, Mrs. Burr, and so became a member of the Edwards family.

Ebenezer Pemberton was the son of Rev. Ebenezer Pemberton, D.D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New York, where he was born in 1746. In 1753 the family removed to Boston, but the father still retaining his love for the College of New Jersey, of which he was one of the founders, sent his son to Princeton to be educated, where with his classmates, Jonathan Edwards, Robert and Jonathan Ogden, he graduated in 1765. Jonathan Edwards being a brother of Timothy, of Elizabeth Town, and the two Ogdens being also of this place, it is easy to see how their classmate, young Pemberton, was drawn here, and became associated with Mr. Reeve in the school.

As was to have been expected the school succeeded, and in March, 1767, Reeve and Pemberton, masters of the grammar school in Elizabeth Town, "inform the public that they continue to teach the Greek and Latin languages," and that "a commodious House is provided in the Centre of the Town for the accommodation of a large School." It was also announced that "Gentlemen of Education in the Town will frequently visit the School." The terms were five pounds per annum, and twenty shillings entrance for tuition. Board to be had in good families for twenty pounds a year.

The better to accommodate this school and to give it permanency, a number of well-disposed citizens subscribed seventy pounds, payable to the trustees of the Presbyterian Church in trust for the building of a school-house where the said trustees should order. This was accepted Aug. 24, 1767, and it was ordered:

"That a proper House be erected on the uppermost end of the Burial Yard Lot Under the Care of Messrs. [Wm. P.] Smith & Spinning of this Board and Dr. M^r Barnet & Nehemiah Wade of the congregation."

Any deficiencies, should the subscriptions made or to be made prove inadequate, were to be paid out of Mr. Joseph Ogden's legacy of £100.

"Voted That the Rev^d Dr. M^r Caldwell, Mess^{rs} John Chetwood, Timothy Edwards, & Elias Bondinot, W^m P. Smith be requested to undertake the Business of Visiting the 4th Grammar School during the first year, . . . once a Quarter or oftener if they think proper."

Such was the origin of the academy that formerly occupied the site of the lecture-room of the First Presbyterian Church, and that was destroyed by the torch of the enemy Feb. 25, 1779. It was built of wood with a cupola. Mr. Pemberton left the school in the spring for a tutorship at Princeton, and Mr. Reeve in the autumn of 1769. They were succeeded by Mr. Joseph Periam (born in 1742), a graduate of the College of New Jersey in 1762, and "distinguished by a profound acquaintance with mathematics and natural philosophy." The Rev. Dr. Samuel Spring, who formed his acquaintance at Princeton, "could never mention his name without admiration." In 1765 he was tutor of the college; also in 1767 and 1768. The intermediate year was occupied with the care of a school at Princeton. Mr. Periam continued in charge of the school in this town for two years. In 1772-73 he studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Bellamy, of Bethlehem, Conn.; was licensed by the Presbytery of New York in 1774, but the license was withdrawn in 1775; was appointed in 1776 quartermaster of the First Battalion (Col. Ogden's) of the Jersey Brigade; resumed the charge of the academy June 1, 1778, where he continued until his death, which occurred suddenly Sunday morning, Oct. 8, 1780.¹

¹ Trustees' Book. Dr. Spring's Reminiscences, i. 13; ii. 234-36. Holt's N. Y. Journal, No. 1240. N. J. Gazette, No. 26. N. J. Journal, Nos. 83, 86. Rev. Jed. Chapman, of "Newark Mountains," Aug. 14, 1772, writes to Rev. Dr. Bellamy as follows: "I have just an opportunity to write a line by Mr. Periam, who was formerly a tutor at Prince Town College; he is a very ingenious young gentleman—I trust a truly humble and pious Christian; one whom I greatly love and esteem; a steady zealous friend to truth. He comes with the design to spend some time in the study of divinity with you, and I trust upon acquaintance with him you will be pleased and think it of great importance to encourage and forward him." Dr. Bellamy writes to his son, Feb. 6, 1773, "Mr. Periam has become a very serious man since you saw him." Proceedings of N. Y. His. Soc., vi. 175. His license was withdrawn, probably because of his advocacy of the visionary immaterialistic theory of Bishop Berkeley, with which he was greatly enraptured. His widow, Elizabeth, also born in 1742, survived until April 5, 1803. Their son Joseph was for many years a successful teacher in this town.

Mr. Francis Barber took charge of the school Nov. 1, 1771, and continued in this service until the commencement of the war. Mr. Samuel Baldwin, of Newark, who graduated at Princeton in 1770 (with Messrs. John C. Ogden and Matthias Williamson, of this town), being then only sixteen years of age, was shortly after appointed an usher, probably after Mr. Barber took the charge. Alexander Hamilton, then a lad of fourteen, from the West Indies, was at this time one of the pupils. Mr. Baldwin lived until the year 1850.¹

A lottery was authorized for the rebuilding of the academy, as also the court-house and jail, in 1789. The sum to be raised was $2500. It was proposed to sell 13,800 tickets, of which 7472 were to be prizes of from two to five dollars each. The lottery was to be drawn in three classes, one dollar for the first, two dollars for the second, and four dollars for third class of tickets. The managers were Jonathan H. Lawrence and Elias B. Dayton. The affairs of the lottery continued in hand for more than twelve years before the accounts were finally settled and disposed of. The academy, however, was built and opened for pupils on the 1st of June, 1789. Mr. Patrick Murdock, a graduate of the University of Edinburgh, who had been a teacher for several years at Wilmington, Del., took charge of the Latin school, and Mr. Luther Halsey of the English department.

The trustees were Rev. David Austin, president; Governor William Livingston, Judge John Chetwood, Hon. Jonathan Dayton, John De Hart, Aaron Ogden, Matthias Williamson, and George Ross. In November, 1790, Mr. Murdock was succeeded by Col. John Taylor, subsequently professor in Union College, New York. Board was to be had for twenty pounds in good families, and tuition was five pounds a year.²

Col. Taylor was succeeded by Samuel C. Blackman (Yale, 1793), and he, in September, 1796, by Henry James Feltus, a young Methodist exhorter, who had come over in 1795 from England, afterwards the Rev. Dr. Feltus, of the Episcopal Church, New York. He had charge of the academy for two years, and was succeeded, in 1798, by James Stevenson, of Morristown, and he, in 1799, by David Young (Yale, 1798), famous in subsequent years for his astronomical calculations. He gave place, in 1801, to Edmund D. Barry, of Trinity College, Dublin, "an exile of Erin," well known in after-years as the Rev. E. D. Barry, D.D. (Episcopal), and a most successful teacher. His successor in 1803 was the Rev. Samuel Lilly, of St. John's Church. To him succeeded, in 1806, Henry Mills (C. N. J., 1802), afterwards the Rev. H. Mills, D.D. (Presbyterian), of Auburn Theological Seminary, New York. William Belden (Yale, 1803) followed, till 1812, long a successful public-school teacher in New York. He was followed, in 1812-13, by Edward Allen (C. N. J., 1815), and again, 1815-17. He has been a most useful Presbyterian minister more than half a century. Moses Smith, previously of Hudson, N. Y., followed in 1817.³

YOUNG LADIES' SEMINARY.—A young ladies' school was commenced in April, 1789, by Anne Williams, in the house opposite John Blanchard's. A similar school was opened May 1, 1791, by Madame Capron, a French lady, in which the French language, French manners, and French accomplishments were taught. It was the period of the French Revolution, and it was all the fashion then to shout for the French Republic and fraternize with French democracy. Mons. St. Aivre was her dancing-master, under whose auspices a ball was given at Wales' Tavern Sept. 7, 1791, and another October 13th, "when sixteen young ladies performed bow dance, the minuet de la cour, la gavotte, and Allemande." Mons. Dillon succeeded him the following year. In the spring of 1799, Messrs. Mitchell, Nugent, and Dupot each opened a dancing-school in the borough.

A MEDICAL SCHOOL was opened here in 1790. Dr. Paul Mischeau, of Richmond, Staten Island, who had commenced practice in the town in April, 1789, advertised in February, 1790, a complete course of medical lectures, to be given at 4 P.M., from May 10th to July 25th, charge £5. For further account of Dr. Mischeau the reader is referred to the chapter on the medical profession of the county.

Thus early after the Revolution the town began to be distinguished for its institutions of learning. Pains were taken to secure the best instructors in all departments of knowledge, many of whom having graduated at Princeton became considerably noted in the learned professions. There was also in the town an atmosphere congenial to the pursuit of science and letters, engendered by the presence of a large number of people of more than common intelligence and acquirements.

"The more to foster this spirit a library association was formed early in 1792 for the circulation of useful books and the elevation of the tastes of the people. A similar association on a limited scale had existed some time previously, but had not been successful. The constitution of the new association, now extant, is subscribed by John De Hart, Samuel Spraggs, David Austin, James Ricketts, Matthias Williamson, Jr., George Ross, Shepard Kollock, William Shute, Job Haines, Elias B. Dayton, Jonathan H. Lawrence, Samuel Smith, Caleb Halsted, Jr., Aaron Ogden, Edward Thomas, Lewis Woodruff, Jeremiah Ballard, Isaac Morse, William Steele, Jonathan Dayton, Abraham Clark, Jr., John Clarke, William Halsted, John Chetwood, Jonathan Wade, Isaac

H. Williamson, Matthias H. Williamson, Horatio R. Dayton, Joseph Lyon, Jr., and Cornelius Blanchard. These were original subscribers. Other names were added from year to year. George Ross was chosen librarian; Elias B. Dayton, treasurer; and Messrs. David Austin, J. Hampton Lawrence, Matthias Williamson, Jr., Jeremiah Ballard, and Aaron Ogden a committee for the choice and purchase of books. In 1794, Isaac H. Williamson was chosen librarian, and in 1796, Dr. Abraham Clark.

The town at this period, as in former days, contributed largely to the influences which shaped the politics of the State and nation. It was rarely the case that it was not represented in the State Legislature. To the First Congress it sent the Hon. Elias Boudinot, and to both the Second and the Third the Hon. Elias Boudinot, Abraham Clark, and Jonathan Dayton, all of them active and influential members; while from Feb. 26, 1801, to March 3, 1803, both the senators from New Jersey, Aaron Ogden and Jonathan Dayton, were from Elizabeth Town. To the Fourth and Fifth Congresses it gave a Speaker in the person of the Hon. Jonathan Dayton, afterwards senator for six years.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The Board of Education of the city of Elizabeth was incorporated in 1873. The number of schools under the charge of the board is five.

Public School No. 1 is located on Third Street, between Fulton and East Jersey Streets. The building was erected in 1855, remodeled in 1871, and altered in 1879, and is divided into fifteen class-rooms. The first and second floors are occupied by the primary department, and have ten teachers. The third floor is occupied by the grammar and high school departments, and have seven teachers. The teachers employed in this school are B. Holmes, principal, $1400 per year; high school department, Miss S. C. Martin, vice-principal, Miss A. E. Fabens, assistant; grammar school department, Miss S. M. Braun, principal, Miss J. S. Johnson, Miss C. H. Pierson, Miss C. Long; primary department, Miss F. T. Mackey, principal, Miss S. E. Himmen, Miss L. E. Braun, Miss J. M. Murdock, Miss E. G. Dederick, Miss E. M. Metz, Miss J. M. Todd, Miss R. B. Steeb, Miss M. E. Leveridge, Miss L. B. Robins.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in this school during the year is 1265. The present number on roll is 819.

The average daily attendance during the year is 737.

The seating capacity of the school is as follows: permanent seats, 722; temporary seats, 119; total, 841.

Public School No. 2 is located on Morrell Street. This building was erected in 1858 and altered in 1880, and is divided into thirteen class-rooms. The first floor is occupied by the primary department, and has six teachers. The second floor is occupied by the grammar and high school departments, and has seven teachers. The teachers employed in this are N. W. Pease, principal, $1400 per year; high school department, Miss L. H. Sayre, vice-principal, Miss F. O. Crane, Miss B. C. Mackey; grammar department, Miss A. C. Forsyth, principal, Miss M. J. McNamara, Miss Dumazeand, Miss Lizzie Allen; primary department, Miss M. A. Clark, principal, Miss M. A. Baker, Miss Josie Luster, Miss L. A. Dederick, Miss E. B. Long, Miss A. E. Covell.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in this school during the year is 994. The present number on roll is 678. The average daily attendance during the year is 595. The seating capacity of the school is 677.

Public School No. 3 is located on the corner of Second Avenue and High Street. This building was erected in 1872, and is divided into ten class-rooms, one assembly-room, and one reception-room. The primary department occupies the first floor, and has six teachers. The grammar department occupies four rooms on the second floor, and has four teachers. The high school department occupies the assembly-room on the second floor, and is taught by the principal and vice-principal. The teachers employed in this school are William D. Heyer, principal, $1400 per year; high school department, Miss K. M. Warner, vice-principal; grammar department, Miss J. A. Ogden, principal, Miss E. G. Seran, Miss H. E. Fabens, Miss E. A. Cheney; primary department, Miss K. A. Hughes, principal, Miss S. N. McNamara, Miss M. M. Waters, Miss M. E. Loach, Miss F. R. Harrington, Miss M. E. Smith.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in this school during the year is 1049. The present number on roll is 523. The average daily attendance during the year is 455. The seating capacity of the school is 800.

Public School No. 4 is located on Catharine Street, between East Grand Street and the Central Railroad. This building has not been used for school purposes for several years. On the first day of June, 1880, the building was leased by the Board of Education to the African Methodist Episcopal Church for the term of one year and ten months, on the following terms and conditions: The church to make necessary alterations and repairs, and pay the sum of ten dollars for the first ten months, and after that at the yearly rent or sum of fifty dollars, the rent to be paid in advance at the beginning of each term.

Public School No. 5 is located on West Jersey Street, in the building formerly occupied by the First Baptist Church, now owned by Amos Clark, Jr., and hired from him at an annual rent of six hundred dollars. This school is divided into five class-rooms. The teachers employed in this school are Miss S. P. Mulford, Miss E. E. Newcomb, Mrs. H. L. Magie, Mrs. F. A. Hutchinson, Miss A. M. Platt.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in this school during the year is 363. The present number on roll is 202. The average daily attendance during the year is 188. The seating capacity of the school is 240.

Public School No. 6 is located on Morris Avenue near the city line, in a building owned by Col. John Kean, and hired from him at the annual rent of five hundred dollars. There is but one class-room and two recitation-rooms. The teachers employed in this school are Miss S. M. Stiles, Miss S. S. Chandler, Miss M. D. Whitaker.

The whole number of pupils enrolled in this school during the year is 290. The present number on roll is 117. The average daily attendance during the year is 92. The seating capacity of the school is 128.

The total number of pupils enrolled in the day schools during the year is 3961. The total number now on the roll in the day schools is 2339. The total average daily attendance is 2067.

Census of School Children.—The number of school children in the city between the ages of five and eighteen years is 7710, viz., First Ward, 1513; Second Ward, 1626; Third Ward, 1124; Fourth Ward, 482; Fifth Ward, 1395; Sixth Ward, 451; Seventh Ward, 430; Eighth Ward, 689. The schools under the charge of the board will seat 2686 pupils.

The public schools of Elizabeth, although unsurpassed in quality by those of any other city in the State, furnish the means of education to only about thirty per cent. of the school population. By the census of 1881 it appears that the whole number of children in the city between the ages of five and eighteen was 7710, while for the same year the total number of seating accommodations in all the public schools was 2686. The number enrolled in all the schools for the same year was 2339, or 347 in excess of the seating capacity. The average attendance, however, of 2067 in all the schools during the year fell below the seating capacity 619. The difference between the highest enrollment in the public schools and the whole number of children of school age is 5371. Of these, 2439 are accommodated in private schools (including parochial and select schools), leaving a balance of 2932 unprovided for or attending no schools. Considering that a large number of the children and youth of the city are in factories, or engaged in occupations which prevent their attendance at school, the showing is not an unfavorable one for the educational status of the population. The evening schools, when kept open, reduce the number of untaught children somewhat, but they have been closed during the past year.

The Board of Education is composed as follows: President, J. Madison Watson; Secretary, William H. Meeker; Superintendent of Public Schools, J. Augustus Dix. Members, William Woodcock, Daniel Wolfskeil, Peter Egenolf, Meline W. Halsey, Frank D. Karr, Peter Burdett, Abram B. Knapp, Erastus G. Putnam, Henry Pfarrer, James Oakes, Thomas Terrill, Jr., Matthias L. Darby, Lewis W. Kingsley, Ira B. Wheeler, J. Madison Watson, John E. Astfalk.

ST. HENRY'S PAROCHIAL SCHOOL is located in Magnolia Avenue, below Spring Street, is two stories with a French roof. The lower floor is used as St. Henry's chapel. The upper floor consists of four class-rooms, over which are four Sisters from the convent adjoining. Rev. Father Augustine Wirth is in charge, and the school is supported entirely by the parish, there being no State or city aid. The school was established by Rev. Henry Lemke in 1869, and was first located in the nunnery, but in 1872 the present building was erected, and its attendance is steadily on the increase. There are on the roll 236 pupils, and an average attendance of 200.

ST. WALBURGA'S SELECT SCHOOL is connected with St. Henry's parish, is in the convent of St. Walburga, and has an attendance of 24 scholars, taught by two Sisters.

ST. MARY'S PAROCHIAL SCHOOL is located in Washington Avenue, near South Street; is a brick building three stories in height, and was built by Rev. Father Howell about 1861. Rev. Father Leo Thebaud is principal, and is assisted by the Sisters. The school is supported entirely by the parish, and receives no aid from State or city. There are six class-rooms and six teachers, the higher studies being taught by Mr. Thomas F. Coleman, and the other classes by the Sisters. There are on the roll 350 scholars, with an average attendance of 300.

ST. MICHAEL'S PAROCHIAL SCHOOL is located in Smith Street, near Elizabeth Avenue; is a one-story frame building, erected about 1872. Rev. Father Albert Von Schilgen is principal. This school is supported by the parish, receiving no State or city aid. There are three class-rooms, and the teachers are three Sisters from the convent. There are on the roll 180 scholars, with an average attendance of that number.

ST. PATRICK'S PAROCHIAL SCHOOL is located in Court Street near Second Street, and is the oldest Catholic school in the city, having been established in 1860 by Rev. Father Werzfeld. The building is brick, two stories, with a roomy attic, an addition of one-half having been added to it by Rev. Father Hennessey some years later. Rev. Father Gessner is principal. Receives no State or city aid, the parish supporting it entirely. There are ten class-rooms, presided over by ten teachers. Mr. Sullivan is in charge of the high school department, and the other teachers are Sisters from the convent. There are on the roll about 900 scholars, with an average attendance of 800.

Even with this large building, the school wants of St. Patrick's parish are not supplied, and the Rev. Father Gessner is now erecting a mammoth brick building near by, over one hundred and sixty feet deep with a proportionate frontage. It is three stories in height, and required upwards of nine hundred thousand brick in its erection. There will be fourteen class-rooms, one large assembly-room, and four smaller rooms for offices, stationery, library, etc., costing upwards of forty-five thousand dollars, and having a seating capacity of upwards of twelve hundred. It will be a monument to Rev. Father Gessner, whose zeal and enterprise deserve a liberal reward.

ST. JOSEPH'S ACADEMY is connected with St. Patrick's parish, is located at the corner of First and Wall Streets. Is under the charge of four teachers, all Dominican Sisters, and has an attendance of 135.

ACADEMIES, COLLEGES, AND SELECT SCHOOLS.—Miss Mary E. Cleveland, 1134 Washington; Miss Maria W. Condell, 32 Orchard; Mrs. A. S. Gunn, 26 Prospect; Misses Hayward, school for young ladies, 279 Broad; James H. Lansley, Ph.D., business college and classical academy for both sexes, 323 Jefferson, corner Magnolia Avenue; Mrs. Mary V. Little, select school, 417 Elizabeth Avenue; Misses Ludlow, select school, 1146 East Grand; Misses Mitchell, select school, 32 West Scott Place; Rev. John F. Pingry, Ph.D., school for boys, 445 Westminster Avenue; Miss N. D. Ranney, school for young ladies, 211 South Broad; Miss Nettie C. Read, school for young ladies, 521 North Broad; Misses Sargeants, 284 North Broad; Miss Mary Sopers, 1124 Chestnut; Miss Katie M. Ward, select school, 450 Morris Avenue; John Young, school for boys, 202 West Jersey.

Elizabethport Manufacturing Company. William Shove, manager.

Elizabethport Shear-Works. Mosen N. Strauss, proprietor.

Manhattan Stove-Works. Munsell, Rollo & Co., proprietors.

Phenix Rubber Company. William C. Colton, president; C. T. Petchell, secretary and treasurer.

Besides these there are the cordage manufactory of William Day; the Steam Cordage Company, D. B. Whitlock, E. M. Fulton, and A. W. Lukens comprising the firm; Robert Edwards' saw-mill; the New Jersey Car-Wheel Manufacturing Company, Thomas Thatcher superintendent. This establishment belongs to the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and is on Marshall and Front Streets. The buildings are of brick, and turn out on an average twenty-five wheels per day.

ELIZABETHPORT MANUFACTURING COMPANY.—In the year 1836, Jonathan Ropes, Elihu Harrison, and Thomas B. Wood organized a company, situated on Front Street between Marshall and Franklin Streets, covering over fifty lots of ground, or nearly three acres of land, besides owning a large dock on the Kill von Kull for shipping their goods. They erected large brick foundries, as well as buildings for finishing their goods. The incorporate name of Elizabethport Manufacturing Company, malleable and common iron castings, finished carriage and saddlery hardware. For a while the firm did not meet their anticipations, but in 1853, Mr. William Shove took charge of the establishment, and since then their business has largely increased. They employ a large number of skilled workmen, who are finishing some of the best goods for the market, and also taking charge of patented machinery, finishing and completing for immediate service a new invention of Alfred Sauton for the purpose of digging and loading of clay and also of coal upon cars and boats, and it is claimed by this machinery a vessel can be loaded by this elevator a ton a minute, this method of handling doing away with much hand-labor and saving of time in the receiving and unloading of vessels. This firm has some of these elevators nearly finished; they have been tested and found to do the work.

Under the firm-name of Worrall & Co., at Elizabethport, there has grown up a large business within a few years, Isaac G. Worrall, superintendent, employing a large number of skilled machinists and other artisans. Their immense brick buildings are on Front Street, between Franklin and Fulton.

FOUNDRIES AND SAW-MANUFACTURERS, MACHINISTS AND FORGES.—This large manufactory of saws, builders' castings of every description, columns, girders, beams, baker-oven mouths, furnace-oven doors and frames, bars, dampers, peel-plates, bottom-plates and ovens, cauldrons, kettles, retorts, oyster-house castings, green-house castings, jewelers' steel-face dies and presses, hatters' irons, heaters, japanners' box-stoves, brass-founders' furnaces, extra cast-steel saws, circular, hand, mill, panel, and rip-saws, butchers' box-saws, saw-mandrels, plasterers' trowels, mitering-rods and tools, best English sheet, cast steel, etc., was established in 1843 by Noah and John Wesley Worrall.

STOVES AND RANGES.—One of the largest stove and range manufactories and foundry was established by Munsell & Thompson in 1860, with capital amounting to $200,000, their establishment covering some two acres of ground, situated at Nos. 130, 132, 134, and 136 Fulton Street, running through to Franklin Street, these covering some two hundred and fifty feet. They have a large brick foundry, also finishing and polishing buildings. Their establishment is not only known all over the United States, but also in Canada, South America, and Europe. They have a number of patents for these ranges and base-burners, and make the best ranges, which give great satisfaction, they being the leading firm. They employ some two hundred men, the majority of whom are skilled workmen. Mr. James A. Munsell and Robert B. Thompson retired from the firm in 1880, and the firm is now composed of Eugene Munsell, William H. Rollo, Lewis W. Kingsley, and Franklin Brooks, as the firm-name of Munsell, Rollo & Co., with capital of $250,000.

SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY OF NEW JERSEY. CAPITAL, $10,000,000.—The works of this company are situated within the city limits of Elizabeth, near the western terminus of the Central Railroad bridge across Newark Bay. In order to combine in one grand establishment the various branches of their extensive manufacturing business, which had been formerly carried on at various widely-separated points, the Singer Manufacturing Company in 1870 purchased forty acres of land on the south side of the Central Railroad track, bordering on Newark Bay, and erected the mammoth structure known as the Singer

Wm B. Tucker

Charles, son of Lewis Tucker, of Connecticut, was one of the earliest settlers of Elizabethtown, and one of the original "Associates." His name is appended to an "Oath of A Leagance and Fidelity, taken by the Inhabitants of Elizabeth Town and the Jurisdiction thereof, beginning the 19th February, 1665." It also appears on many of the ancient records in different capacities. He was a large land-owner and an influential and active man among the early pioneers. His son, Wessels Tucker, was born Jan. 30, 1741, and was a carpenter by trade. He died Jan. 30, 1805. Luke, son of Wessels, was also a carpenter, and was born Aug. 13, 1785, and died March 20, 1865. He was strongly opposed to the institution of slavery, and was one of the early members of the Republican party. For many years he was the agent of William Gibbons, who ran a stage-line between New York and Philadelphia, and had charge of all his property at Elizabeth. He resided in a house located near where St. Mary's Cemetery now is. Another branch of the family also located at Elizabethtown at an early period, and was represented, among others, by Lewis Tucker, a cousin of Luke. Charles Tucker, Jr., and Warren Tucker are also found mentioned in the local records, the former as early as 1694.

William Burnett Tucker, son of Luke Tucker, was born on Sept. 13, 1812. He received only a common-school education, and in early life learned the trade of a tinsmith with Elijah Kellogg, with whom he subsequently became associated in business. Mr. Kellogg disposed of his interest in the concern to Moses Hatfield, and the latter having been bought out by Mr. Tucker, the firm of Tucker & Ogden was organized, with Job Ogden as the junior member. This firm continued to do business together for thirty years at the site of No. 41 Broad Street. The building was purchased by Messrs. Tucker & Ogden in 1854, and became the sole property of the former in 1869. In that year Mr. Tucker associated his son, William B. Tucker, Jr., with him in business, and the firm of William B. Tucker & Son continued until Jan. 25, 1881, when the senior member withdrew. The business has since been successfully carried on by William B. Tucker, Jr., at No. 225 Broad Street.

For many years Mr. Tucker was one of the most active and influential residents of Elizabeth. A man of plain parts, he confined himself closely to business, and commanded the respect of all by his straightforward and consistent conduct. Though no aspirant after public position, he was for several terms a member of the Borough Council, and after the formation of the city of Elizabeth served one term in the municipal Common Council, performing his official duties in a satisfactory and honorable manner.

He took great interest in all movements tending to advance the material and social welfare of his native place, and was for many years one of the most active members of the borough fire department. He was also for a long time a director of the Elizabeth Mutual Insurance Company; was director and vice-president of the Elizabethtown Savings Institution; a director and vice-president of the Elizabeth Library Association; and a trustee of the Evergreen Cemetery Company from the time of its organization, and vice-president at the time of his death. In the First Presbyterian Church, of which he was for many years a consistent member, he was for a long time a trustee, and subsequently a deacon and ruling elder, holding the latter office at the time of his demise, on Feb. 5, 1882. He was a life-member of the American Bible Society, and active in the affairs of the Home for Aged Women, Elizabeth, of which his wife was one of the founders. He was also a liberal contributor to the various other worthy objects of his day, and his life, though quiet and unostentatious, was well-rounded and consistent to the close.

Mr. Tucker married Miss Hannah E. Bell, daughter of John Bell, of Monmouth County, N. J., who survives him, together with his two children, viz.: Cornelia J., wife of Frank Cory, of Elizabeth, and William B. Tucker, Jr. The latter was married in 1869 to Miss Mary Tucker Smylie, daughter of James M. Smylie, of Paterson, N. J., and a descendant of another branch of the Tucker family. In their children, six in number, are therefore merged two branches of the family springing from one common ancestor.

John Ogden

The Ogden family is one of the oldest in Union County, and has been represented by many of the most distinguished men of the State. John Ogden, the ancestor of the family in New Jersey, was one of the original patentees of Elizabethtown, and an influential and popular citizen. He resided at Stamford, Conn., in 1641, within a year after its settlement. Early in 1644, in company with others, he removed to Hempstead, L. I., of which he was one of the patentees. He was made a freeman of Southampton, March 31, 1650, and was chosen by the General Court, at Hartford, Conn., one of the magistrates of the colony in 1656, 1657, and 1658. He subsequently held other offices of distinction in the colony. Later still he became one of the original "Associates" of the Elizabethtown patent, and with his five sons, John, Jonathan, David, Joseph, and Benjamin, he was among the first to remove to the new purchase and erect a dwelling on the town plot. He erected and operated one of the first grist-mills in the new colony, and held many offices of prominence. He was the acknowledged pioneer of the town; in his house the first white child of the settlement was born, and he was a veritable leader in church and State until his death in 1681. From him have descended the numerous branches of the family since represented in New Jersey.

Timothy Ogden, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was a tanner by trade, and during the Revolutionary period operated a tan-yard on what is now Elizabeth Avenue, near Spring Street. Near his home plot dwelt his sons, among whom was Moses, father of our subject, and a tailor by trade. He was born Feb. 6, 1774, and married Dec. 6, 1797, Rhoda Halsey (born Jan. 13, 1780, died Jan. 16, 1864). Moses Ogden died June 9, 1847. His children were John, born Sept. 11, 1799; William, born Sept. 6, 1802, died Dec. 18, 1845; Joseph G., born Nov. 21, 1806, died Feb. 6, 1867; and Moses II., born Aug. 11, 1815, died Jan. 29, 1861.

John Ogden was born at the family residence on Elizabeth Avenue on the date indicated above. He received only a common-school education, and in early life was apprenticed to Col. Elihu Brittin, to learn the trade of cabinet-making. Upon attaining his majority he removed to Derrien, Ga., and engaged in the manufacture of the cotton-gin. After a few months he returned to his native place, and engaged in cabinet-making.

He continued to follow this occupation during his life, gradually enlarging the scope of his business and adding that of undertaking. He was a man of plain parts, earnest and industrious, and strove only to perform the plain duty of a man and a citizen. He was no politician, although he served for a term as a member of the Town Council of Elizabeth. While not a man of large means, he contributed liberally to the support of the various worthy institutions of his day, and was a zealous and faithful member of the First Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth. He died at a ripe old age on July 21, 1877.

Mr. Ogden was first married on April 6, 1823, to Joanna II., daughter of Aaron Ross, of Elizabeth. His children were John H., born Jan. 9, 1824, died Dec. 7, 1861; Sarah R., born Sept. 2, 1825, died Aug. 25, 1826; Sarah R., born May 18, 1827, married Nov. 29, 1847, William Lockman, of Tompkinsville, Staten Island, where she resides; Moses C., died Oct. 6, 1834; James C., born Aug. 10, 1831; George R., born Aug. 6, 1834, died Feb. 9, 1865; Joseph G., born March 9, 1837; Moses C., born Aug. 15, 1839, died Dec. 12, 1871; and Mary P., born May 18, 1844, died April 14, 1881. Mr. Ogden's second wife was Miss Ann E. Miller, to whom he was united on Nov. 14, 1850, and who survives him.

James C. Ogden, son of John, is a leading furniture dealer and undertaker in Elizabeth. He represented the Fourth Ward in the City Council from 1875 to 1879, is president of the board of trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, one of the directors of the Elizabeth Savings Institution, and a director of the Library Hall Association. He was married on Nov. 26, 1856, to Miss Lydia Drake, who died Aug. 26, 1873. His second wife, Miss Sarah W. Halsey, to whom he was united Jan. 4, 1877, died Aug. 15, 1878. His son, Frank Clark Ogden, is the only surviving one of four children. Joseph G. Ogden, the other son, is now a member of the City Council from the Fourth Ward. He served three years in the late war as a member of Company A, of the First New Jersey Infantry, is lieutenant and paymaster of the Veteran Zouaves, treasurer of the Veteran Zouaves' Association, and of the Exempt Firemen's Association, and one of the directors of the Exempt Firemen's Life Insurance Company. He was married June 1, 1868, to Miss Lavinia McCullough, and is in business with his brother.

Works. The buildings cover over fifteen acres of flooring. The main building, fronting on First and Trumbull Streets, is an imposing fire-proof edifice, eleven hundred feet in length, fifty feet in depth, and covered with a slate Mansard roof, from which rise stately towers. The foundry, fronting on the railroad, is one thousand feet long and one hundred wide. The building used for cleaning, casting, japanning, etc., is five hundred and thirty feet long, fifty feet deep, with two wings of seventy-five by one hundred and thirty feet deep each. The cabinet, case, and box factory are each two hundred feet long, fifty feet deep, and three stories high. The total frontage is over three thousand feet. About twenty miles of steam pipe are used in heating the premises, together with twenty boilers, and the machinery is worked by four engines of seventy-five horse-power each. On the grounds are nearly five miles of railroad track, connected by switches with those of the Central Railroad. This, together with a water-front of one thousand feet, along which are suitable docks, afford excellent facilities for receipt of coal, iron, and lumber, and for the shipment of stock to all parts of the world. Over twenty-five hundred hands are employed, receiving thirty thousand dollars a week in wages. The company have every facility for turning out over seven thousand machines a week.

The coming of this company to Elizabeth has increased the population several thousands and its business by many thousand dollars, annually distributed by the company to their employes. The cost of this gigantic enterprise was three million dollars.

The officers of the company are: President, Edward Clark; Vice-President, George K. McKenzie; Secretary, A. F. Sterling; Treasurer, William F. Proctor; Directors, Edward Clark, George R. McKenzie, A. F. Sterling, William F. Proctor, Hugh Cheyne, and Lebbius B. Miller; Superintendent, Lebbius B. Miller. The principal office of the company is at No. 34 Union Square, New York.

CHAPTER XXX.

First Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth.—This church is very ancient, dating back to the first settlement of Elizabeth Town by the original Associates. It was probably the first English church of the Puritan type founded in New Jersey, and there were very few even of the Reformed Dutch Churches which preceded it. John Ogden, one of the founders of this town, had, about twenty years before coming here, erected the old stone church in the Dutch fort at New Amsterdam, and a church of the same order had been established in the old town of Bergen, west of the Hudson. This last, so far as we have any knowledge relating to the subject, was the only Reformed Dutch Church in East Jersey prior to 1664, although the Dutch people and ministers left in New Netherland at the time of the conquest afterwards established many others. The church of Elizabeth, therefore, may be regarded as the second church of any denomination planted in East New Jersey. Probably a similar Puritan Church at Newark was the third.

Owing to the loss of the records, it is impossible to tell precisely when the church was organized or the meeting-house built. The first founders of the town were a religious people, and church-members at home in Connecticut and on Long Island. Those who first applied for a grant of land under the Dutch government, in order to form a settlement here, had it stipulated in the conditions of purchase that they should be allowed the "liberty to gather a church of their own in the Congregational way." Probably they enjoyed the same liberty when they became settled under Governor Nicolls, and that it was not long after that event when they had a meeting-house and a worshiping congregation, according to the custom prevailing in New England.

A "town-house" was among the first necessities of every Puritan community, where the government was carried on largely by the voice of the people expressed in town-meeting. They had no ideas of consecrated buildings, in which it would be sacrilege to do honest business on the week-days; for they met and voted with the same conscientiousness with which they worshipped. Hence one house answered both purposes. The "town-house" was also the "meeting-house," not only used by common consent for the transaction of the town business on week-days, but for Christian worship on Sundays. Religion being a part of the every-day life of the community, and the conservator of its social order and stability, every Puritan parish was the whole town, and all were under obligation to support the minister and to aid in the other expenses of the church to the extent of their means. Such was the earliest mode of supporting religion in New England, by a tax levied on the property of the whole community. The people usually met and agreed upon the minister and his salary in town-meeting, and when they built a house for him or dismissed him they usually pursued the same course. The parsonage or the parsonage farm was generally owned by the town, and set off for that purpose by the common proprietors.

It is quite probable that a similar state of things prevailed at first in the Elizabeth Town colony. Mention is made of the "town-house" as early as June, 1671. Pardon, in his testimony in the Michell case, says that "on the 19th of June, 1671, he was at a meeting of several inhabitants of this town who were met together at the town-house." Mr. Hatfield thinks it quite probable that the first General Assembly of the province convened in this town-house, May 26, 1668, and that it had been then standing for at least two years. The same building is probably referred to as "the public Meeting-House of Elizabeth Town" in the act of 1682, requiring the county courts to meet here twice a year. As early as Feb. 19, 1666, the inhabitants held a meeting, at which the whole town was present, and sixty-five men took the oath of allegiance and fidelity. The house had most likely been built before this date, and might easily have been, as John Ogden could have furnished lumber from his saw-mill, put up at the bridge soon after his coming.

The lot on which the house was built included the present burying-ground of the First Presbyterian Church, extending on the west to the river, and comprising about eight acres.

Provision was made by the Associates for a town lot for the minister, who was to have a third-lot right in it. In the records of surveys it is occasionally referred to as the "parsonage lot."

The Associates provided for a minister of the town on their first setting out to form a colony. The Rev. Thomas James, pastor of the church of East Hampton, L. I., had been chosen their minister, and had consented to cast in his lot with them, but was persuaded by those of his people who remained to abandon the undertaking. It is not to be supposed, however, that no religious meetings were held in the infant community; such a people could not long forego that privilege, and when not conducting their own meetings, in a social way they may have been ministered to occasionally by visiting pastors from their old homes. The Rev. Mr. Pierson, former pastor of some of the Associates, removed to Newark, Oct. 1, 1667, and it is not unlikely that he may have previously visited the Elizabeth Town colony, and in that manner became interested in the region of country which he chose for his future home.

REV. JEREMIAH PECK.—The first pastor of this church, the Rev. Jeremiah Peck, was the eldest son of Deacon William Peck, of New Haven. He was born near London, England, in 1622 or 1623, and came to America with his father in the ship "Hector," arriving in Boston June 26, 1637. Deacon Peck removed to New Haven with his family in 1639, and became one of the founders of that town. Jeremiah graduated at Harvard College in 1654. He became a teacher, and at Guilford, Conn., married Johannah, daughter of Robert Kitchell, Nov. 12, 1656. In the records of the colony of New Haven, June 28, 1660, appears the following entry:

"It was agreed that Mr. Pecke, now at Guilford, should be school-master, and that it should begin in October next, when his half year expires there; he is to keepe y^e schools, to teach the schollers Latine, Greek, and Hebrew, and fit them for the Colledge; and for the salary, he knowes the allowance fro the colony is 40^{li} a year, and for further treatie they must leave it to New haven, where the schools is; and for further orders concerning the schools and well carrying it on, the elders will consider of some against the court of magistrates in October next, when things as there is cause may be further considered."

Mr. Peck accepted the appointment, and returned to his old home in October, 1660, a house and a plot of land being also allowed him. He appears to have remained in this situation but a short time, for Sept. 25, 1661, we find him engaging as a minister in Saybrook, to receive a settlement of £100 in lands in fee, and £55 in house and lot, to revert to the town if he removed within five years; his salary to be £60 a year, to be paid in two firkins of butter, and the rest in corn and flesh at current prices; his maintenance to be, if necessary, increased. The manner in which his preaching was regarded at Saybrook may be inferred from the following letter addressed to his parishioners:

"Anno Domini 63 feb. 2 Respected and loving friends the Inhabitants and planters of Saybrooke I understand and that from divers that there is much Dissatisfaction with Reference to myselfe in respect to my proceeding in the Ministry at least to a settlement and that there are desires in many to provide themselves with a more able Help: I do freely leave myself to the providence of God and the Thots of his people: and so far as I am any wayes concerned herein I doe leave the Towne wholly to their own Liberty to provide for themselves as God shall direct: and with respect to laying aside the future Term of years expressed in the Covenant as also of laying me aside from an Employment of so great a concernment I do desire that these Things may be duly considered and dealt tenderly in that I may not be rendered useless in future service for God: altho I am unworthy to be improved so I am yours in what I may as God shall please to direct and enable." 1

The people of Saybrook, notwithstanding this feeling, appear to have dealt very fairly with their minister, keeping him nearly three years longer, "giving him full possession of his accommodation," and purchasing it of him for his successor. His services with them closed on the 30th of January, 1666. Returning to Guilford, where he found his father-in-law and many other friends and many of the people of Beauford, with Rev. Mr. Pierson, talking about a removal to New Jersey, he concluded to embark with them, and came to Newark in the autumn of 1666 or in the spring of 1667. It is supposed that he served that town in the ministry until the arrival of Mr. Pierson, Oct. 1, 1667, and then came to Elizabeth Town, where he was engaged both as a preacher and teacher.

He became a freeholder of the town as early as 1668, as the house-lot of Capt. Robert Seeley, deceased, is described, Nov. 2, 1668, as lying "between the Parsonage Lot and Jeremiah Pecks." He had an allotment of one hundred and eighty acres with a third-lot right. Says Rev. Dr. Hatfield, "In the absence of all evidence to the contrary, it is safe to conclude that Mr. Jeremiah Peck came to this town as early as 1668, on invitation of the people, to serve them in the ministry of the gospel, and that he is to be regarded as the first pastor of the church in this place."

In 1672 he became, with others, a purchaser from the Indians of a tract of land in the western part of the present town of Greenwich, Conn. In the autumn of 1678 he accepted an invitation to settle with them in the ministry, and remained there until 1690, when he settled at Waterbury, Conn., where he remained until his death, which occurred June 7, 1699, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

REV. SETH FLETCHER.—The second minister of the town was the Rev. Seth Fletcher. After the removal of Mr. Peck, at the close of 1678, there is nothing on record to show that any minister had become a permanent resident of the town until the summer of 1680, when Mr. Fletcher was employed to preach. We condense the following sketch of Mr. Fletcher from Dr. Hatfield's "History of Elizabeth":

He was the son of Robert Fletcher, of Concord, Mass., who died April 3, 1677, aged eighty-five. Mr. Fletcher made a profession of religion at Hampton, N. H., in early life, under the preaching of the Rev. Timothy Dalton, with whom he studied for the ministry. He married, previous to 1655, at Portsmouth, N. H., Mary, the only daughter of Maj. Bryan Pendleton, a man of considerable property and distinction. Their only child inherited, at his grandfather's death, in 1681, the homestead at Winter Harbor, Me. As early as 1655, Mr. Fletcher became the minister of Wells, Me., but, owing mainly to the laxness of his views on the Sabbath, he was dismissed in October, 1660. From this time until the breaking out of the Indian war, in 1675, he resided at Saco, Me., supplying the pulpit, except for short intervals, from year to year.

Retiring with his father-in-law from the exposed frontiers, he tarried a while at Salem, Mass., where he preached occasionally for the Rev. John Higginson, at whose instance, in 1676, he visited the towns on the east end of Long Island. Fordham, of Southampton, had died in 1674, and had been succeeded until 1676 by John Harriman. He had now returned to New Haven, and Mr. Fletcher was employed as his successor.¹

Mr. Fletcher remained at Southampton about four years (1676–80), at the expiration of which time he was induced to remove and become the minister of this town, in the summer or autumn of 1680. Of his ministry here the only memorial is a letter to Mr. Increase Mather, of Boston, dated "Elizabeth Towne, March 25, 1681." It is a document of great interest, and the earliest ecclesiastical memorial of the town. It presents some facts not otherwise known:

"Rev. Sir,—You may please to call to mind that since I saw you in March (or April) the year past, I wrote a Letter to you bearing date May 28, 1680, and another before that. May 10, 1680, That upon May 10 (especially) being about Mr. Gershom Hobart's 16s. 6d. which he is indebted to mee, and Mr. Trapp's Exposition from Romanus to the end of the Bible (in quarto). I never heard from you since what hath been done with it. I am now more remote and so the more to seeke cash. New York not being such a place for the production of money as Boston is. Be pleased therefore to acquaint Mr. Bateau at the draw bridge foote what you have done, or like to doe, or are inclined to doe about it. I have been much molested with Quakers here since I came. New ones coming in one after another. Upon February last past upon the motion of two of the sect, one of which two is a schoolmr to some children in the towne

(by nation a Scott, by name John Usquehart), by former profession (as fame makes known to mee) a Popish Priest. A scholler he doth profess himselfe to be, and I find that he hath the Latine tongue. The business of that day was for mee to maintain an Assertion viz. That a Quaker living and dyeing as a Quaker (without repentance) must find out a new gospel, which might aford them hope of salvation, for what God hath revealed in his holy word there was no salvation for them in their impenitent condition. I open the trons Explicated by way of distinction of seducers and seduced and so their sins, and likewise what God expected from the one and the other sort, which being done (although there were four or five more Quakers in the throng, yet none appearing in the cause but the scholler aforesaid a Chirurgeon) I demanded of them what they had to say against my Explanation. Instead of speaking pertinently the scholler (whom I understand had been at the University four or five years) begins to tell the people a story of Moses, Ezra, Habacck their being Quakers. Whereupon having the people on account of the business of the day I proceeded to six severall Arguments by which to make good my Assertion, viz. That a Quaker living and dyeing as a Quaker (without repentance) according to what God hath revealed in his word, he could not be saved. I in every argument demanded what part of the Arguments they would deny but instead of answer there was railing and threatening mee that my destruction was nigh at hand. To prove the Minor I continually produced their owne authors and severall things out of their Rabbie's books, which so exceedingly gauled them that then they set themselves to Humming, singing, reeling their heads and bodies (Antique like) whereby both to disturb mee and take off the people from attending to what I had to say for the maintaining the Assertion. Since that (I heare) I must ere long be proved to be a minister of Christ, and they have attempted to raise a great party at Road Island and Delleway Bay against mee as they can. Nay more they say England and their friends there shall heare of it and in special Will. Penn, whom I mentioned once and bot once and then but in my 4th argument, Namely his denyall of Christ being a distinct person without us form his book entitled "Counterfeit Christian p. 77. As for news about Commonwealth affairs I saw a Proclamation of the old Governor forbidding upon Perill the granting any obedience to those in present power, promising open courts shortly. The proclamation was put up here at our meeting house upon Sabbath morn March 1680-1, but before morning exercise taken down, and the day after sent to York. What the issue will be God (in time) will discover. Sir so further to enlarge I take leave committing you to the keeper of Israel, remaining yours to serve you is the Lord.

"I saw Mr. Abraham Person in health upon Thursday morning March 9 at his own house and the next day Mr. Allen (in health also) at my house."

Mr. Fletcher's death occurred in August, 1682. He appears to have been a man of vigorous thought, of scholarly attainments, and of much zeal for the truth, though at one time somewhat lax on the doctrine of the Sabbath. Possibly his controversies with the Quakers in these parts may have led him to entertain more orthodox views on that subject. He was probably nearly sixty years old at the time of his decease. The children of his son Pendleton (who died a captive among the Indians in 1698) settled in the vicinity of Wells and Saco, Me.²

REV. JOHN HARRIMAN.—From the death of Rev. Seth Fletcher in August, 1682, for about five years the town was without a settled minister. Indeed, such a dearth of ministers was there at this period that "within all the province of East Jersey there was no settled preacher except Mr. Pierson at Newark." John Allen was at Woodbridge, but had ceased to supply the pulpit. Watson in 1684 speaks of the "Deacon Meetings," so called, which were resorted to at that time, saying, "And now the people they meet together every Sabbath day, and Read and Pray and sing Psalms in their Meeting-houses."

Rev. John Harriman was called in 1687. He was a native of New Haven, and an associate in his boyhood of many of the younger members of the Elizabeth Town colony. He was the only son of John and Elizabeth Harriman, of New Haven, and "was trained from childhood under the eye of that rigid old Puritan, the Rev. John Davenport, by whom he had been baptized. The old pastor finding him apt to learn encouraged him to seek, and his father to give him a liberal education. In his thirteenth year he came under the instruction of his townsman, Mr. Jeremiah Peck, at that time principal of the New Haven grammar school, and afterwards the first pastor at Elizabeth Town, as already noticed. At the age of fifteen young Harriman was sent to college at Cambridge, Mass., to be educated under the supervision of the Rev. Charles Chauncey. He graduated in 1667, in the same class with Gershom Hobart, and one year in advance of Abraham Pierson, Jr., and John Prudden.

After his graduation Mr. Harriman returned to New Haven and taught the Hopkins grammar school for several years, being also occasionally employed as a preacher at New Haven, East Haven, and Wallingford. During the lifetime of the Rev. Mr. Street he had probably preached for him occasionally at New Haven, and at his death, April 22, 1674, he was frequently called upon to supply the vacant pulpit. In the latter part of that year, or the early part of the next, he went over to Southampton to preach as a candidate for the pulpit made vacant by the decease (1674) of the Rev. Robert Fordham. He accepted a call from the town, and was put in possession of the parsonage "upon terms y^e towne and he hath agreed on," April 12, 1675. Early in 1676 he returned to New Haven, and in July of that year became the stated supply of the pulpit in his native town. He continued there until 1682, preaching most of the time; but the people were divided between him and Mr. Joseph Taylor, who preached a part of the time from 1676 to 1679, and was then settled at Southampton.

In 1682, Mr. Harriman received a call to East Haven. The next year they resolved to build a house for the minister, for which they subscribed one hundred and four pounds and ten shillings, besides the salary of fifty pounds a year which they agreed to pay him, but the parsonage was not built, and he remained with them but a short time longer.

In October, 1684, he was associated with Robert Vauquellin in running the boundary line between New York and Connecticut, having been appointed surveyor for this purpose by the General Court at Hartford, May 8, 1684. It is probable, therefore, that he had been previously employed, and perhaps for years, occasionally as a practical surveyor. Vauquellin had long been so employed in East Jersey, and it is not likely that in an affair of so much importance any but the most skillful surveyor would be appointed on the part of Connecticut. In occupations of this kind he was probably employed for a year or two, when his steps were directed hither, possibly by Vauquellin himself. He had many old friends here, as also had the Southampton people. It is not strange, therefore, that his name should have been suggested and a desire expressed to hear him. He was installed the pastor of this church, most probably Sept. 30, 1687, as appears from the following memorandum in his ledger, under date of Nov. 1, 1694: "we Reckoned & my 7th year payd w^{ch} ended 7 b^r 30th last peeeding this date." All his reckonings with his parishioners are from the same date. Governor Laurie lived a few days only after his coming. The Quaker rule had ceased a year before, and the Scotch were now in power. Lord Campbell had returned home, but Hamilton, his deputy, was also Scotch, and doubtless a Presbyterian.

Mr. Harriman married, as early as 1673, Hannah, a daughter of Richard Bryan, of Milford, Conn. She was born in 1654, and her twin-sister, Mary, was married (1) to John Malthy, of New Haven, and (2) to a Mr. Howell, of Long Island, probably Edward, of Southampton. Another sister, Frances, was married to Joseph Treat, of Milford, and yet another, Sarah, married (1) Samuel Fitch, and (2) Mungo Nisbett, whose name appears in his old ledger. Mr. Bryan, as his father had been before him, was the richest man in Milford. Six children had been born to Mr. Harriman when he came, in his fortieth year, to this town. John was his eldest son (born 1674), and, like his father, became eminent as a land surveyor. Samuel was born June 25, 1676; Ann, July 5, 1678; Mary, in 1680; Leonard, in 1683; and Richard, in 1685. Three sons were born to him here. His family having increased since his settlement, and his salary being only sixty pounds a year, he applied in 1692 to the proprietors for a grant of land, in consideration, also, of his having "expended large sums in purchasing and improving." He received a grant of one hundred acres.¹

He was evidently a man of great exactness, a trait of character greatly promoted by his occasional practice of the art of surveying. Soon after his entering on the pastoral work here he opened an account with every one of the subscribers to his support, noting carefully the amount of the subscription and the times of payment, specifying by whom and to whom, in many cases, the sum was paid, whether in cash or otherwise, whether in merchandise or services rendered. These accounts were kept in two books, the first covering the period from 1687 to 1693, the second from 1694 to 1705. The first of these books is lost, the second is preserved, having been presented to Rev. John McDowell, some sixty years since, by Mr.

William Harriman, the grandson of the old pastor. Several particulars of much interest, illustrative of the town history, have been gathered from this venerable and well-preserved folio. A list of subscribers to his support in the year 1694 is here given, in the order in which their accounts are entered:

The whole number of actual subscribers is one hundred and twenty-four, and the amount of subscription £83 11s. 0d. A very small part of the subscriptions were paid in cash, but such produce, meat, stock, labor, etc., as the minister needed formed the staple. A list of prices current from 1694 to 1705 is subjoined as a matter of curious interest:

for board was five shillings a week; and for teaching "the art of Navigation," three pounds.

He dealt considerably in real estate also. In 1694 he sold to John Miles, his nephew, half an acre of land, on which to build his house, for five pounds. In 1703 he bought of Miles "his dwelling-house, etc.," for sixty-five pounds. The date of this transaction is May 24th. But under date of May 17, 1703, "John Blanchard, gallicus" (Frenchman), is charged with "a house &c sold you to day at £80." Could this be the same, or was it his own new house? Still earlier, March 25, 1703, Aaron Thompson is credited with "his 4-acre home lott at £20," the payment of which was completed May 12, 1704.

He dealt also in slaves, at least for his own use: "We bought the Negro Toney Aug^t 14th 1697 of Charles Tooker jun^r for 48^{lb}." It is probable that Capt. Benjamin Ogden was one of the "we," and that Toney was principally employed at the mill; or the "we" may include his son John. Again, Oct. 28, 1701, he bought of "Mr. James Emot an Indian girl named Hagar," for £19 10s. 0d.

Occasionally he records the hire of a horse, or of a man and horse, for a journey to New England. On one occasion, January, 1699, Joseph Woodruff accompanied him to Milford, Conn., where they had a conference with Governor Treat, as appears from Mr. Woodruff's affidavit in the answer to the Elizabeth Town bill in chancery, page 47.

It appears also that it was customary to take a contribution in the church every Lord's Day, of the proceeds of which an account is preserved only for a part of 1699. A specimen of these entries is here given: "Feb^r 19—cash 19s. 10½d. wampom 11d.—£1 00 9½."

Feb. 1, 1696, John Woodruff, carpenter, is credited with "making a coffin for my dear Leonard;" and in September, "wth a coffiu for my son Alexander." Two sons taken from him in one year! Leonard was thirteen years old; Alexander was at least five or six years younger, having been born in this town.

Of the preaching of Mr. Harriman no written memorials remain, and scarcely anything traditional. It is greatly to his credit that, in the midst of the excitements of 1688, of the anarchy of 1690-92, and of the revolutionary period from 1699 to 1702, he should have succeeded in retaining not only his place, but also the affection and confidence of his people. His sympathies were altogether on the side of popular rights. His manly words of cheer on the Sabbath greatly encouraged the town in their long-protracted struggle against oppression. Like its predecessor, he doubtless had to contend with opposers. The Quakers, under the influence of Rudyard and Laurie, had increased in number and influence, and probably had formed themselves, as in other settlements, into a religious society in the southern part of the town. The Scotch, with their national preference for Presbyterianism, adhered to him and his Puritan Church.

Mr. Harriman was a man of large business. His 100-acre lot "in the plains" he cleared and cultivated. He charges "my lot in y^e plaines," June 6, 1701, with cost of "beer, cake & rum to y^e venturers at y^e clearing s^d lott—£1 7 1½." He rented of Capt. Ebenezer Wilson, of New York, the mill on the creek (the same that "old John Ogden" built at the bridge, and mortgaged Oct. 9, 1668, to Cornelius Steenwyck, of New York), for which he and Capt. Benjamin Ogden, his partner, paid £25 per year. Nathaniel Whitehead had charge of the mill. In 1698 he built a new house in Meadow Street, north of Jersey Street, finishing it, however, in 1701, and moving into it in the fall of that year. Where he lived previously does not appear, probably on the parsonage ground south of the creek, near the present railroad-crossing. His "new barne" he built in 1702, "length 24 feet, breadth 22, height 11 feet." It was built "by Benjⁿ Meaker & Benjⁿ Trottar." Benjamin Pierson, Joseph Woodruff, Alexander Kee-ney, Joseph Osborn, Daniel Ross, and Richard Harriman have each the credit of carting for it one load. The builders received seven pounds. In addition, he says, "the cost of my barne, built this summer, £7 14 0," the "timber getting & framing given me except 18s. To y^e carpenters."

Not content with preaching, pastoral visitation, farming, and carrying on a flour-mill, he had also a cider-press, he had an agency for furnishing glass to his neighbors, he surveyed lands now and then, he attended the Legislature as a deputy, having been thus elected in 1693, 1694, 1695, and 1698. Like the most of his profession, he kept a boarding-school also. His ledger shows that from 1685 to 1702 he had the following pupils under his care, most, if not all, of whom boarded with him: David Selleck, Richard Lawrence, John Potter, John Thelwell, John Wessels, John Ranselere, William Cooley, Andrew Wandler, (his son) Richard, Jereniah Floyd, William (son of John Crooke, of New York), John Manverte, Joshua Swaine, James Robeson, Joseph Tapping, Joseph Meaker, Jonathan Sayer, John Harrison, John Le Roax, Edward Taylor, and Peter Jewey. His price

Mr. Harriman was removed by death Aug. 20, 1705, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The only particular notice of this event is found in the Boston News-Letter of Sept. 10, 1705, as follows:

"Elizabeth Town in Jersey, August 20. On Monday the 20 Current Dyed here in the Afternoon the Reverend Mr. John Harriman, Pastor of the Church in this place, Aged about 60 years: Who the same day at a Church Meeting told his people that the time of his departure drew near, and exhorted them to Peace and Unity one with another, and to stand fast in the Covenant that they had engaged themselves to."

Mr. Harriman probably died of apoplexy. His son John was a merchant and a surveyor, and exerted a wide influence over his townsmen.

REV. SAMUEL MELYEN was for a short time a colleague of Mr. Harriman's before he became his successor in the pastorate of this church. It appears from Harriman's ledger that Mr. Melyen was ordained and installed pastor about the 20th of May, 1704, the expenses of the occasion being £1 5s. 10d. He was the son of Jacob Melyen, one of the founders of the town, and was baptized, with his brother Daniel and sister Abigail, Aug. 7, 1677, in the Dutch Church at New York, where the family then resided. A brother Jacob and sister Susanna had been baptized Oct. 3, 1674. As early as 1690 the family had probably removed to Boston, and soon after Samuel entered Harvard College, where he enjoyed the instruction of that eminent divine, Rev. Increase Mather, D.D. He graduated in 1696, and in 1700-1 taught the grammar school at Hadley, Mass. In Dec. 1702 his name appears as a witness to a will of John Clark, of Elizabeth Town, which shows that he was either a resident here at that time or here on a visit. The memorials left of his ministry are few and very unsatisfactory. "One of his books," says Rev. Dr. Hatfield, "'The Cambridge Concordance,' published in 1697, is now in the possession of Mr. Thomas O. Crane, of Rahway, whose father, Isaac Crane, of this town, bought it of Elizabeth Crane."¹ It is a rare old book and in good preservation. It contains the following beautiful autograph inscription:

"Vita sine literis est Mortis Imago; at Vita sine Christo est Morte peior.
SI CHRISTUM discis, nihil est si caetera nescis.
SI CHRISTUM nescis, nihil est si caetera discis.
Samuelis Melyen
Liber,
Martii, 1^o
Anno Domini, 1702."

It is not known at what date his ministry here closed. Tradition asserts that he was deposed on account of some immoralities unfitting him for the pulpit. Dr. Murray gave currency to the following: "Being strongly suspected of intemperance, the choir, on a certain Sabbath morning, sung a hymn as a voluntary, which he considered as designed to reprove and expose him. Whilst being sung he descended from the pulpit, and taking his wife he walked out of the church, and never again entered it."² Dr. Hatfield thinks this very doubtful, as "the days of choirs and voluntaries had not yet come." However, the doctor says, "His ministry was short, his sun going down behind a very dark cloud." Farther on he says, "That he was intemperate is quite likely. The temptations to this vice were at that period very great."

It is thought that Mr. Melyen was never married, and that his sister Joanna kept house for him. He continued to reside in Elizabeth Town until his death, and held some minor offices. At the Court of Quarter Sessions, sitting at this town in November of the same year, a complaint was brought against him by Matthias De Hart, of the nature of which no record remains. A true bill was found against him by the grand jury, and he was ordered into the custody of the sheriff until he should give special bail. At the sessions of the court in Newark, Aug. 21, 1711, he is reported as having deceased since the sessions in May. He died nearly at the same time with Col. Richard Townley, who was president of the court by which he was indicted.

His will bears date May 10, 1711, and expresses a high degree of faith in the gospel of the Redeemer. He gives thirty-five pounds to Mrs. Ann Gardener; five pounds to his executor, George Jewell; his pewter tumbler and silver spoon to Mrs. Sarah Jewell; his looking-glass and three "Turkey worked chears" to Sarah Jewell; his saddle, pillion, books, bow and arrows, and "portmanteau" to Cornelius Jewell; and the remainder of his possessions to his sister, Abigail Tilley, at Boston. His will was proved July 26, 1711.³

REV. JONATHAN DICKINSON.—The vacancy occasioned by the retirement of the Rev. Samuel Melyen from the pulpit of the church was filled shortly afterward by the ordination and installation of the Rev. Jonathan Dickinson. This distinguished minister and writer was the son of Hezekiah, and grandson of Nathaniel Dickinson, the latter one of the early settlers of Wethersfield, Conn., and an emigrant thence in 1659 to Hadley, Mass. Hezekiah was born at Wethersfield in February, 1646; became a merchant, and resided successively in Stratford, Conn., and in Hatfield, Hadley, and Springfield, Mass. He married at Stratford, December 4, 1679, Abigail Blackman.

Jonathan was the second child of these worthy parents. He was born April 22, 1688, at Hatfield, Mass., removed to Hadley in 1690, and to Springfield in 1695, where he spent the most of his youth. Possibly a portion of his younger days may have been passed at his grandfather Blackman's in Stratford. The worthy minister of Stratford, Rev. Israel Chauncy, was one of the principal founders of Yale College, which went into operation in 1702. Through his influence it was probably that young Dickinson entered the new college the same year, and was received into the family of the Rev. Abraham Pierson, of Killingworth, Conn., the first president, at whose house the students received instruction until his death in 1707. His tutor for three years (1703-6) was John Hart, subsequently the minister of East Guilford, Conn. He graduated in 1706. His classmates were Jared Eliot (Mr. Pierson's successor in the ministry at Killingworth, and highly celebrated as a physician as well as a divine) and Timothy Woodbridge, minister of Simsbury, Conn., from 1712 to 1742.¹

Shortly after he left college his father died (June 14, 1707), and his mother married, Jan. 21, 1709, Thomas Ingersoll, of Springfield, Mass. With whom young Dickinson studied theology, and by whom he was licensed to preach, no record informs us. While in college at Killingworth he may frequently have extended his visits to Guilford, the next town on the west, and here among the Hubbards and Fowlers have met and courted their cousin, Joanna Melyen, the daughter of Jacob, and the sister of the Rev. Samuel Melyen. He may thus have had his attention directed to the vacant pulpit in this town, or the people here may have been thus directed to him. Mr. Pierson, too, who had for more than twenty years been the pastor of the church of Newark, and familiar with this whole region, may at or soon after his graduation (for Mr. Pierson died March 17, 1707) have advised him to go to East Jersey.²

He was in his twenty-first year, a mere stripling, when he came hither in 1708. His marriage to Miss Melyen must have taken place as early as March, 1709, the birth of his first child being thus recorded in his family Bible: "Our son, Melyen, was born Dec. 7, 1709." His wife was more than four years his senior, having been born in 1683. His ministry proved so acceptable that measures were soon taken for his ordination as pastor. The ministers of Fairfield County, who had just become consociated, according to the Saybrook Platform of Sept. 9, 1708, were invited to perform the services on that occasion. The ministers were John Davenport, of Stamford; Stephen Buckingham, of Norwalk; Joseph Webb, of Fairfield; and Israel Chauncy, of Stratford. These with "messengers" from the several churches constituted the ordaining council, together with probably the Rev. Nathaniel Wade, with a messenger from the church of Woodbridge, and the Rev. Nathaniel Bowers, with a messenger from the church of Newark. The Rev. Joseph Morgan had just left Greenwich, Conn., and been installed at Freehold, N. J. He, too, was invited, and it had been arranged that he should preach the sermon. The ordination took place on Friday, Sept. 29, 1709. Mr. Morgan preached from Mark xvi. 16: "Go ye into all the world," etc. The discourse was printed by W. and A. Bradford, at New York, in 1712, and a copy of it is preserved in the library of the Connecticut Historical Society at Hartford. The theme of the sermon was "The Great Concernment of Gospel Ordinances, manifested from the great effects of improving or neglecting them." It was probably abbreviated in the delivery, as "one of the ministers frequently desired him to be brief on account of the shortness of the day and the greatness of the work in hand." He urges the duty of thorough preparation for the pulpit by the adage "A tow lace ill beseeems a silk garment."³

It was an extensive field of labor with the cultivation of which young Dickinson was thus intrusted. The town had been spreading itself in every direction. It included in addition to the main settlement along the creek, the neighborhoods of Woodruff's Farms, Lyon's Farms, Connecticut Farms, Williams' Farms, a considerable population on both sides of the upper Rahway River, and a large settlement on the north of the river at the crossing of the Woodbridge road. A few scattered habitations were found in the present town of Westfield and at the Scotch Plains. Neither church nor minister was yet to be found in the regions beyond towards the setting sun. It was the extreme border of civilization. An Episcopal Church as already related had been organized within these bounds, but its numbers were yet inconsiderable and its pulpit was not yet supplied. Mr. Vaughan had been appointed to the place, but had not arrived. It was a weighty charge to be laid on such youthful shoulders, and yet not too weighty, as the sequel proved. Quietly and diligently he applied himself to his work, and his profiting presently appeared to all. It was not long before he took rank among the first of his profession.⁴

The only information thus far obtained in regard to his compensation is contained in a letter from the Rev. Thomas Halliday, Episcopal missionary, dated "Elizabeth Town, 8th November, 1716":

"In this part of East Jersey there are three large Townships, Newark, Elizabeth Town and Woodbridge which consist of upward of a thousand families the chief settlers of which were New England Independents, who are now old and confirmed in their erroneous way. In each of those towns there is a large Independent Congregation who support their preachers with the allowance of £30 per annum besides House, Glebe, and perquisites of Marriages."⁵

Very brief notices only remain of the first few years of his ministry. He took part, as a corresponding member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 20, 1715, in the ordination of Robert Orr, at Maidenhead, now Lawrenceville, N. J. It was doubtless through his influence principally that John Pierson, one year younger than himself, with whom he had been intimately associated at the house of his father, Rev. Abraham Pierson, at Killingworth, was introduced to the people of Woodbridge and settled there. Dickinson took part, with Prudden, Andrews, Morgan, and Orr, April 29, 1717, in this ordination also.¹

Hitherto the church of Elizabeth Town had remained independent, retaining the forms and usages of the New England Churches. At the time of their organization no Presbytery had been formed in America. It was not until forty years had passed that the Presbytery of Philadelphia was constituted. One after another the churches out of New England were becoming connected with it. The church of Freehold had joined the Presbytery as early as 1706; Woodbridge and their minister, Nathaniel Wade, in 1710; Newtown, L. I., and their minister, Samuel Pumroy (a fellow-student with Dickinson at Yale, where in 1705 he graduated), in 1715; and Southampton (with whom the people of this town were so intimately connected), with their minister, Joseph Whiting, and his colleague, Samuel Gelston, had been received in 1716. Dickinson, it may be presumed from the well-known preferences of President Pierson, was not averse to the change from Independency to Presbyterianism. But he was very young, and needed first to establish himself with his people before proposing any innovations. They were thorough Puritans, and, as has been abundantly exhibited in this narrative, men of spirit. They were slow to part with what they conceived to be their rights. Dickinson was not a member of the Presbytery previous to September, 1716, as appears from the roll. It is quite probable that he united with the Presbytery of Philadelphia at their meeting in Woodbridge, April 29, 1717, for the ordination of Mr. John Pierson, on which occasion he took part in the services.²

At the meeting of the newly-constituted Synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 17, 1717, his name is enrolled as the youngest member. His church also, either then or very soon after, put themselves under the care of the Presbytery. The following year, Sept. 19, 1718, it is noted in the records that "Mr. Dickinson delivered one pound twelve shillings from his congregation of Elizabethtown for the fund 'for pious uses.'" This was undoubtedly the first contribution for Presbyterian purposes ever made by this congregation. From 1719 until after 1724, probably until 1733, he was the stated clerk of the Presbytery, as appears from the record of the Synod: "The book of the Presbytery of Philadelphia was not produced by reason of Mr. Dickinson's absence." He was "necessarily detained by his brother's sickness." His brother Moses had been settled at Hopewell (Pennington) in 1717. He took part, Oct. 22, 1719, in the ordination of Joseph Webb at Newark by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. So rapidly had he risen in the estimation of the Synod that when a standing commission was appointed in 1720 he was made one of the number.³

For the first time the church was represented in the Synod of 1721 by one of their elders, Robert Ogden, son of Deacon Jonathan, and grandson of "Old John Ogden." Mr. Dickinson was chosen moderator. Though he had in good faith adopted the Presbyterian system, he could not wholly forego that in which he had been trained. Against an overture adopted by the Synod, which savored of the stricter and more rigid system of the Old World, he, with five other brethren of like liberal views,—Webb, of Newark, Pierson, of Woodbridge, Morgan, of Freehold, and two Welsh brethren,—protested. At the opening of the Synod, the following year, he preached the sermon from 2 Tim. iii. 17, in which he took occasion to define his views of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in justification of his protest of the previous year. "An excellent Sermon," says Foxcroft, of Boston, "where the true Boundaries of Church-Power are particularly considered, and set in their proper Light."⁴

At this meeting he succeeded, after the subject had been fully discussed, in so harmonizing the views of the Synod by the presentation of a paper on the subject as to carry their unanimous assent, and lead them to a hearty giving of thanks in prayer and praise for the composure of their difference. The church was represented in the Synod this year by Elder Joseph Woodruff, whose affidavit relative to the Newark boundary line is recorded in the answer to the Elizabethtown bill in chancery.⁵

Mr. Dickinson was also fully alive to the zealous efforts of the Rev. Mr. Vaughan, his townsman, and others of the Episcopal ministry to extend the influence of the Church of England in the colonies. The defection of Timothy Cutler, president, and Daniel Browne, tutor of Yale College, with Samuel Johnson, minister of West Haven, Conn., to Episcopacy, in the autumn of 1722, followed by Messrs. Hart, Eliot, Whittlesey, and Wetmore, shortly after, produced a profound impression throughout the country, turning the attention of the ministry and churches, both Congregational and Presbyterian, to what they regarded as "the assumptions" of prelacy. Mr. Johnson, having received Episcopal ordination, was appointed a missionary to Stratford and vicinity, in Connecticut,—the only Episcopal minister in the colony,—commencing his work in November, 1723. One of his zealous parishioners shortly after published a pamphlet entitled "A modest Proof of the Order and Government settled by Christ and his Apostles in the Church." A copy of this pamphlet came into the hands of Mr. Dickinson, many of them, probably, being circulated in the town. He immediately prepared and published, in 1724, at Boston, a reply in "Defence of Presbyterian Ordination."⁶

His antagonist, wholly unable to cope with him in argument, called in the aid of his minister, Mr. Johnson, by whom he was furnished with "a sketch of the common arguments in favour of the doctrine of the Church" of England, which the other sent in his own name to Mr. Dickinson. This drew forth another publication from the latter, in which he affirmed that "High Churchism is properly no more a part of the Church of England than a wen is of the human body." To this, also, Mr. Johnson furnished his parishioner with a rejoinder. "Some time after Mr. Dickinson enlarged and printed his own papers in this dispute, upon which Mr. Johnson thought proper to publish what he had written on the other side."¹

The records of the Synod year by year give abundant evidence of his interest and activity in ecclesiastical matters, as also of the confidence reposed in him by his brethren, his name appearing on almost every commission to which matters of moment were referred. He was appointed, Sept. 20, 1723, to visit certain memorialists in Virginia, and preach some Sabbaths to them within the year following. It is not known whether he went or not. His rare and commanding ability as a preacher subjected him to many invitations to go abroad and be helpful to other ministers and churches.²

That portion of the congregation who had removed back into the country, beyond the Rahway River, had in 1727 become so numerous, and found it so inconvenient to attend public worship in the old meeting-house, that they began to hold public services among themselves on the Lord's Day, and had secured the ministrations of the Rev. Nathaniel Hubbel a portion of the time. The Westfield Church was organized probably at a somewhat later date.³

At the meeting of the Synod in 1727 it was proposed to require of every minister and candidate a hearty assent to the Westminster Confession and Catechism. No action was then taken. In 1728 it was taken up, but deferred until the following year. Mr. Dickinson at once took ground against the proposition. His constitutional love of liberty and his fear of any infringement of the rights of the ministry led him to oppose the measure and present his reasons for rejecting it. The overture had been printed. A response to it from the pen of Dickinson was also printed by Zenger at New York, a copy of which is found in the old South Church library, Boston. It is dated April 10, 1729, and shows that while he himself cordially accepted these symbols of faith, he was opposed to all imposition of creeds of human composition. Having been placed on the committee to whom the proposition was referred, he succeeded in modifying it to such an extent as to unite the whole

Synod, with thanksgiving to God, in the support and adoption of the measure thenceforward known as "The Adopting Act."⁴

It will be remembered that only a few weeks later Mr. Dickinson subscribed at home a paper designed to unite more closely and effectively his townsmen in their opposition to the pretensions of the East Jersey proprietors. Having cast in his lot with his people in defense of their homesteads, he proved himself in that controversy, as in the Synod, an invaluable counselor and organizer in defense of popular rights.

The period in which he served the church was noted for the prevalence of skepticism.

Mr. Dickinson set himself to breast and beat back the waves of error. He prepared and preached to his people a short series of discourses, which, soon after, were printed in a convenient manual edition, with the following title:

"The Reasonableness of Christianity, in Four Sermons, Wherein The Being and Attributes of God, the Apostacy of Man, and the credibility of the Christian Religion, are demonstrated by rational Considerations. And the Divine Mission of our blessed Saviour prov'd by Scripture-Arguments, both from the Old Testament and the New; and vindicated against the most important Objections, whether of ancient or modern Infidels. By Jonathan Dickinson, M. A. Minister of the Gospel at Elizabeth Town, N. Jersey. Cum dilectione fides Christiani: Sine dilectione fides daemonum: Qui autem non credunt, peiores sunt quam daemones. Aug. de charit. With a Preface by Mr. Foxcroft. Boston: N. E. Printed by S. Kneeland and T. Green, for Samuel Gerrish at the lower end of Cornhill. MDCCXXXII."

The author is thus introduced by the Rev. Thomas Foxcroft, of Boston:

"The Reverend and learned Author of the ensuing Discourses needs not any Epistles of Commendation to such as are acquainted with his Person and Character: Whose Praise is in the Gospel thoroughout all the Churches in those remote parts where Divine Providence has cast his Lot. Neither is he unknown to the Publick: which has been favour'd with several lesser Writings of his, formerly publish'd on special occasions; that must have left on the Minds of those who have read them, a grateful Relish, and such an Idea of Mr. Dickinson's peculiar Genius, Capacity, and Judgment, as cannot but prepare them to come with raised Expectations and a particular Gust, to the perusal of the following Tracts; Which it would therefore be as superfluous to recommend to such, as it would be thought vain in me to attempt a profuse Eucodium on them for the sake of others; nor indeed would the known Modesty of the Author indulge me in taking this Liberty."

In 1733 was published, at Boston, "The Scripture-Bishop Vindicated. - A Defence of the Dialogue Between Praelaticus and Eleutherius, upon the Scripture Bishop, or The Divine Right of Presbyterian Ordination and Government, Against The Exceptions of a Pamphlet Intituled The Scripture Bishop Examined. By Eleutherius, V. D. M. In a Letter to a Friend." This book, now exceedingly rare, was ascribed a few years later by Rev. George Beckwith, of Lyme, Conn., to Mr. Dickinson. It was undoubtedly the product of his pen.

In the following year he was called to preach the funeral sermon of Ruth, the wife of his friend, Rev. John Pierson, of Woodbridge, and the daughter of the Rev. Timothy Woodbridge, of Hartford, Conn. The sermon was printed at New York the same year by William Bradford.¹

In 1733 the Presbytery of East Jersey was formed out of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and Dickinson became at once the acknowledged head of the new Presbytery. In 1734 his elder, Matthias Hatfield, accompanied him to Synod. As the early records of the church are not extant, it is only by reference to the records of the Synod that the names of the elders previous to 1765 can be ascertained. Robert Ogden had a seat in the Synod of 1721, and Joseph Woodruff in 1722. In 1730 William Miller represented the church in the Synod; Joseph Woodruff, again, in 1740 and 1745; David Whitehead, in 1742; John Ogden, in 1743; Ephraim Price, in 1748; Joseph Ogden, in 1755, 1756, and 1762; Joseph Lyon, in 1759; Thomas Tobin, in 1760; Robert Ogden, in 1763; and Samuel Woodruff, in 1764 and 1765.²

Dickinson's next publication appeared in September, 1735, anonymously. It was entitled "Remarks on a Letter to a Friend in the Country; containing the substance of a sermon preached at Philadelphia in the congregation of the Rev. Mr. Hemphill, in which the terms of Christian and ministerial communion are so stated that human impositions are exploded, a proper enclosure proposed for every religious society, and the commission justified in their conduct towards Mr. Hemphill."³

In the following year, 1736, Mr. Dickinson again became involved in a controversy about Episcopacy. An unhappy disturbance had been created in the church at Newark by a case of discipline.⁴ Col. Josiah Ogden was censured for Sabbath-breaking in laboring to save a crop of wheat on Sunday after long-continued rains. Being a man of great influence a party was created, absorbing the disaffected elements of the congregation. Though the censure on appeal was removed by the Presbytery, and the Synod endeavored by a kindly interposition to heal the breach, the grievance proved incurable. The dissentients gravitated towards Episcopacy, and sought of Mr. Vaughan and others Episcopal ministrations. In these circumstances Mr. Dickinson was invited and consented to preach at Newark on Wednesday, June 2, 1736. His text was Mark vii. 15: "Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." The sermon was given to the press shortly after, with the title "The Vanity of Human Institutions in the Worship of God." It was called "his famed sermon," and was read with great interest. An answer was attempted by the Rev. John Beach, of Newton, Conn., who four years before had left the church of his fathers and connected himself with the Episcopal Church. He issued a pamphlet entitled "A Vindication of the Worship of God according to the Church of England." "A Defence" of his sermon was published by Mr. Dickinson in 1737, and a rejoinder was put forth the same year by Mr. Beach, under the title "Appeal to the Unprejudiced: In a Supplement to the Vindication of the Worship of God according to the Church of England." The controversy was closed by Mr. Dickinson in 1738 by his publishing "The Reasonableness of Nonconformity to the Church of England in Point of Worship. A Second Defence of A Sermon preached at Newark June 2, 1736, Intituled The Vanity of human Institutions in the Worship of God. Against the Exceptions of Mr. John Beach, in his Appeal to the Unprejudiced. Done in the Form of a Dialogue, wherein Mr. Beach's Arguments are all expressed in his own Words."⁵

In the year 1737, about the time of the survey by Joseph Morss of the land back of the first mountain, the population had become so considerable as to make it desirable that a separate religious society should be constituted. The Presbytery of East Jersey, to whom they applied, granted the request, and sent them Mr. John Cleverly, a graduate of Harvard in 1715, who preached in a log house built for the purpose of small dimensions.⁶

In May, 1738, Mr. Dickinson and his church became connected with the Presbytery of New York, then newly formed by the union of the East Jersey and Long Island Presbyteries.⁷

In the midst of the exciting controversies through which he had passed, Mr. Dickinson had not been inattentive to the spiritual wants of his people. Faithfully and earnestly he preached the word, and diligently he sought to lead his people to the cross for salvation. But the results were not answerable to his expectations. Of the year 1739 he writes: "Religion was in a very low state; Professors generally dead and lifeless; and the Body of our People careless, carnal, and secure; there was but little of the Power of Godliness appearing among us."

³ Samuel Hemphill was an Irish adventurer, who had gained admission to the Synod in 1734, and by means of a fluent tongue had been employed as assistant to Mr. Andrews in the Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. His sermons savored so much of Deism and Arminianism that complaint was made to the Synodical Commission, by whom he was tried, found guilty, and suspended. Benjamin Franklin was one of his hearers, and warmly espoused his cause. It was found, after all, that his sermons were not his own, but were repeated verbatim from the Rev. Drs. Samuel Clarke, Ibbots, and Foster, men noted for their Arminianism. On this discovery he sunk into obscurity. Webster, pp. 110-13, 416-20.

Some time in August, 1739, the people of Newark became deeply interested in religious affairs. The young particularly were remarkably exercised, and many of them were hopefully converted from the error of their ways. The concern at length became general, resulting in a marked reformation among all classes and large accessions to the church.¹

In November, 1739, while this revival was in progress at Newark, the Rev. George Whitefield, then a youth in his twenty-fifth year, whose fame as an eloquent divine and an awakening preacher had preceded him, first visited these parts. On his way from Philadelphia to New York, and again on his return to Philadelphia, he passed through this town:

"Wednesday, Nov. 14. Set out from Brunswick, in Company with Mr. Teonent and my other Fellow-Travellers; and as we passed along we spent our Time most agreeably in telling one another what God had done for our Souls. About Noon we got to Elizabeth Town, 22 Miles from Brunswick. Here we took Boat, and about Four reached New York.

"Monday, Nov. 19. Took Boat about Five in the Morning, and reached Elizabeth Town Point at Seven. Dined with Mr. Dickinson, a worthy Dissenting Minister, who had sent a Letter of Invitation to New York, and offered me the Use of his Meeting-house. About Twelve I preached in it, according to Appointment, to upwards of 700 People, many of whom seemed much affected, and God was pleased to open my Mouth against both Ministers and People among all denominations who imprison the Truth in Unrighteousness."²

In reference to this discourse Mr. Dickinson says,—

"I could observe no further Influence upon our People by that Address than a general Thoughtfulness about Religion; and a Promptitude to make the Extraordinary Zeal and Diligence of that Gentleman the common and turning Topic of their Conversation. I don't know that there was any one Person brought under Conviction, or any new and special Concern about their Salvation by that Sermon, nor more than one by any Endeavours that were used with them that Fall or the succeeding Winter."

In the spring they were favored with another sermon from the gifted Whitefield. On Monday, April 28, 1740, after preaching at ten o'clock A.M. to a great congregation in Woodbridge, he says,—

"After Sermon, I and my Friends dined at the Dissenting Minister's [Rev. John Pierson's] House, who invited me to preach; and then we hasted to Elizabeth-Town, where the People had been waiting for me some Hours.—I preached in the Meeting House, as when I was there last. It was full, and was supposed to contain 2000 People. Near ten dissenting and two Church Ministers were present. I used much Freedom of Speech. No doubt some were offended; But Events belong to God.—After Sermon I intended to ride six Miles; But being overruled by the Advice of Friends, I stopped, and lay at an Inn all Night, near the Waterside where People take Boat to go to New York [E. Town Point]."³

Mr. Dickinson thus describes a revival which began under his own ministry in June, 1740:

"Having at that Time invited the young People to hear a Sermon, there was a numerous Congregation convened, which consisted chiefly of our Youth, tho' there were many others with them. I preach'd to them a plain, practical Sermon; without any Patios or Pungency, or any special Liveliness or Vigour; for I was then in a remarkably dead and dull Frame, till enlivened by a sudden and deep Impression which visibly appear'd upon the Congregation in general.—There was no Crying out; or Falling down; (as elsewhere has happen'd) but the inward Distress and Concern of the Audience discover'd itself, by their Tears, and audible Sobbing and Sighing in almost all Parts of the Assembly. There appear'd such Tokens of a solemn and deep Concern, as I never before saw in any Congregation whatsoever. From this Time, we heard no more of our young People's meeting together for Frolics and extravagant Diversions, as had been usual among them; but instead thereof, private Meetings for religious Exercises were by them set up in several Parts of the Town. All our Opportunities of publick Worship, were carefully and constantly attended by our People in general; and a serious and solemn Attention to the Ministry of the Word, was observable in their very Countenances. Numbers were almost daily relating to me, for Direction and Assistance in their eternal Concerns. There were then probably more came to me in one Day on that Errand, than usually in half a Year's space before. In a Word, the Face of the Congregation was quite altered; and Religion became the common Subject of Conversation among a great Part of the People.⁴

"Tho' there are some of those who were then under special Convictions, that have worn off their Impressions, and are become secure and careless; yet I don't know of any two Persons, who gave reasonable Hopes of a real Change at that Time, but what have hitherto by their Conversation confirm'd our Hopes of their saving Conversion to God.

"I would be very cautious of any confident Determinations, with Respect to the Conversion of particular Persons; but if we may judge the Tree by the Fruits, which we have now had so long a Time to observe, we have Reason to suppose, that near about sixty Persons have received a saving Change in this Congregation only; and a Number in the Parish next adjoining to us, tho' I dare not pretend to guess how many) since the Beginning of this work."⁵

The revival of 1740, it is well known, was of wide extent and of vast influence in the English provinces of America. But, with all its manifest and marvellous benefits, it was not unattended with serious evils, affecting to no small extent the peace and purity of the churches. Ever watchful for the interests of religion, and ready at all times both for aggressive and for defensive measures, Mr. Dickinson set himself to meet the demand of the times. In 1741 he sent forth "The True Scripture Doctrine Concerning some important Points of Christian Faith; Particularly, Eternal Election, Original Sin, Grace in Conversion, Justification by Faith, And the Saint's Perseverance. Represented and Applied in Five Discourses." These discourses were repeatedly reprinted in Great Britain and America. Foxcroft, in his preface to the original edition, gives it unqualified praise:

"In of opinion, a book of this nature has long been wanting among us; and I give unfeigned thanks to God, which put this same earnest care for us into the heart of our brother: whose praise is in the gospel throughout the churches, particularly by means of his elaborate writings in vindication both of the faith and orler of the gospel, and other more practical publications.—I look upon his present work the supply of a real deficiency; and more especially seasonable at this juncture. Now as Paul said of Timothy, I have no man like-minded, so I will presume to speak it, without any design of flattery or offence, I know no man better accomplished (in my opinion) for a work of this kind, than Mr. Dickinson."

He next prepared and published at Boston in 1742 "A Display of God's special Grace. In A familiar Dialogue Between A Minister & a Gentleman of his Congregation, About the Work of God, in the Conviction and Conversion of Sinners, so remarkably of late begun and going on in these American Parts. Wherein the Objections against some uncommon Appearances amongst us are distinctly consider'd,

Mistakes rectify'd, and the Work itself particularly prov'd to be from the Holy Spirit. With An Addition, in a second Conference, relating to sundry Antinomian Principles, beginning to obtain in some Places."

The first edition was anonymous, but sent forth with an attestation, signed Boston, Aug. 10, 1742, by the Rev. Messrs. Colman, Sewall, Prince, Webb, Cooper, Foxcroft, and Gee, all ministers of Boston. A second edition was published at Philadelphia in 1743 with the author's name, and an additional attestation by Messrs. Gilbert and Wm. Tennent, Samuel and John Blair, Treat, and Finley. "No contemporaneous publication," says President Green, "was probably as much read or had as much influence."¹

In 1743 he published "The Nature and Necessity of Regeneration considered in a sermon from John 3:3, preached at Newark, N. J., at a meeting of the Presbytery there. To which is added some Remarks on a Discourse of Dr. Waterland's, entitled 'Regeneration stated and explained according to Scripture antiquity.'"²

In 1745 his prolific pen produced "Familiar Letters to a Gentleman, upon A Variety of Seasonable and Important Subjects in Religion," a work of very great ability, in which he discusses colloquially and familiarly with direct reference to prevailing prejudices the evidences of Christianity and the doctrine of God's sovereign grace in the redemption of men. The way of salvation by repentance and faith is clearly exhibited, and the dangers of Antinomianism are fully set forth. It has been frequently reprinted at home and abroad, and with his book on "the Five Points" is on the catalogue of the Presbyterian Board of Publication.

Out of the revivals of 1741 grew the controversy known as the "Old Side" and the New Side. Mr. Dickinson after vainly striving for several years to bring about reconciliation finally united with the "New Side" party in constituting the Synod of New York.

The first meeting of the new Synod was held Sept. 19, 1745, at the Presbyterian Church in this town, twenty-two ministers and twelve elders being present. Elder Joseph Woodruff represented this church; Mr. Dickinson was chosen moderator. His opening sermon the following year at New York was from Psalms xxiv. 4.³

In the midst of these troubles and anxieties, preaching, writing, publishing, and caring for his own flock and the churches of the Synod, his soul was stirred within him at the benighted condition of the savage tribes in New Jersey and the adjacent provinces. In connection with Pemberton, of New York, and Burr, of Newark, he addressed in 1740 "the Honorable Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge," formed at Edinburgh in 1709, and urged them to send missionaries to the Indians on Long Island, in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. These three brethren were appointed correspondents of the society, and authorized to employ missionaries to the Indians. They prevailed on Azariah Horton, a brother of Simon Horton, of Connecticut Farms, in this town, to undertake a mission to the Indians at the east end of Long Island, for which purpose he was ordained by the Presbytery of New York in 1740. Two years later they engaged David Brainerd for a similar service among the Indians near New Lebanon, N. Y. In 1744 (June 11th), Brainerd was ordained at Newark for a mission at the Forks of the Delaware.⁴ From the time of his removal to New Jersey Brainerd found in Mr. Dickinson a faithful counselor and devoted friend, and in his house an ever-welcome home. At the time of his ordination he spent more than a fortnight here. In April following, 1745, he was here again. In August he came on to consult with Mr. Dickinson. November 10th he occupied the pulpit, preaching in the morning from 2 Cor. v. 20, and in the afternoon from Luke xiv. 22, and took up a collection for the Indian mission amounting to £7 5s. 0d. He spent the next Sabbath here also, and several days afterwards. The first week in December he was here again in attendance on the Presbytery at Connecticut Farms, also the third week in January in consultation with the correspondents, and supplied the pulpit at Connecticut Farms on the 26th. The second week of April found him here again in attendance on the Presbytery, again on the 29th for three or four days, and the first week of July. He met the Presbytery here again on the 22d, and remained three days. He had the fever and ague at Mr. Dickinson's house for a fortnight in October. November 5th brought him back again from his mission too enfeebled for work or travel. And here at his "home" in the parsonage he remained nearly six months, until April 20th (with the exception of four or five days), his last winter on earth, in so low a state much of the time that his life was almost despaired of.⁵

Mrs. Joanna Dickinson, the pastor's wife, had been taken from him by death, April 20, 1745, in the sixty-third year of her age. Brainerd's intimacy with the family was mostly of a later date, the daughters of the pastor ministering to him in his chronic infirmities. The missionary makes the following entry in his journal for 1747:

"April 7. In the afternoon rode to Newark to marry the Rev. Mr. Dickinson: and in the evening performed that service. Afterwards rode home to Elizabethtown, in a pleasant frame, full of composure and sweetness."⁶

In 1746, Mr. Dickinson published another pamphlet in defense of the revival doctrines of that day from attacks made upon them by several Episcopal clergymen of Connecticut, among whom were Rev. John Beach, Rev. Henry Caner, and Rev. Dr. Samuel Johnson. The publications of these men were designed mainly as antidotes to Mr. Dickinson's works, which were exerting a wide influence. He was not slow, therefore, in issuing, in 1746, his reply, entitled "A Vindication of God's Sovereign Free Grace." In some Remarks on Mr. J. Beach's Sermon, with some brief Reflections upon H. Caner's Sermon, and on a pamphlet entitled 'A Letter from Aristocles to Anthiades.'"

It called forth a response from Dr. Johnson, to which Mr. Dickinson wrote a rejoinder called "A Second Vindication of God's Sovereign Free Grace," which was published after his death by his brother, Moses Dickinson, of Norwalk.

MR. DICKINSON'S RELATION TO THE COLLEGE OF NEW JERSEY, NOW PRINCETON COLLEGE.—Mr. Dickinson had long felt the necessity of a collegiate institution more accessible than Harvard or Yale for the colonies this side of New England. Incipient steps were taken by the Synod as early as 1739 to obtain aid from Great Britain for this object, Mr. Dickinson being on the committee for this purpose, "but the war breaking out" with Spain prevented it. At length application was made to John Hamilton, Esq., president of his Majesty's Council, and (by reason of the death, May 14, 1746, of Governor Lewis Morris) commander-in-chief of the province of New Jersey, for "a charter to incorporate sundry persons to found a college." The application was successful, and it was granted, under the great seal of the province, Oct. 22, 1746. Notice of the event and of the intentions of the trustees was duly given in the New York Weekly Post-Boy, No. 211, dated Feb. 2, 1747, as follows:

"Whereas, a Charter with full and ample Privileges, has been granted by his Majesty, under the Seal of the Province of New Jersey, bearing date the 22d October, 1746, for erecting a College within the said Province, to Jonathan Dickinson, John Pierson, Ebenezer Pemberton, and Aaron Borr, Ministers of the Gospel and some other Gentlemen, as Trustees of the said College, by which Charter equal Liberties and Privileges are secured to every Denomination of Christians, any different religious Sentiments notwithstanding.

"The said Trustees have therefore thought proper to inform the Publick, that they design to open the said College the next Spring; and to notify to any Person or Persons who are qualified by preparatory Learning for Admission, that some time in May next at latest they may be there admitted to an Academic Education."

Subsequently, in No. 222, April 20, 1747, notice is thus given:

"This is to inform the Publick, That the Trustees of the College of New-Jersey, have appointed the Rev. Mr. Jonathan Dickinson, President of the said College: which will be opened the fourth Week in May next, at Elizabeth-Town; At which Time and Place, all Persons suitably qualified, may be admitted to an Academic Education."

At the time specified the first term of "the College of New Jersey" was opened at Mr. Dickinson's house, on the south side of the old Rahway road, directly west of Race Street. Mr. Caleb Smith, of Brook-haven, L. I., a graduate of Yale College in 1743, and now in the twenty-fourth year of his age, was employed as the first tutor. Enos Ayres (afterwards a Presbyterian minister at Blooming Grove, Orange Co., N. Y.), Benjamin Chesnut (an Englishman, and subsequently of the Presbytery of New Brunswick), Hugh Henry (afterwards of the Presbytery of New Castle), Israel Reed (shortly after the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Bound Brook, N. J.), Richard Stockton (of Princeton, the well-known civilian), and Daniel Thane (a Scotchman, and subsequently pastor of the church of Connecticut Farms, in this town) were the first graduates of the institution, and were all of them, doubtless, under the instruction of Mr. Dickinson and his tutor, Caleb Smith, with others, perhaps, of the succeeding class.

In the midst of these useful and laborious employments, full of honors as of service, Mr. Dickinson's career on earth was brought to a close. He died of pleurisy Oct. 7, 1747, in the sixtieth year of his age. The Rev. Timothy Johnes, of Morristown, visited him in his last illness, and found him fully prepared for the event: "Many days have passed between God and my soul, in which I have solemnly dedicated myself to Him, and I trust what I have committed unto Him, He is able to keep until that day." Such was his testimony in death to the gospel in which he believed. On the occasion of his burial a sermon was preached by his old friend and neighbor, the Rev. John Pierson, of Woodbridge, which was afterwards published. The following notice of his death and burial appeared in the New York Weekly Post-Boy of Oct. 12, 1747:

"ELIZABETHTOWN, IN NEW JERSEY, OCT. 10.

"On Wednesday Morning last, about 4 o'clock, died here of a pleuritic illness, that eminently learned, faithful, and pious Minister of the Gospel, and President of the College of New Jersey, the Rev. Mr. Jonathan Dickinson, in the 60th Year of his Age, who had been Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in this Town for nearly forty Years, and was the Glory and Joy of it. In him conspicuously appeared those natural and acquired moral and spiritual Endowments which constitute a truly excellent and valuable Man, a good Scholar, an eminent Divine, and a serious, devout Christian. He was greatly adorned with the Gifts and Graces of his Heavenly Master, in the Light whereof he appeared as a Star of superior Brightness and Influence in the Orb of the Church, which has sustained a great and unspeakable Loss in his Death. He was of uncommon and very extensive Usefulness. He boldly appeared in the Defence of the great and important Truths of our most holy Religion and the Gospel Doctrines of the free and sovereign Grace of God. He was a zealous Promoter of godly Practice and godly Living, and a bright Ornament to his Profession. In Times and Cases of Difficulty he was a ready, wise, and able Counsellor. By his Death our infant College is deprived of the Benefit and Advantages of his superior Accomplishments, which afforded a favorable Prospect of its future Flourishing and Prosperity under his Inspection. His Remains were decently interred here Yesterday, when the Rev. Mr. Pierson, of Woodbridge, preached his funeral Sermon, and as he lived desired of all so never any Person in these Parts died more lamented. Our Fathers where are they, and the Prophets, do they live forever?"

His monument in the Presbyterian burying-ground bears the following inscription:

"Here lyes y^e body of y^e Rev^d
Mr. Jonathan Dickinson, Pastor of the first Presbyterian Church
In Elizabeth Town, who Died Oct^r y^e 7th 1747. Aetatis Suae 60.

Deep was the Wound, O Death ! and Vastly wide,
When he resign'd his Useful breath and dy'd :
Ye Sacred Trilbe with pious Sorrow mourn,
And drop a tear at your great Patron's Urn !
Conceal'd a moment from our longing Eyes,
Beneath this Stone his mortal Body lies :
Happy the Spirit lives, and will, we trust.
In Bliss associate with his precious Dnst."

Another monument, by the side of his, has the following :

"Here is interred the body of Mrs. Joanna Dickinson—Obiit. April 20, 1745. Anno Aetatis 63.

"Rest, precious Dust, till Christ revive this Clay
To Join the Trinmphs of the Judgment Day."

REV. ELIHU SPENCER succeeded Mr. Dickinson in the pastorate of the church after about two years had intervened. The eccentric James Davenport, who was at this time settled over the church at Connecticut Farms, is believed to have supplied this church occasionally. A letter of President Edwards, written May 20, 1749, says,—

"Mr. Spencer is now preaching at Elizabethtown, in New Jersey, in the pulpit of the late Mr. Dickinson, and I believe he is likely to settle there. He is a person of very promising qualifications, and will hopefully in some measure make up the great loss that the people have sustained by the death of their former pastor."¹

Mr. Spencer was the son of Isaac Spencer and Mary Selden, and was born at East Haddam, Conn., Feb. 12, 1721. He was the seventh child of his parents. His father was the grandson of Jared Spencer, who came to Haddam as early as 1665. Samuel, the son of Jared, was his grandfather, and Hannah, the daughter of Jared, was the grandmother of David and John Brainerd, who consequently were his second cousins. Jerusha Brainerd, sister of David and John, was the wife of his eldest brother Samuel; and Martha Brainerd, a third sister, was the wife of his second brother, Joseph Spencer, afterwards major-general of the army of the Revolution and member of Congress. A peculiarly close intimacy therefore existed between Elihu Spencer and the two Brainerds. It was at the house of Samuel Spencer, Jerusha's husband, that David Brainerd found a home whenever, in his public life, he visited his native town. To this sister Brainerd was greatly attached, and the news of her death, brought him shortly before his own departure, deeply affected him. John Brainerd was about one year, and David about three years, older than Elihu Spencer. They grew up and fitted for college together. Spencer and John Brainerd entered Yale College at the same time, and graduated in 1746, in the same class with the Rev. Dr. Ezra Stiles, subsequently president of Yale College, and with Lewis Morris and John Morin Scott, afterwards members of Congress. The Rev. Dr. Thomas B. Chandler, of this town, and the Hon. William Smith, the historian, preceded them one year.²

Mr. Spencer was ordained in Boston, Sept. 14, 1748, as a missionary to the Oneida Indians, having been recommended to that service by the missionary David Brainerd, with whom he had spent the preceding winter at Bethel, N. J., in becoming acquainted with Indian manners and customs. Soon after his ordination he located as an Indian missionary at Onohohguaga (Unadilla), N. Y., where he spent the winter. Such were the discouragements of the situation, on account of the incapacity or unfaithfulness of his interpreter, that he returned to Boston to obtain a better interpreter and a colleague. His attention, however, was directed to Elizabeth Town, and he came here, as above stated, in May, 1749. He was installed as regular pastor by the Presbytery of New York Feb. 7, 1750. He appears to have made the following record in his family Bible:

"This day was installed E. Spencer, and took the great charge (onus humeris angelorum formidandum) of the ministry in Elizabethtown, etatis æge 28. The Lord help me."³

Scarcely any memorials remain of his pastoral work in this town. That he was a fluent and attractive preacher is well attested. His ministry terminated here in 1756, about seven years from the time of its commencement, no record being left from which a reason for the separation can be inferred. He subsequently preached at Jamaica, L. I., Shrewsbury, N. J., and finally became pastor of the church at Trenton, where he died, Dec. 27, 1784. He had received from the University of Pennsylvania in 1782 the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. A monumental stone placed over his grave at Trenton bears the following inscription :

"Beneath this stone lies the body of the Rev. ELIHU SPENCER, D.D., Pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Trenton, and one of the Trustees of the College of New Jersey, who departed this life on the twenty-seventh of December, 1784, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

"Possessed of fine genius, of great vivacity, of eminent and active piety, his merits as a minister and as a man stand above the reach of flattery.

“Having long edified the Church by his talents and example, and finished his course with joy, he fell asleep full of faith, and waiting for the hope of all saints.

¹¹ MRS. JOANNA SPENCER,

Relict of the above, died November 1st, 1791, aged sixty-three years.

"From her many virtues she lived beloved, and died lamented. The cheerful patience with which she bore a painful and tedious disease threw a lustre on the last scenes of her life, and evinces that with true piety death loses its terrors."⁴

Mr. and Mrs. Spencer had eight children, some of whom left distinguished descendants. Their fourth child, Margaret, married as early as 1778 Jonathan Dickinson Sergeant (grandson of President Dickinson), an eminent jurist and member of Congress, who was born at Newark, N. J., in 1746, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1762, studied law with Richard Stockton, Princeton, N. J., and died at Philadelphia in 1793. Of their children were (1) the Hon. John Sergeant, born in 1779, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1795, an eminent lawyer and a distinguished statesman, who died at Philadelphia Nov. 23, 1852; (2) Hon. Thomas Sergeant, who graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1798, became chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and died in 1860.

REV. ABRAHAM KETELTAS.—This minister was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church something over three years. He had preached as a candidate six months, beginning soon after the departure of Rev. Dr. Spencer, and received a call to the pastorate on a salary of one hundred and thirty pounds "lite money" per year. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, Sept. 14, 1757, being at that time twenty-five years of age.

He was the son of Abraham Keteltas, a well-known merchant of the city of New York, who had emigrated from Holland about the close of the seventeenth century. The son was born in New York, Dec. 26, 1732. In his youth he resided a considerable time among the Huguenots of New Rochelle, and there acquired familiarity with the French language. He was educated at Yale College, taking his degree therefrom in 1752, and was licensed to preach by the Fairfield East Association of Congregational Ministers, Aug. 23, 1756, soon after which (Feb. 22, 1757) he began to preach for this church. Previous to his licensure he had married, Oct. 22, 1755, Sarah, third daughter of the Hon. William Smith, member of the Council, and judge of the Court of King's Bench. She was a sister of William Smith, the historian, born four years later, in 1732. Mr. Keteltas and his wife occupied a high social position, "consorting with the most distinguished families of both provinces."¹

The accounts of the treasurer of the congregation, Samuel Woodruff, show that the salary of Mr. Keteltas was paid by regular weekly contributions on the Sabbath, averaging for the years 1758 and 1759 about £2 16s. each Sabbath. They also show that in the spring of 1759 the belfry of the church was provided with a public clock, probably for the first time, the handiwork, doubtless, of Aaron Miller, who had established himself in the town as a clock-maker. At whose expense it was provided is left to conjecture, as no charge for it is found in the treasurer's accounts. It had but one face, for the making and painting of which were paid to Mr. Ball, carpenter, and Joseph Woodruff, painter, £10 6s. 9d. Mr. Abraham Woodruff was paid £1 8s. 9d. for a "clock-rope."

The same old account-book tells other tales. Repeatedly the charge is made, "To 1 quart of rum 1/4;" supplied to the men repairing the old church; "June 24, 1758; 2 quarts of rum (@ 2/8 for y^e people to pry up the sleepers;" from which it would appear that the floor of the old edifice had begun very seriously to feel the effects of age. "June 18, 1759, paid David meeker Riding to Collect m^r Spencer Arrerejes, £0 5s. 0d." Mr. Spencer's account was not settled until May 21, 1760. Abraham Woodruff was paid 6s. "for Rideing one Day to Collect yn the Scribition."

At a later date, Sept. 10, 1760, occurs the following: "To Cash for highering a man Calling the Deakens and Elders a Bout m^r Ketteltass, £0 2s. 0d."

This meeting of the deacons and elders had respect to the dissolution of the pastoral relation, which was effected in July, 1760, some slight charges being preferred against the pastor, which, however, the Presbytery passed over very lightly. He soon after withdrew from that body. His residence subsequently to leaving Elizabethtown was at Jamaica, L. I., where he spent the remainder of his life. While having his residence there he was "minister of the French Protestant Church of New York" up to as late as Oct. 6, 1775. He was appointed by his townsmen, Dec. 6, 1774, chairman of the Committee of Correspondence and Observation. He was also elected a member of the Constitutional Convention in 1777, and by his political essays and patriotic efforts made himself so obnoxious to the enemy and the Tories of Long Island that after the battle of Flatbush, Aug. 27, 1776, he was obliged to seek refuge in New England until the close of the contest, leaving his property to be occupied and greatly injured by the British.

His last days were passed in peace in the midst of his family and friends at Jamaica. In the graveyard of the First Presbyterian Church there a memorial tablet makes the following record:

"Sacred to the memory of the Rev. Abraham Kettletas, Obt. 30th Sept. 1798, A. E. 65 years, 9 mos. and 4 days. He possessed unusual talents, that were improved by profound erudition, and a heart firmly attached to the interests of his country. His mind was early impressed with a sense of religion, which fully manifested itself in the choice of the sacred office, in which he shone as the able and faithful divine. It may not perhaps be unworthy of record in this inscription, that he frequently officiated in three different languages, having preached in the Dutch and French Churches in his native city of New York.

"Rest from thy labors now thy work is o'er:
Since Death is vanquished, now free grace adore;
A crown of glory sure awaits the just,
Who served their God, and in their Saviour trust.

REV. JAMES CALDWELL.—After a vacancy in the pastorate of three and a half years, during which the pulpit was supplied by no less than twenty-one different preachers, among whom were Rev. Joseph Treat and Rev. William Kirkpatrick, the choice of the congregation fell upon the Rev. James Caldwell, who had previously preached for the church eleven Sundays as a supply. He was a young man, born in Charlotte County, Va., in April, 1734, and had graduated at the College of New Jersey in September, 1759, and after studying theology under President Davies, had been ordained Sept. 17, 1760, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. He came to Elizabeth Town and entered upon the regular duties of the pastorate in November, 1761. At this time "he was in the twenty-seventh year of his age, a young man of prepossessing appearance, and of more than ordinary promise as a preacher of the gospel."

With the settlement of the new pastor began improvements in a physical as well as in a moral sense. Hence it was voted, April 21, 1762,—

"That the Burial Ground be inclosed with a close cedar Board Fence with red Cedar Posts and that a sufficient Number of Posts be set up before the sd Fence for the Convenience of fastening Horses &c.

"Also Agreed that a Neat Pale Fence be built to inclose a Court Yard in the Front and South End of the Church with a double Rail on the outside with convenient Turnpikes to defend the same from any injuries by Horses &c and the sd Fences with well painted.

"Also it is agreed that the Church be painted within with some light Color—and that any other necessary repairs be done."

The work was intrusted to Mr. Samnel Woodruff, president of the board, one of the most influential men of the town, largely engaged in merchandise.

On the 14th of March, 1763, just one year after he entered upon his pastoral administrations, Mr. Caldwell was nited in marriage to Hannah, the daughter of John Ogden, Esq., and Hannah Sayre, of Newark, N. J. Her father was the son of Capt. David Ogden, and the grandson of the first David Ogden, who came with his father, John Ogden, the planter, from Long Island, and settled this town in 1664. Her mother was a descendant of Joseph Sayre, another of the founders of Elizabeth Town. During the first year of his pastorate Whitefield again visited the town, and preached here twice on Sunday, Nov. 27, 1763.

Rev. Dr. Kempshall traces up to "about this date the origin of two customs in the churches, viz., the raising of the current expenses of the church by pew-rents and singing by choirs. Up to this time current expenses had been met by Sabbath collections, and all singing in the churches was congregational, led by a precentor. In May, 1767, it was resolved 'to offer the pews in the enlarged building at public vendue, agreeable to certain fixed rates, the rents to be paid quarterly.' 'There were few country churches with a choir before 1765 or 1770, and they certainly did not become common until the time of the American Revolution.'"

The parish of Mr. Caldwell was an extensive one. It included nearly all the territory in the present county of Union, embracing the townships of Union, Springfield, New Providence, Westfield, Plainfield, Rahway, Linden, and Clark, which were taken from the ancient township of Elizabeth Town. The old trustees' book shows that in 1776 there were three hundred and forty-five pew-renters and subscribers in the congregation. The ruling elders at that time were Cornelius Hatfield, John Potter, Samuel Williams, and Benjamin Winans. Isaac Woodruff, Jonathan Williams, Caleb Halsted, David Ogden, Isaac Arnett, and Jonathan Price were trustees.

"In the congregation, at the opening of the Revolution, were such men as William Livingston, the noble Governor of the State, who through a storm of obloquy from some of his former friends, and of bitter and unrelenting hatred and plottings against his life on the part of the Tories and the British, remained steadfast in his devotion to the cause of freedom to the final victory. Elias Bondinot, who served on the staff of Gen. Livingston, was appointed by Congress commissary-general of prisoners; was member of Congress in 1778, 1781, and 1782; chosen president of Congress, Nov. 2, 1782, and when the treaty of peace with Great Britain was ratified, April 15, 1783, he had the honor of affixing to it his signature. He received from Yale College in 1790 the degree of Doctor of Laws; was a trustee of the College of New Jersey for twenty-three years, and in 1816 the first president of the American Bible Society. In forwarding from Philadelphia, while superintendent of the Mint, as a gift to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, a pair of elegant and costly cut-glass chandeliers, he said, in his letter bearing date Feb. 26, 1800, of the church, 'The many happy hours I have spent there make the remembrance of having been one of their society among the substantial pleasures of my life.' In the congregation at this time also was Abraham Clark, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence; he had long been a member of the church, and was one of its trustees from 1786 to 1790. He was chosen seven times as a delegate from New Jersey to the Continental Congress. Here, also, were the Hon. Robert Ogden (Speaker of the Assembly at an earlier day), with his three sons, Robert, Matthias, and Aaron, the last two distinguished officers in the United States army; the Hon. Stephen Crane, Speaker of the Assembly; Elias Dayton and his son Jonathan, both of them subsequently general officers of the army, and the latter Speaker of Congress; William Peartree Smith, one of the most distinguished civilians of the day; Oliver Spencer and Francis Barber, both of them colonels of the Jersey Brigade, from whom Gen. Maxwell, commandant of the brigade, received on all occasions, and some of them of a trying nature, most zealous and efficient co-operation, and other such devoted patriots not a few."

"From this one congregation went forth over forty commissioned officers of the Continental army, not to speak of non-commissioned officers and privates, to fight the battles of independence."

We shall not recount here the events of the Revolution, having given that history already in several general chapters of this work. In that history will be found an account of the burning by a party of the enemy from Staten Island, under command of the notorious Col. Van Buskirk, of the court-house and the meeting-house of this parish, in which Mr. Caldwell had then preached for twenty years. This was on the night of the 25th of January, 1780. This was undoubtedly the second house of worship which had been built by the congregation.

In a letter addressed to the Elizabeth Daily Journal of May 12, 1873, Dr. Hatfield says, "Through the kindness of a friend in Philadelphia, I have recently come into possession of an original document, purporting to be an agreement or contract between the building committee of the congregation and the carpenters by whom the old meeting-house that was burned down in 1780 was built." The agreement which follows bears date "this twenty-fourth day of February, Anno Domini 1723-24, and in the tenth year of our sovereign Lord King George, etc.," and is signed by John Thompson, Nathaniel Bonnell, Joseph Woodruff, David Morehouse, Nathaniel Bonnell, Jr., "a committee chosen by the Presbyterian Society of Elizabeth Town for taking care of building a meeting-house for said society." "It will thus be seen," as Dr. Hatfield adds, "that the house was built in the summer of 1724, and was fifty-eight feet in length and forty-two feet in width, and that the audience-room was twenty-four feet in height. . . . An addition to the length in the rear of sixteen feet was made in 1766, so that its final dimensions were seventy-four by forty-two feet."

We may gather some idea of the appearance of the interior of the church at the time it was destroyed from the directions given by the trustees to the new sexton, William Woodruff, elected March, 1766: "Once every three months the alleys below the pulpit stairs and gallery stairs must be washed out and well sanded. For evening lectures you are to get the candles, such as the trustees shall direct, and illuminate the church in every part, and at the conclusion of prayer, before sermon, you are immediately to go up and snuff the pulpit candles and the rest of the candles in the church. When you judge the sermon to be about half finished, you are once more to snuff the candles in the pulpit and at the clerk's desk." (The most serious objection to this rule would be the suspicion that the sexton might be open to outside influences to snuff the candles prematurely.) "You are to be very careful of the silk hangings and cushions that they receive no injury by dust spots. You are to see that the pulpit door be always opened ready for the minister's entrance, and the Bible opened on the cushion. You are to prevent, as much as in you lies, all undue noises and disorders, and suffer no white boys or girls to be standing or sitting on the gallery or pulpit stairs, and if at any time you cannot prevent unruly behavior during divine service, you are immediately to step to one of the magistrates or elders present and inform them of the same. You are weekly to wind up and regulate the church clock." Such, as nearly as we are able to present it to you, was the venerable church edifice in its external and internal appearance.¹ "The church in which Caldwell preached," says Dr. Murray in his notes, "was cheerfully yielded as a hospital for sick and disabled and wounded soldiers, as some of the aged ones yet among us testify; it was its bell that sounded through the town the notes of alarm on the approach of the foe; its floor was not unfrequently the bed of the weary soldier, and the seats of its pews the table from which he ate his scanty meal."

In April, 1776, Col. Dayton's regiment, that had been quartered in town, received orders to march to the relief of the army besieging Quebec. As most of the officers and many of the privates were members of Mr. Caldwell's congregation, a strong desire was expressed that he should serve as chaplain. Lieut. Elmer, in his diary, April 28th, says, "Members of the Presbyterian meeting met about Mr. Caldwell's going to Quebec with us, which was agreed on after some debate."

"Parson Caldwell," or the "Fighting Chaplain," as he was called by the British, who had reason both to fear and hate him for his powerful influence in aiding the patriot cause, was from that time forward to the close of his life occupied more or less continually in the service of his country. "He was at once the ardent patriot and the faithful Christian pastor. The Sabbath found him, whether at home or in the camp, ready to proclaim the gospel, with its messages of mercy and comfort, to his fellow-men, while he was ever watchful at other times to use every opportunity to promote the spiritual welfare of citizens and soldiers. He was held, therefore, in the highest esteem by officers and men, confided in by all, and regarded with enthusiastic love by the rank and file." No one, consequently, save his parishioner, Governor Livingston, was more feared and hated by the Tories and the British. Gladly would they have kidnapped him if they could. Doubtless it was owing to a full appreciation of this fact that he was wont, as Dr. McDowell relates, when returning from active service to pass a Sunday with such of his flock as could be gathered in the old red store-house, to make ready for opening the service by laying his cavalry pistols upon the pulpit cushion, ready for immediate use if required, while sentinels were stationed at the doors to give warning."

When Caldwell and his people returned to their homes in January, 1777, after an exile of six weeks, "they found everything in ruins, their houses plundered, their fences broken down and consumed, their gardens laid waste, their fields an open common, and their records, both public and private, destroyed."

Upon the retreat of Knyphausen's forces from the Short Hills expedition, in June, 1780, the British soldiers deliberately murdered Mrs. Caldwell, the wife of the pastor, who was at that time occupying the parsonage at Connecticut Farms with his family and nine children, having been removed thither by Mr. Caldwell for safety. She was sitting in a back room with her children about her, when a British soldier approached the house, and thrusting his gun through a window shot her dead upon the spot. The few dwellings in the hamlet were plundered of everything portable, and then, together with the Presbyterian Church of the place, were burned to the ground.

While this sad bereavement cast a gloom over Mr. Caldwell and affected him deeply, it no doubt intensified his hatred of the British soldiery, and added new zest to his patriotic exertions. At the battle near Springfield, in the midst of a severe engagement with Clinton's forces, Caldwell, finding that the militia were out of wadding for their muskets, galloped to the Presbyterian Church near, and returning with an armful of hymn-books threw them upon the ground, exclaiming, "Now put Watts into them, boys!"

Such is one of the noted instances of the zeal and ready energy of this truly patriotic and noble man. He lived one month after the surrender of Lord Cornwallis to enjoy the victory, which to him was tinged with a sadness never removed in this world. He had become more and more endeared to the whole community, but in an evil hour he was snatched away by the hand of an assassin. On the 24th of November, 1781, he was cruelly murdered while attending upon a lady who had come over from New York for a visit to her friends in Elizabeth Town, and had landed at the Point. He was shot, without cause or provocation, by a man named Morgan, who had been enlisted as a twelve-months' man in the Continental service, and was then acting as a sentinel at the landing at Elizabeth Town Point. In the absence of any ascertained motive for so base a deed, it was quite generally believed that the man had been bribed by British gold. He was tried by court-martial and executed upon the gallows; but he never made any confession of his object, or of what influenced him to the deed. During the funeral services of Mr. Caldwell the whole town suspended business, and expressed in unmistakable manner the deep sorrow that filled all hearts. Surely among the many trying scenes through which the people of this congregation had been called to pass during the war of the Revolution, none could have been more touching and sad-denning than that which occurred at the funeral, when, "after all had taken their last look, and before the coffin was closed, Elias Boudinot came forward leading nine orphan children, and placing them around the bier of their parent, made an address of surpassing pathos to the multitude in their behalf. It was an hour of deep and powerful emotion, and the procession slowly moved to the grave, weeping as they went."

REV. JAMES FRANCIS ARMSTRONG was chosen to succeed Rev. Mr. Caldwell in the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church after the lapse of some eight months. The general feeling was, no doubt, that expressed by Abraham Clark, who, in a letter from Philadelphia to Capt. Benjamin Winans, dated Jan. 16, 1782, says,—

"I suppose by this time that the murderer of Mr. Caldwell has been tried and received his doom; but that will not restore our loss which will be long felt in Elizabeth-Town. I hope you will not be in a hurry to get another, for few can be found fit to succeed him that is gone. I have one or two in my mind that might answer, but I think that they could not be got till the end of the war, as they are chaplains of the army."¹

Possibly Mr. Armstrong may have been one of the ministers alluded to, as he was a chaplain in the army at the South till the close of the war. He was the son of Francis Armstrong, of West Nottingham, Md., where he was born, April 3, 1750. He graduated at Princeton College in 1773, studied theology under Dr. Witherspoon, and was licensed to preach in January, 1777, but did not receive ordination till Jan. 14, 1778, at which time it appears he accepted an appointment as chaplain in Gen. Sullivan's brigade. He spent the next three years in the service, mostly in the South. He began his ministerial work here in June, 1782, and was married on the 22d of August following to Susanna, daughter of Robert J. Livingston, deceased.

Mr. Armstrong remained less than a year as pastor of the church, his services being terminated by a severe affection of measles, aggravated by exposure in the army. He, however, recovered his health in two or three years, when he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Trenton, and remained until his death, Jan. 19, 1816.

For about eighteen months following the resignation of Mr. Armstrong the church was supplied by ministers mostly of the Presbytery of New York.

NEW HOUSE OF WORSHIP.—Meantime measures were taken for the erection of a new house of worship in place of the one which had been destroyed by the British. At a meeting for that purpose, July 11, 1784, "the Congregation voted that the Trustees should mortgage the Parsonage Land against Mr. Jelf's for as much Money as they can get upon it, to be laid out for building the Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth Town."

The trustees at this time were Isaac Woodruff, Lewis Mulford, Isaac Arnett, Jonathan Price, and David Ogden. The work was immediately undertaken, and prosecuted with diligence. In May, 1785, a meeting of the congregation was held, at which it was agreed that four pews just in front of the pulpit, four next the door, and four pews in the galleries were to be free forever for the congregation; one square pew at the side of the pulpit to be for the minister's family, and the square pew on the other side for strangers, and three side pews near the door for negroes.

The building was so far finished in the autumn of 1785 as to allow of occasional occupation by the congregation, as appears from the following record in the journal of Bishop Asbury:

"Wednesday, [Sept. 6, 1785.] After preaching, this morning, I left the city, oversteaying the hour, the stage left us, and we found ourselves under the necessity of walking six miles; I dined with Mr. Ogden, and preached in Elizabethtown, in the unfinished church belonging to the Presbyterians."¹

He repeated the visit a year later, Tuesday, Sept. 20, 1786, and "at seven o'clock preached and had much liberty."²

The church was dedicated, though in an unfinished state, about the 1st of January, 1786, the sermon having been preached by the Rev. Dr. McWhorter, of Newark. During the whole period from the time of commencing the work of erecting the church the congregation were visited with a special revival. It prevailed mostly in 1785, and extended into the remote parts of the town.

REV. WILLIAM ADOLPHUS LINN, the next pastor, remained but a few months. He was called early in the year 1786; was a man of commanding talents, and of more than usual eloquence as a pulpit orator; was a graduate of Princeton College in 1772, and a classmate of Aaron Burr; was licensed in 1775, ordained in 1776 by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and was a chaplain in the Revolutionary army. It was during his services as chaplain that his eloquence attracted public attention. His reputation in this regard was well sustained as pastor of this church, indeed, too well for the wishes of the congregation, for it caused him to be called to the Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church of New York, as a colleague of Rev. Dr. Livingston, and the Elizabethtown Church lost their pastor, "greatly to the grief, and not a little to the indignation, of both people and Presbytery." "Honored the following year by the College of New York with the honorary degree of D.D., Dr. Linn commanded in an eminent manner the respect and admiration of the city of New York, where he continued to labor in the ministry until failing health compelled him to resign his charge in January, 1805. He died in Albany in January, 1808, aged fifty-five.

During Mr. Linn's ministry here the church edifice appears to have been finished with money raised by a lottery, the grant for which was obtained from the Legislature. The scheme was advertised at length in the New York Gazetteer, June 16, 1786. Isaac Woodruff, Jonathan Dayton, and Aaron Lane were managers. At the settlement of their accounts, in 1789, each manager was allowed two hundred dollars for his services, and thirteen hundred and sixty-five dollars were paid into the treasury of the church.³

On the 7th of May, 1788, a call was extended to the REV. DAVID AUSTIN, a native of New Haven, and a son of David Austin, collector of customs of that port. Mr. Austin was born in New Haven in 1760, graduated at Yale College in 1779, was licensed to preach in May, 1780, being but twenty years of age; yet, young as he was, he preached to great acceptance, and was earnestly solicited to settle in the ministry. He, however, declined these offers, went abroad at the close of the war, spent some time in foreign travel, and after returning to America supplied the Congregational Church at Norwich, Conn., where he married Lydia, daughter of Dr. Joshua Lathrop. He was ordained minister of this parish on the 9th of September, 1788. Mr. Austin, besides being an earnest worker in the church, pushing forward the new edifice to completion, proved to be an able preacher and a literary character of no little distinction. One of the first literary enterprises in which he embarked was the publication bi-monthly of a magazine, entitled "The Christian's, Scholar's, and Farmer's Magazine, Calculated, in an eminent degree, To promote Religion, to disseminate useful Knowledge, to afford literary Pleasure and Amusement, and To advance the Interests of Agriculture. By a Number of Gentlemen."

The first number was for "April and May, 1789." It was "printed at E. Town, by Shepard Kollock, one of the Proprietors." It was conducted with more than ordinary ability. Its articles were mostly brief, instructive, entertaining, in good style and taste, and well adapted to interest and profit the reader. At the close of the first year it was spoken of as a success, and was continued through the second year.

Mr. Kollock about this time was induced to enter largely into the publishing business, and the character of the works issued from his press would indicate that his pastor exerted a powerful and healthful influence over him, at least in the matter of suggestion. Among these were "Sermons to Children," "Edwards' Narrative of the Surprising Work of God, 1735," "Chapman on Baptism," "Dr. Watts' Psalms," "Dickinson's Five Points," and similar works.

Mr. Austin began in 1790 the publication, by subscription, of "The American Preacher," a serial containing some of the choicest discourses of living American divines, without respect to denomination. The first two volumes were issued Jan. 1, 1791, the third volume August, 1791, and the fourth volume in 1793. Other gentlemen were associated with him in the enterprise, but it was his work almost wholly, begun and carried forward by him.

As early as Jan. 1, 1791, when the first two volumes made their appearance, Mr. Austin had begun to take an interest in prophetic studies. Nor was he singular in this respect. Everywhere, under the inspiration of the wonderful movements of Divine Providence, men were studying the prophecies and applying them to the remarkable events of the period in which they lived. The pulpit resounded with earnest utterances on the downfall of Babylon and the speedy coming of the millennial reign of Christ and his saints. Mr. Austin became an enthusiast upon this subject. In 1794 he published, from the press of Mr. Kollock, a volume entitled "The Millenium: or, The Thousand Years of Prosperity, promised to the Church of God, in the Old Testament and in the New, shortly to commence, and to be carried on to perfection, under the auspices of Him, who, in the Vision, was presented to St. John."

At length, on the second Sabbath of May (8th), 1796, Mr. Austin announced that the Lord would surely come on the ensuing Lord's Day, the 15th. Of course a prodigious excitement followed this announcement. In the midst of the ferment Mr. Austin made all his arrangements to receive his adorable Lord in a becoming manner. A number of his followers were arrayed in white robes. On Saturday, the 14th, a crowded and deeply-agitated meeting was held in the Methodist Church. On Sunday the church was thronged; an eager multitude more than filled it. The bell tolled long, but the heavens gave no sign. Mr. Austin, after long and wearisome waiting, took the desk and preached, taking for his text: "My Lord delayeth His coming." It is reported that in the course of the day the clouds gathered, and low mutterings of thunder were heard, adding intensity to the frenzy that ruled the hour. Mr. Austin had so much faith in the speedy advent that he concluded a slight mistake only had been made in his computation of dates, and devoted himself to preaching the doctrine with more zeal than ever, often preaching three times a day, and going everywhere through all the neighborhoods, calling upon men to repent. "Crowds resorted to hear him, and many souls were hopefully converted to God." It was a perplexing situation for the Church, for while the more sober-minded did not sanction his course or his doctrines, all loved him and many adhered to him with great devotion. At length, after many remonstrances with him in private, the Presbytery was appealed to to dissolve the pastoral relation. That body met in New York, May 3, 1797. Mr. Austin being asked if he concurred in the petition, renounced their jurisdiction and withdrew, whereupon the Presbytery granted the application, and put upon record their sense of the whole matter.

Mr. Austin, though having quite a large party in the church who adhered to him, did not remain long in town, only a few weeks, when he removed to Connecticut. It should be added that this wild and visionary course entirely destroyed his usefulness as a minister.

In this state of things it was difficult for the congregation to unite in the choice of another pastor. Several calls were made, but none of them were accepted. In June, 1799, REV. JOHN GILES began to supply the pulpit. He was installed as pastor of the church June 24, 1800, and remained only till the 7th of October of the same year. He came from England.

Shortly after his coming to this town his wife was removed by death, and her remains lie buried in the graveyard, with this inscription on her headstone:

"Here lies the remains of JANE, daughter of Benjamin and Elizabeth Peach, of Westbury, Wiltshire, Old England, and wife of the reverend JOHN GILES, of Elizabeth-Town, New Jersey, who departed this life on the 5 day of August, 1799, aged 36 years. She lived deservedly beloved, and died sincerely lamented."

REV. HENRY KOLLOCK accepted a call on Oct. 22, 1800, and was ordained on the 10th of December following. This brilliant young man, who in a ministry of nineteen years shone as a star of the first magnitude in the ecclesiastical heavens, was a native of New Providence, whither the family had retired from Elizabeth Town for greater security during the stormy period of the Revolution. "An uncommonly bright youth, he was fitted for college at the academy in his native town, entered the junior class of the College of New Jersey in 1792, and graduated in September, 1794, before he had completed the sixteenth year of his age. In 1797 he accepted an appointment as tutor in the College of New Jersey, a position which he held for three years."

Mr. Kollock received license to preach May 7, 1800, and at once, in his very first pulpit efforts, attracted unusual attention. He continued at Princeton until September, preaching every Sabbath afternoon, greatly admired and drawing the largest audiences, a popularity that followed him through life, and that nowhere was more strikingly manifested than among his own townsmen. In the summer of the year following his settlement he visited New England, proceeding as far as Boston, and producing by his pulpit efforts a great sensation wherever he preached,—a mere boy of less than twenty-three years.

Having been requested by the standing committee of missions, then newly appointed, to preach a missionary sermon before the General Assembly, he performed the service at Philadelphia, May 23, 1803, from the text,—John iii. 30,—“He must increase.” The Assembly presented him their thanks, and published the sermon. His reputation as a preacher was thereby spread through the country. Calls were extended him from several important places. The trustees of the College of New Jersey appointed him, young as he was, Professor of Theology, and the Presbyterian Church of Princeton called him to be their pastor. He deemed it his duty to accept these positions, and, the congregation consenting, he was released, Dec. 21, 1803, after a ministry of three years.

In 1806 he was honored by Union and Harvard Colleges with the degree of Doctor of Divinity. About the same time he accepted a call from the Independent Presbyterian Church of Savannah, Ga., and removed thither in the autumn of 1806. He continued in this charge until his decease by paralysis, Dec. 29, 1819, aged forty-one years.

He was married in this town, June 1, 1804, by his friend, Rev. J. H. Hobart, to Mehetabel, the widow of Alexander Campbell, of Richmond, Va., and daughter of William Hylton, of the island of Jamaica. The Hylton family belonged to St. John's parish in this place. Mrs. Mehetabel Hylton, the grandmother of Mrs. Kollock, died here Oct. 16, 1810, aged ninety-two years. Dr. Kollock had no children. His widow survived him.¹

REV. JOHN McDOWELL.—This distinguished minister was installed as pastor of the church Dec. 26, 1804, and remained until his call to Philadelphia in 1833. He was a descendant of the McDowells from the north of Ireland, who settled at Lamington, N. J., about 1746, and where he was born on the 10th of September, 1780. His father was Matthew McDowell, a farmer, and his mother's name was Elizabeth Anderson. At eleven years of age he experienced religion, and at fifteen entered upon a course of study preparatory for the ministry under Rev. William Boyd, who taught a classical school in the neighborhood. Entering the junior class of Princeton College in 1799, he graduated with honor in the class of 1801, pursued his theological studies at Newton under Rev. Holloway W. Hunt, and at Freehold, N. J., under Rev. John Woodhull, D.D., and was licensed in April, 1804, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick.

Such is a mere outline sketch of his early life till the time of his settlement over this church. A few weeks after his installation (Feb. 5, 1805) he married Henrietta, daughter of Shepard Kollock, and sister of his predecessor in the pastoral office. Dr. Hatfield makes the following remarks respecting his ministry:

"In the faithful and laborious discharge of the duties of his office as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of this town he continued for a period of twenty-eight and a half years, greatly favored of God and honored of man. The attendance on his ministrations steadily increased until it reached the full capacity of the church edifice; so that in February, 1820, measures were adopted for the gathering of a Second Presbyterian Church. The number added to his church during his ministry on profession of faith was 921, and on certificate 223; in all 1144. The baptisms numbered 1498, of whom 282 were adults. This marked success in his work was brought about by repeated outpourings of the holy spirit upon the congregation. The most remarkable of these seasons were the years 1807-8, 1813, 1817, and 1826. In 1808 the additions to the church by profession were 111; in 1813, the year of hostility, 100; in 1817, 167; and in 1826, 138. Other seasons of refreshing but not so general were enjoyed, adding to the church, on profession, in 1820, 59; and in 1831, 44. The number of communicants in 1804 was 207; in 1820 660.

"In the year 1818 the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the University of North Carolina and by Union College. He was in high repute, both as a preacher and an author. As a trustee of the College of New Jersey, and as a director of the theological seminary at Princeton, he rendered the most important services to the cause of education and of religion. Calls were extended to him at different times during his ministry in this town from the Collegiate Reformed Dutch Church and the Wall Street Presbyterian Church, both of the city of New York, and from the Presbyterian Church of Princeton, N. J. Overtures were made to him, also, from other quarters, but were not entertained. He was chosen a professor in the theological seminary at Allegheny, Pa., and in the Union Theological Seminary of Virginia. He was also appointed secretary of the Board of Missions.

"In pastoral labors he ranked among the most useful ministers of the church. Every portion of his extensive charge was regularly visited at set seasons every year; Bible classes, embracing a very large proportion of the youth in his congregation, were regularly taught. Sunday-schools were introduced in 1814-16 and vigorously conducted, while all the benevolent operations of the church found in him an earnest and powerful advocate."²

REV. NICHOLAS MURRAY.—The pastorate left vacant by the removal of Dr. McDowell in May, 1833, was almost immediately supplied by the Rev. Nicholas Murray, who was installed June 23, 1833, and remained until Jan. 1, 1861, a period of nearly twenty-eight years.

He was born in County Westmeath, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1802, his parents being Roman Catholics, possessed of considerable means. But he determined to emigrate to this country and leave the inheritance to his brother, and accordingly embarked, arriving in New York in 1818 with only twelve dollars in his pocket. He first found employment at the printing-house of the Harpers, and was soon induced to listen to the preaching of Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, who cured him of his popery, and he became a probationer in the Methodist Church, and soon after a member of Dr. Gardiner Spring's (Presbyterian) church. Here he soon developed gifts which led some of his friends to urge upon him a preparation for the ministry; and he began his study of the languages in the winter of 1821-22, but soon after (as a beneficiary of Dr. Spring's church) entered the academy under Gen. Hallock, at Amherst, Mass., and in the autumn of 1822 the freshman class of Williams College. He graduated under the presidency of Rev. E. D. Griffith, D.D., in 1826.

It is related that after first entering college Mr. Murray's style of writing was very stilted, and that Dr. Griffith took occasion to correct him in his own peculiar and effective manner. Criticising a composition of Murray's full of high-flown rhetoric, the doctor, reading sentence after sentence, would ask, "What do you mean by that, Murray?" The blushing author would say he meant so and so, giving his answer in plain and vigorous English. "Well, say so, Murray," was the doctor's reply, as he would draw his pen through the turgid sentences, erasing a good share of the words. Murray in after-life said that that criticism made him a writer. It taught him that if he had anything to say to say it in a plain, natural, and simple manner, using only such words and figures as would appropriately clothe his thought. It is needless to say that he became the master of a very pure and vigorous style, and that few men of his time excelled him as writers. He became most widely known by a series of twelve essays on popery with the signature of "Kirwan," which appeared in the columns of the New York Observer from Feb. 6 to May 8, 1847. They were addressed to Bishop Hughes, and were published directly after in book form with an immense circulation here and beyond the Atlantic. A second series followed, commencing with Oct. 2, 1847. A sermon on the "Decline of Popery and its Causes," preached "in reply to Bishop Hughes," Jan. 15, 1851, in the Broadway Tabernacle of New York, was published widely. Having revisited his native land and extended his travels to Rome in 1851, on his return he published a series of letters entitled "Romanism at Home," addressed to Chief Justice Taney, which appeared in 1852. His other publications were "Parish and other Pencilings," "The Happy Home," "Men and Things as I saw them in Europe," "Preachers and Preaching," and some other pamphlets. Concerning his ministry here Dr. Hatfield says,—

"He commanded the respect and reverence not only of his own people but of the whole town. In the Presbytery his influence was second to none. His counsels were highly valued also in the Synod and General Assembly of the latter, of which he was chosen moderator in 1849. In the conflicts that resulted in the division of the Presbyterian Church in 1837-38 he took an active part, and cast his lot with the Old School portion, carrying his church and Presbytery with him. Large accessions of converts, particularly in 1834, 1836, 1842-43, and 1858, attested the faithfulness of his ministry. His labors resulted in a steady growth of the congregation in numbers and effectiveness, so that at the close of his ministry he could say, Jan. 1, 1861, 'A glorious meeting in the First Church to-day. The first time in all its history it was declared out of debt with a balance in the treasury, with a yearly income to meet all its expenditures, and about four thousand dollars in funds for the poor and to keep the graveyard in repair.'"

Notwithstanding he received repeated and urgent calls to many large and influential churches in the chief cities of the Union he uniformly declined, "preferring to live and die among his own people, greatly to their satisfaction and delight." He died suddenly on the morning of the 4th of February, 1861, of what was pronounced acute rheumatism of the heart, having been attacked in robust health on Friday, February 1st. The whole community was deeply affected by the event, and at the time of his funeral all business in the city was suspended.¹

REV. EVERARD KEMPERSHALL, the present pastor of the church, was installed Sept. 18, 1861. He was formerly pastor at Buffalo and Batavia, N. Y. During his ministry, now of twenty years' standing, large accessions have been made to the membership, and the church is enjoying a high degree of prosperity.

CHAPTER XXXI.

St. John's Church (Protestant Episcopal).—In the second year of the reign of Queen Anne, Lord Cornbury was sent to the province of New Jersey as royal Governor. Among the instructions which he received was the following in respect to matters of religion:

"You shall take especial care that God Almighty be devoutly and duly served throughout your Government, the Book of Common Prayer as by Law established read each Sunday and Holy-day, and the Blessed Sacrament administered according to the Rites of the Church of England."²

It is altogether probable that the Governor received this instruction in accordance with a plan which had just been set on foot in England for the extension of the national church in the colonies. "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts" had recently been incorporated, and their first missionaries to America, George Keith and John Talbot, had been appointed and sent out. Keith had been in America, and from 1685 to 1688 had been surveyor-general of East Jersey. He was a native of Aberdeen, Scotland, born in 1638, and, although brought up a Presbyterian, became a preacher among the Quakers on his return to England. His commanding abilities and scientific attainments (bred as he was at the University of Aberdeen) gave him great influence among the Quakers, and made him the leader of the orthodox party among them. In 1700 he left them, and was ordained a priest by the Bishop of London. He returned to America in June, 1702, and traveled extensively for nearly two years, principally among his old friends. Here in this town and its vicinity he had numerous acquaintances, and of course it was not difficult to gather for him an audience among his old neighbors and friends. At the house of Andrew Craig, a fellow-Scotchman (with whom probably he had been acquainted at home before they came to America in 1682), he was hospitably entertained, and there, Friday, Nov. 3, 1703, he preached from 2 Pet. i. 5, on the Christian graces. On the same occasion he baptized the four children of Mr. Craig. The next day, he says, "I baptized the children of Andrew Hemton [Hampton], eight in number. He and his wife are come over from Quakerism to the Church. And November 3d I baptized seven children of a widow woman there." At the end of six weeks he returned, and at the invitation of Col. Townley performed divine service at his house twice on Sunday, December 19th.

This was the first occasion, doubtless, of a separate service of public worship on the Sabbath since the settlement of the town, a period of thirty-nine years. (Governor Carteret, as Dankers informs us, went "often to New York and generally to Church." Others may have done the same.) It must have been quite a trial to Mr. Harriman and his people to have a rival interest in the town. But the establishment of an Episcopal Church was a foregone conclusion. The Governor, Lord Cornbury, had just been holding his first General Assembly for four weeks at Amboy, and had certainly prepared the way for such a movement in the several towns of the province. On the previous Sunday (the 12th), and on Christmas-day following, Keith preached at Amboy; on the 12th "at my Lord Cornbury's lodgings, where he was present."³

It was about the winter of 1705-6 that the first Episcopal congregation of this town was gathered, and the foundations of St. John's Church laid. This work was principally effected by their first minister, the REV. JOHN BROOKE.—No record appears of his early life. He is believed to have been the John Brooke who took his Bachelor's degree at Emmanuel College,¹ Cambridge, in 1700, and his Master's degree in 1704. Having been admitted to orders in the Church of England, he was appointed by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts one of their missionaries to America. About four weeks after his arrival he wrote as follows, Aug. 20, 1705:

"I arrived safe in East New Jersey July 15, and thence went to my Lord Cornbury, our Governor, who, after he had perused your letter, advised me to settle at Elizabeth Town and Perth Amboy. There are five Independent Ministers in and about the places I preach at, and the greatest part of the people are followers of them. But I question not (thru' God's blessing), but if you please to permit me to have only Elizabeth Town, Ambley, and the adjacent Towns under my care, and to allow me enough to subsist upon without depending upon the People, that I shall gain a considerable Congregation in a very few years. As for those that are of the Church of England already, their number is very inconsiderable, and I expect nothing from them for some years seeing they are like to be at an extraordinary charge in building of a Church at each place.

The erection of St. John's appears to have been undertaken about a year later; for Mr. Brooke writes, Oct. 11, 1706, "I laid the foundation of a Brick church at Elizabeth Town on St. John the Baptist's day, whose name it bears. It is fifty feet long, thirty wide, and twenty-one high,—it hath nine windows,—one in the East end, ten foot wide and fifteen high, two in each side, six foot wide and ten high, and four ovals—of the East window, one in the west end, and one over each door, which are near the west end. The church is now covering, and I hope to preach in it in six weeks or two months. Wee shall only get the outside of our church up this year, and I am afraid it will be a year or two more before we can finish the inside, for I find these hard times a great many very backward to pay their subscriptions." Col. Richard Townley gave the ground for the church and burial-place, and the edifice was erected chiefly through his care and diligence.²

The manner in which the society got along before the church was ready for occupancy is shown in the following extract from a letter of Mr. Brooke, dated Oct. 11, 1706, in which he also alludes to the Rev. Mr. Harriman, who died suddenly of apoplexy, as having been struck with death for his opposition to Episcopacy, a superstition which even a good man at that day might have sincerely entertained:

"Col. Townley's house (wherein I preached at first) in half a year's time grew too little for my congregation, and the best place we could get to meet in was a barn, which in harvest we were obliged to relinquish, whereupon the Dissenters, who presently after I came were destitute of their old teachers (one of them being struck with death in their meeting-house as he was railing against the church, and the other being at Boston), would not suffer me upon my request to officiate in their meeting-house unless I would promise not to read any of the prayers of the church, which I complied with upon condition I might read the psalms, lessons, epistle, and gospel appointed for the day, which I did and said all the rest of the service by heart, the doing of which brought a great many to hear me who otherwise, probably, would never have heard the service of the church, and (through God's blessing) hath taken away their prejudice to such a degree as that they have invited me to preach in their meeting-house till our church be built. Their teacher begins at eight in the morning and ends at ten, and then our service begins, and in the afternoon we begin at two. The greatest part of the Dissenters generally stay to hear all our service."

Mr. Hatfield says, referring to this letter, "The early hour at which public worship was held, eight o'clock A.M., deserves notice. This must have been an established custom. It is not probable that they gave up their ordinary hours of service to accommodate a rival interest." In any view the old church manifested a generous spirit towards their Episcopal neighbors in sharing their sanctuary with them as they did for some time.

Mr. Brooke seemed to have labored very conscientiously and diligently in his vocation. He performed no small amount of missionary work. "Upon my arrival here," he says, "instead of a body of church people to maintain me, I only met with a small handful, the most of which could hardly maintain themselves, much less build churches or maintain me. Upon which, being almost discouraged to find the church had got so little footing in these parts, I resolved heartily and sincerely to endeavor to promote her so much as in my power, in order to which I began to preach, catechize, and expound twelve, fourteen, sometimes fifteen days per month (which I still do), and on other days to visit the people, through which means, by the blessing of God, my congregations increased everywhere, so that I found very great necessity for churches."

Towards the building of five churches and printing a tract he contributed fifty pounds, and besides he says,—

"It hath cost me above £10 in riding about the Provinces of New York and Pennsylvania, and this to get subscriptions. I could not have given near so much out of your £100 per annum had not I been very well stocked with cloaths I brought from England and had had some money of my own. For I ride so much I'm obliged to keep two horses, which cost me £20, and one horse cannot be kept well under £10 or £11 per annum. 'Twill cost a man near £30 per annum to board here, and sure 'twill cost me much more who, pilgrim-like, can scarce over be three days together at a place. All clothing here is twice as dear at least as 'tis in England, and riding so much makes me wear out many more than I ever did before. The Ferries which I've frequently to cross, and everything else I've occasion for here, are very chargeable, and I've nothing to defray all my charges but what I receive from your Society; neither can I expect anything from my people before their churches be finished. To ask anything [from them] yet would be a means to deter people from joyning with me, and would be looked upon as offensive. I've so many places to take care of that I've scarce any time to study; neither can I supply any of them so well as they should be. I humbly beg, therefore, you'll be pleased to send a minister to take the charge of Elizabeth Town and Rahway upon him, and I'll take all the care I can of the rest."³

The secretary of the society, Rev. Dr. Humphreys, said of him,—

"Mr. Brook nee exceeding diligence in his cure, and was pleased to find the best of all sorts of people coming over to the Church of England. He exerted himself and at times used to perform Divine service at seven places, fifty miles in extent, namely, at Elizabethtown, Rahway, Perth Amboy, Cheesequunks, Piscataway, Rock Hill, and in a congregation at Page's. This duty was very difficult and laborious."¹

The ministry of Mr. Brooke came to an abrupt termination in November, 1707. The Rev. Thorowgood Moore, of Burlington, had, by his faithful rebuke of Lord Cornbury's disgusting immoralities, drawn upon himself the wrath of the Governor, by whom he was arrested and imprisoned at New York. Mr. Brooke deeply sympathized with his afflicted brother, and when in prison visited him. Mr. Moore escaping, and Mr. Brooke being sought for by the enraged Governor, they resolved to proceed to London, and lay their grievances before the proper authorities at home. They embarked at Marblehead, Mass., in November, 1707, for England, but the vessel was lost at sea, and all on board perished.²

Mr. Brooke seems to have been greatly esteemed and much lamented. The Rev. Mr. Talbot says of him and Mr. Moore, they are "the most pious and industrious missionaries that ever the honorable Society sent over." "Honest Elias Neau," as Col. Morris called him, said of them, they "Were assuredly an honor to the mission, and labored with much vigor for the enlargement of the Kingdom of our glorious Redeemer, and we may say, without prejudice to the rest, that they were the glory of all the missionaries the illustrious Society has sent over hither. The purity and candor of their manners preached as efficaciously as their mouths, inasmuch that we cannot sufficiently lament the loss of these two good servants of God, whose crime was for opposing and condemning holdly vice and immorality."

His people, years afterwards, spoke of him as their "worthy and never to be forgotten pastor, whose labors afforded them universal satisfaction."³

He left a widow, the younger of the two daughters of Capt. Christopher Billop, whose residence and large plantation at the southern extremity of Staten Island gave to it the name of Billop's Point, which it still retains. Subsequently she became the wife of the Rev. William Skinner, of Amboy, but died without issue.

After the departure of the Rev. Mr. Brooke for England, November, 1707, the church was without a minister for nearly two years, being supplied occasionally by the Rev. John Talbot, of Burlington. At length, in the summer of 1709, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel appointed and sent out the

REV. EDWARD VAUGHAN, who arrived in the autumn and commenced his ministry. He was from the west of England, and a brother of the Rev. Robert Vaughan, rector of Llantewy and vicar of Llantrisant, Monmouthshire, Wales, and of Jane, the wife of Thomas Godden, of Leather Lane, near Holborn, London. His prospects were by no means flattering. Writing from Amboy, Dec. 4, 1709, he says,—

"I believe that the most inveterate enemies of our mother church would recant their pernicious notions were there a faithful pastor in every town to instill better principles into their minds; here are a vast number of Deists, Sabbatarians, and Eutychians, as also of Independents, Anabaptists, and Quakers, from which absurdities Mr. Brooke brought a considerable number of them to embrace our most pure and holy Religion, and I hope that my labors also will be attended with no less success, and observe that those late converts are much more zealous for promoting the interests of our church, and more constant in the public worship of God, than those who sucked their milk in their infancy."

Referring to the decease, in August, 1709, of the Rev. Mr. Urquhart, of Jamaica, he adds,—

"Whose cure I have been solicited to supply, but declined it in obedience to the Society's instructions, whose leave and approbation for my removal to that cure I must humbly beg for these following reasons: 1st. That there is not one family in Elizabeth Town that can accommodate me with an ordinary lodging excepting Colonel Townly, who, upon the account of some difference with Mr. Brooke (though a gentleman of an unblemished character), hath declared never to entertain any missionary after him. Secondly. That my salary of £50 per annum will not afford me a competent subsistence in this dear place where no contributions are given by the people towards my support, and where I am continually obliged to be itinerant and consequently at great expenses, especially in crossing Ferries."⁴

Mr. Vaughan seems not to have obtained the desired leave, but proceeded to cultivate diligently the field assigned him. At the expiration of a year, Dec. 4, 1710, he informs the secretary that "These people have not contributed anything towards my subsistence since I came amongst them, and, indeed, to desire it from them, or to show an inclination for it, would very much tend to the disservice of the Church, in causing our proselytes to start from us rather than bear the weight of such burthens, which to their weak shoulders and poverty would seem intolerable. I frequently visit the Dissenters of all sorts in their houses, and I experimentally find that an affable even temper with the force of arguments is very prevalent to engage their affections and conformity to holy mother the Church, which I do assure you is considerably increased by late converts from Quakerism and Anabaptism."⁵

It is mainly from this periodical report to the society that his life and labors are to be sketched. He writes, Sept. 12, 1711, a few months after the decease of Col. Richard Townley (the main pillar of St. John's at that early period), as follows:

"I preach to them in the fore and afternoon of every Lord's day, and administer the blessed Sacrament monthly to twenty-eight or thirty communicants. I have baptized since my arrival to this government seventy-two children, besides eleven adult persons, unfortunately brought up in dark Quakerism and Anabaptism, and are now so happy as to be members of the Church of Christ, whose worship they constantly frequent with great devotion and seeming delight."⁶

In the summer of 1711 the Rev. Thomas Halliday was sent by the society to take charge of Amboy and Piscataway, and Mr. Vaughan divided his labors between the town proper and that part of it called Rahway, a monthly lecture being given to the latter place. Shortly after the decease of Col. Townley the congregation obtained from his son Charles a clear title to the church lot, for want of which the interior of the church had not been "fitted according to the rules of decency and order."

Owing to a serious disaffection in the Presbyterian Church of Woodbridge a few families withdrew and formed an Episcopal society. Mr. Vaughan was requested to officiate there occasionally in a house built for the purpose, "probably the smallest you have ever seen, but amply sufficient for the congregation at this day."

Mr. Halliday proved to be utterly unworthy of his office, and in 1713 was obliged to leave Amboy, when Mr. Vaughan was requested to include that place within his parochial district. Mrs. Mary Emott, the widow of James Emott, of New York, and a daughter of Mrs. Philip Carteret, had been, doubtless, a frequent visitor at the house of her step-father, Col. Townley. Her husband had died in April, 1713, leaving her with four sons and a handsome "fortune of £2000." She was about forty-eight years old, and of high social standing. Mr. Vaughan was accepted as her second husband. They were married at the close of the first year of her widowhood.¹

By his marriage he came into possession of the house and grounds afterwards owned and occupied by Col. William Ricketts, on the Point road.

At or soon after his marriage he removed to Amboy, for the benefit of his health, "which," he says, "was much impaired during my abode in Elizabeth Town, where I still do and shall continue to officiate in the fore and afternoon three Lord's Days successively in every month," the other being given to Amboy. The society seem not to have favored this plan of non-residence, and he returned to his former charge, and was residing here in 1721. He continued to divide his time between the several stations as before, giving the chief attention to this town. Writing, July 8, 1717, he says,—

"Elizabeth Town itself is a considerable village, and equals if not exceeds any in the Province as well in bigness as in number of Inhabitants. Custom and education has engaged them for the most part in the Congregational way, but notwithstanding they are not so very rigid in that persuasion as altogether to deny their attendance on my ministry."²

The church, which had been erected of brick in 1706, had not yet been finished. The congregation grew but slowly, and the most they could raise for their minister was thirty pounds, without a glebe or parsonage. Yet they say of their minister in a letter to the society,—

"We esteem ourselves happy under his pastoral care, and have a thorough persuasion of mind that the Church of Christ is now planted among us in its purity. Mr. Vaughan bath, to the great comfort and edification of our families in these dark and distant regions of the world, prosecuted the duties of his holy calling with the utmost application and diligence; adorned his character with an exemplary life and conversation, and so behaved himself with all due prudence and fidelity, showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, and sound speech, that they who are of the contrary part have no evil thing to say of him."³

In 1721 his audience had increased to two hundred souls, and the communicants were more than forty in number. For ten years no memorial of him is found. But Oct. 6, 1731, he writes,—

"My congregation encreaseth not only in this Town, but in the neighboring Towns of Newark, Whippany, and the Mountains [Orange] where I visit and preach to a numerous assembly occasionally and in the wilderness and dispense the Sacrament to them. I have baptized here and elsewhere within the compass of two years last past 556 children besides 64 adults, and find in the people a general disposition to receive the Gospel according to the way and manner taught and established in the Church of England."⁴

In 1734 the communicants were seventy. In the year ending May 29, 1739, he baptized one hundred and twenty-nine infants and three adults, and the number of communicants was eighty-four. A glebe "of nine acres of good land, with a fine orchard thereon," had been acquired "by the Piety and favor of a very worthy widow, Mrs. Anne Arskins [Ersine], of Elizabeth Town."⁵

Mr. Vaughan continued in the work of the ministry, as the rector of St. John's Church, until his decease about the 12th of October, 1747, "far advanced in years." The memory of Mr. Vaughan was very precious to the people of his charge.

The vacancy in the rectorship caused by the death of Mr. Vaughan was not easily filled. Hitherto all Episcopal clergymen had either come from England, or had been obliged to go there to receive orders. In these circumstances the vestry of St. John's were advised to secure the services of a catechist, or lay reader, which they did in the person of Thomas Bradbury Chandler, who had been teaching a school at Woodstock, Conn., and studying theology at intervals with the Rev. Dr. Johnson. He was a young man of good promise, who had graduated at Yale College in 1745, and was twenty-two years old when he came to this town, about the 1st of December, 1747. In commending him at the "request of the good people of Elizabeth Town," Dr. Johnson spoke of him as having "known him three years at least," and as "a truly valuable person, of good parts, and competent learning for his time and our circumstances, and of good morals and virtuous behaviour." He was consequently appointed by the "venerable society" in May, 1748, their "catechist at Elizabeth Town, in New Jersey," on a stipend of £10 a year, the church obliging themselves that, in case he should be appointed to the mission, to "raise the sum of £50 Current Money of the Province per annum, and to provide him a convenient parsonage."⁶

Mr. Chandler prospered well in his vocation as catechist and lay reader. But St. John's was urgent for a resident rector, who should give them his whole time. Among the reasons assigned was the fact that "the Dissenters in this town have five Ministers settled, constantly to officiate in publick, to visit them in private, ready to serve on any particular occasion, and, in a word, that are always with and among them." These five Presbyterians were Messrs. Spencer, of the First Church; Symmes, of New Providence and Springfield; Grant, of Westfield; Thane, of Connecticut Farms; and Richards, of Rahway.

In the summer of 1751, Mr. Chandler repaired to England, was admitted to the priesthood by Dr. Thomas Sherlock, Bishop of London, and early in September sailed again for America, arriving at home after a passage of nine weeks, about the 1st of November. His salary or stipend was fixed at thirty pounds sterling from the society, and sixty pounds New Jersey currency (valued at little more than thirty pounds sterling) with a house and glebe from the people. The communicants had increased from forty to sixty.

REV. THOMAS BRADBURY CHANDLER was a descendant of William Chandler, who, with his wife, Hannah, and four children,—Hannah, Thomas, John, and William,—came to this country from England, and settled at Roxbury, Mass., in 1637. His son John, born in England in 1635, married, Feb. 16, 1659, Elizabeth, daughter of William Douglas, and had eight children,—John, Elizabeth, John (2d), Joseph, Hannah, Mehitable, Sarah, and Joseph, all born at Roxbury. In 1686 he united with several of his neighbors in the settlement of Woodstock, Conn., of the church of which he was chosen deacon, and where, too, he died, April 15, 1703. His son John, born April 16, 1665, married, Nov. 10, 1692, Mary, daughter of Joshua Raymond, of New London, and had ten children,—John, Joshua, William, Mary, Elizabeth, Samuel, Sarah, Mehitable, Thomas, and Hannah. His son William, born at Woodstock, Nov. 3, 1698, married Jemima Bradbury, who is thought to have been a daughter of Thomas Bradbury, of Salisbury, Mass., whose father, William, married, March 12, 1672, Rebecca, the widow of Samuel Maverick, and daughter of the Rev. John Wheelwright. Her father was born Dec. 24, 1674. Her son, Thomas Bradbury, was born April 26, 1726.

Mr. Chandler's early years were spent on the paternal farm, and, as we have said, he entered Yale College, where he graduated at the age of twenty in 1745. His settlement here as catechist was in 1747, and as rector in 1751, on his return from England.

His first official act after his return was the baptism, November 3d, of Matthias, the son of Matthias Williamson and Susannah Halstead. His first marriage service was on the 10th, and the parties were Robert Milbourn and Mary, daughter of Elias Thomas, both of Elizabeth Town. In the course of the following year, 1752, he was himself married to Jane, the daughter of Capt. John Emott, and Mary, the daughter of Elias Boudinot, Sr.

At the close of 1754 the congregation included eighty-five families, and the communicants numbered ninety. But the pecuniary strength of the parish had decreased. Of the sixty pounds engaged by subscription, twenty-eight pounds had dropped by deaths and removals; most of the principal parishioners had died or moved off, and the greater part were poor, many of them being "the proper objects of every kind of charity." The missionary was in straits, provisions of all kinds being as dear in this town as in the most populous cities of the land, meat of all sorts being actually dearer here than in the New York market. On these accounts he asked for an increase of his stipend from the society in England, which was probably granted.

In 1757, during the prevalence of the smallpox, of which President Edwards and his daughter, Mrs. Burr, died in the spring of 1758, Mr. Chandler was prostrated by the terrible scourge, and did not recover from its ill effects for nearly three years, his face retaining its footprints to the end of life. In 1766 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. For some time after this Dr. Chandler was engaged quite largely in a pamphlet controversy with several leading Dissenting divines on the merits of Episcopacy and anti-Episcopacy, having in 1767 issued an "Appeal to the Public in behalf of the Church of England in America: Wherein the Original and Nature of the Episcopal Office are briefly considered, Reasons for sending Bishops to America are assigned, The Plan on which it is proposed to send them is stated, and the Objections against sending them are obviated and confuted. With an Appendix, giving a brief account of an Anonymous Pamphlet. pp. 118."

This was replied to by Rev. Dr. Chauncy, of Boston, in 1768, and Dr. Chandler rejoined in "The Appeal Defended," which was soon answered by Dr. Chauncy in a "Reply to Dr. T. B. Chandler's Appeal," which drew forth a rejoinder from the latter comprising 240 pages, entitled "The Appeal farther Defended, in Answer to the further Misrepresentations of Dr. Chauncy."

Notwithstanding this pamphlet controversy, Dr. Chandler continued in the regular discharge of his parochial duties, occasionally going forth on missionary tours, and once, November, 1769, far up into Sussex County, then almost the outer edge of civilization. In July, 1770, he refers to the fact that "the Dissenters of late have become more friendly in appearance than ever," sometimes exceeding in number, in their attendance on special occasions, his own people. In the course of the two or three following years the congregation had so much increased as to determine the people to enlarge the capacity of the church edifice. But in 1774 it was resolved to rebuild entirely; the foundations of a new building, eighty by fifty feet, were laid around the old building; materials were collected, and money subscribed to defray the expense. But the first shock of war put an end to the work, not to be resumed by that generation.

In October, 1761, application having been made by the rector, church wardens, and vestry of St. John's to Governor Josiah Hardy for a charter, the same was granted, bearing date July 20, 1762. It appoints "John Halsted and Jacob De Hart to be the first and Present Church Wardens of the said Church, and Henry Garthwait, Jonathan Hampton, Amos Morss, Ephraim Terrill, Matthias Williamson, John De Hart, John Ogden, Cavalier Jouet, and John Chetwood to be the first and Present Vestrymen of said Church."

The only changes made in these names for the next fifteen years were in the substitution, from time to time, of John Herriman, Edward Thomas, and George Ross for Cavalier Jouet and John De Hart, the latter serving as secretary.

About the year 1779 or 1780 the congregation began to assemble in a private house "for public worship on Sabbath."² Worship was soon resumed at the church. An impostor for a brief time obtained possession of its pulpit. He was soon after exposed, and fled from the odium and punishment he had merited. The church was then occasionally supplied by the Rev. Uzal Ogden, of Newark. Mr. Ogden was well liked, and being a cousin of Mrs. Caldwell, wife of the late murdered pastor, many of the Presbyterians, whose own church had been burned by the British,

PARSONAGE OF ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, ERECTED 1696, ENLARGED 1765.

Dr. Chandler continued to officiate here until the middle of May, 1775, when probably alarmed at the sacking of the house of his friend, Dr. Myles Cooper, at New York, on the night of the 10th of May, he found refuge with him on the "Kingfisher," Capt. James Montague, a British ship-of-war in the harbor of New York. On the 24th of May, in company with Dr. Cooper and the Rev. Samuel Cook, he sailed in the "Exeter" for Bristol, England.¹

The church was left without a rector or a supply for the pulpit, and its members were consequently greatly scattered, more especially after the declaration of independence. Public worship was at length suspended, and as houses were needed for hospitals and barracks, churches were not too sacred to be used for that purpose. Fences were converted into fuel, nor were the graveyards spared. St. John's suffered most as it was not used on Sundays, the wood-work in the interior being wholly destroyed, and two attempts to burn it being discovered in time to save the building.

resorted to the Episcopal Church. Mr. Ogden was chosen June 8, 1784, one of the assistant ministers of the Trinity Church, New York, with a salary of five hundred pounds a year, with leave of absence for two-thirds of the year for four years, and to receive one-third of the salary. The remaining portion of the year he preached for St. John's parish and at Newark, with occasional visits to Sussex County. During the latter part of this period (1788) he had become the rector of Trinity Church, Newark.

Dr. Chandler remained in exile the full period of ten years, his family continuing to occupy the rectory as before through all the gloomy period of the war. He labored during his absence, raising funds for his destitute brethren in New Jersey. Dr. Berrian says, "He was received with such marked and universal respect into the society of the most distinguished persons as has very rarely been rendered to any one from our country in private life." He continued to cherish to the last the expectation of the restoration of royal authority in America, writing to Rev. Dr. Beach Dec. 3, 1781:

"The late blow in Virginia [Cornwallis' surrender] has given us a shock but has not overset us. Though the clouds at present are rather thick about us, I am far, very far, from desponding. I think matters will take a right turn and then the event will be right."

Dr. Chandler remained in England two years after the restoration of peace, suffering much of the time from a cancer on his nose,—a relic, it was thought, of the smallpox of 1757. His former parishioners invited him to return and resume the rectorship of St. John's. But other friends were busy in seeking for him the episcopate of Nova Scotia, whither many of his former friends had gone as refugees at the close of the war. He reached New York on Sunday, June 19, 1785, but too infirm to resume his parochial charge. In the course of the following year the appointment of Bishop of Nova Scotia was tendered him, but his health was too much impaired to admit of his performing the duties of the office. At his suggestion it was conferred upon the Rev. Charles Inglis, D.D., one of his friends who had removed from New York to Nova Scotia at the close of 1783, and who was consecrated at Lamberth, Aug. 12, 1787. Dr. Chandler, at the request of the vestry, returned to the rectory, where he died June 17, 1790, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. He left a wife and six children. Mrs. Chandler, to whom a pension was allowed by the British government after her husband's death, survived him till Sept. 20, 1801, when she died in her sixty-ninth year.

Dr. Chandler is represented as having been "a large, portly man, of fine personal appearance, of a countenance expressive of high intelligence, though considerably marred by the smallpox, of an uncommonly blue eye, of a strong commanding voice, and a great lover of music. He had fine powers of conversation, and was a most agreeable companion for persons of all ages. He was very fond of home, fond of retirement and of study, and was greatly beloved by his congregation. His antipathy to anything but British rule continued to the last."

REV. SAMUEL SPRAGGS was the successor of Dr. Chandler. He had been an assistant minister of the parish for over a year previous to the death of the rector, and on the 1st of January following that event (1791) was chosen by the wardens and vestry to fill the vacancy. He was then in the forty-fourth year of his age, and had for a considerable period been a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, having been admitted on trial at the second Conference, held in Philadelphia, May 25, 1774. No record remains of his parentage or place of nativity. His first appointment appears to have been at Brunswick, S. E. Virginia, May 25, 1774; then, May, 1775 (having been admitted to full connection), at Philadelphia, and reappointed for the same place in May, 1776. In May, 1777, he was appointed to the Frederick Circuit, Maryland. After the capture of Philadelphia by the British army, Sept. 26, 1777, he found his way again to Philadelphia, and in the course of the following winter or spring to New York, where he was the only traveling preacher in the connection, and had charge of the old John Street Chapel from that time till 1783. In common with his fellow-itinerants, he was regarded by the British authorities as a loyalist, and so neither he nor his chapel was disturbed during the war. He married subsequently to 1783, and settled at Mount Holly, N. J. Where or precisely at what time he took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church is not known, but it was previous to his settlement here as an assistant in 1789. His salary at first was £120 a year, but was increased to £150 in 1793. He died in September, 1794, having been rector about three years and a half. Dr. Rudd says of him, "Mr. Spraggs was an affectionate and useful pastor, and enjoyed the confidence and regard of his flock, with whom he was on terms of affable and cordial intercourse."¹ His widow left a small legacy to the parish. She died in New York in the eighty-seventh year of her age, June 27, 1821.

REV. MENZIES RAYNER received a call from St. John's Church in February, 1795, but did not at that time accept. On the 6th of April, 1795, a call was extended to the Rev. Joseph Pilmoor, who declined in favor of Christ Church, Ann Street, New York. The call was then renewed to Mr. Rayner, and was accepted. Like his predecessors, he was a Methodist, and had preached on the Elizabeth Town Circuit, having entered the ministry in 1790. Mr. Rayner was a native of Hempstead, L. I., and is spoken of at the time of his settlement here as "a young man of promise, and very acceptable among the people as a preacher. Having engaged himself to marry a young lady whose family was unwilling that she should share his privations as an itinerant, he chose the alternative of resigning his ministerial post. It was done with deliberation, with frank notification of his purpose to his presiding elder, Rev. George Roberts, and with the avowal of undiminished confidence in the doctrines and discipline of Methodism."

He had just left the connection when he was called here, in 1795. He was ordained to the priesthood on Wednesday, Nov. 8, 1797, by Rt. Rev. Samuel Provoost, D.D., on which occasion the Rev. Abraham Beach, D.D., of New York, read the prayers, and the Rev. Mr. Gardiner, assistant minister of Trinity Church, Newark, preached. His pastorate continued nearly six years. In September, 1801, he accepted an invitation to the rectorship of the Episcopal Church of Hartford, Conn., which position he held about twelve years. Afterwards he took charge of a church in Huntington, Conn. In his later years he withdrew from the Episcopal ministry and became a Universalist preacher. In 1839 he supplied the pulpit of the Bleecker Street Universalist Church of New York.¹

At a parish meeting, Sept. 5, 1801, as Mr. Rayner was about to leave his charge, a committee was appointed to wait on the

New York, and soon after was invited to serve one of the churches of New York City, but declined in favor of St. John's of this town. In February, 1802, arrangements were made for his regular induction as rector, and not long subsequently he was ordained riest also by Bishop Moore. His salary was two hundred and fifty pounds a year. His college friend, Henry Kollock, had, scarcely more than a year previous, become the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of this town. Their intimacy thus was very happily renewed for a season.

His ministry here was soon terminated. He resigned his rectorship June 5, 1803, six months before Mr. Kollock's removal, to accept a call to St. Peter's Church, Albany, N. Y. In August, 1809, he resigned this charge to become the colleague of the Rev. Joseph G. J. Bend, D.D., of St. Paul's, Baltimore, Md.² This position he resigned in July, 1813, to become the provost of the University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia. In 1815 the honorary degree of D.D. was conferred on him both by the university over which he presided and by Columbia College. He retired from the university in 1828, and in 1829 became the rector of St. Michael's, Trenton, N. J. He resigned this charge in June, 1836, and withdrew from public life.

While rector of St. John's in this town he had become tenderly attached to Susan W., daughter of Gen. Jonathan Dayton, whom he married Aug. 22, 1803, just as he was removing to Albany, N. Y. Mrs. Beasley, having given birth to a daughter, died Nov. 27, 1804, in her twenty-second year, greatly lamented.

Mr. Beasley subsequently (June 29, 1807) married Maria, daughter of Matthias Williamson, also of this town. On his retiring to private life in 1836 he came hither, and spent the remainder of his days among his relatives by marriage in the prosecution of his studies. His publications had been somewhat numerous, of which the most profound were "A Search of Truth in the Science of the Human Mind," Part I, 8vo, 1822 (Part II. was completed, but not published); "A Vindication of the Fundamental Principles of Truth and Order in the Church of Christ from the Allegations of the Rev. William E. Channing, D.D.," 1830. He was a superior scholar, but excelled chiefly in the philosophy of the mind, being of the school of Locke. Though conscientiously attached to the REV. FREDERICK BEASLEY, who was then in town, and invite him to the rectorship of St. John's, with a salary of two hundred and fifty pounds. The call was accepted, and he was instituted in February, 1802.

Mr. Beasley was a native of Edenton, N. C., where he was born in 1777. He graduated in 1797 at the College of New Jersey. In 1798 he was associated with Henry Kollock, of this town, as a tutor in Princeton College, and served two years, pursuing at the same time, under the direction of President Samuel Stanhope Smith, D.D., the study of theology. He was employed as a reader for several months previous to November, 1800, by Christ Church, New Brunswick, N. J. In the summer of the following year he was ordained deacon by Bishop Moore of Episcopal Church, he was not illiberal towards other churches.

He died of dropsy in the chest on Saturday, Nov. 1, 1845. His wife survived until July 2, 1852. They had nine children, seven of whom came to mature years. One of them, Frederick W., took orders in the Episcopal Church, and settled in Bucks County, Pa.; another practiced law at Trenton, N. J., and has attained great eminence at the bar and on the bench.¹

Mr. Beasley's successor was the

REV. SAMUEL LILLY. He was appointed rector of St. John's Aug. 28, 1803. He was admitted to priest's orders shortly after, and inducted April 2, 1804, on an annual salary of five hundred dollars and the use of the parsonage. He had charge also of the academy during the same year. No record has been found of his life previous to his becoming the rector of St. John's. He remained in charge until April 30, 1805. Some time after he removed to the South, where he died previous to 1824.²

1779, and was the oldest child of Jonathan Rudd and Mary, daughter of Deacon Barnabas Huntington. He was brought up as a Congregationalist, and fitted for college under the tuition of Rev. Samuel Nott, but was not favored with a collegiate course. Upon reaching his majority he removed to New York, where he connected himself with the Episcopal Church, studied for the ministry, and was ordained a deacon by Bishop Moore, April 28, 1805.

At the time of his settlement here the congregation seldom exceeded a hundred souls, and the communicants were sixty in number. Improvements were made in the church edifice, and a new steeple placed upon it in 1807. In 1808 the length of the house was increased seventeen feet and the interior entirely renovated. An addition of one hundred dollars was added to Mr. Rudd's salary in 1810. In 1813 he became the editor of a new series of The Christian Magazine, and the place of publication was changed from New York to Elizabeth Town. Other improvements were made in the church edifice in 1817. The parsonage house was

About three months after the removal of Rev. Mr. Lilly the church invited the REV. JOHN CHURCHILL RUDD to become their rector, with a salary of five hundred dollars a year and the use of the rectory. The call was accepted, and Mr. Rudd entered upon his work in December, 1805. He was regularly inducted in May, 1806.

also rebuilt at a cost of about $3000. For several years Mr. Rudd conducted a classical school in his house with great success. July 31, 1823, the University of Pennsylvania conferred on him the degree of D.D.

Owing to the loss of health, particularly of his voice, Dr. Rudd was relieved from his parochial charge June 1, 1826, and the next month removed to Auburn, N. Y., where, and at Utica, N. Y., as teacher, rector, and editor of The Gospel Messenger, his later days were spent. He died in Utica, Nov. 15, 1848, greatly lamented by his own church and others. At his own request his remains were brought to Eliza-

Dr. Rudd was succeeded by the REV. SMITH PYNE, who began his ministry in the parish June 1, 1826, and was instituted rector by the Rt. Rev. John Croes, D.D., May 3, 1827. His salary was five hundred dollars and the use of the rectory. This was his first parochial charge. His ministry here, though highly acceptable to the people, was but of short continuance. He resigned the rectorship Dec. 31, 1828, to accept a call from the church of Middletown, Conn. Subsequently he became the assistant minister, and then, after the decease of the Rev. Dr. Hawley, for many years the rector of St. John's Church, Washington City, D. C. Dr. Pyne now resides at New York City.¹

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, ELIZABETH.

A call was extended March 8, 1829, to the REV. BIRDSEY GLOVER NOBLE, the predecessor of Mr. Pyne at Middletown. He was born in 1792, at New Milford, Conn.; graduated at Yale College in 1810; married a daughter of Elijah Sanford, of Newtown, Conn.; was ordained a deacon in 1812, and priest in 1817; and was rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, at Middletown, Conn., 1812 to 1829.

He came here on a salary of five hundred dollars, the rectory, and his firewood. The finances of the church were greatly improved during his ministry, and otherwise the congregation appeared to prosper; save that during the cholera season of 1832 the church met with severe losses by death. His ministry terminated Oct. 15, 1833. He removed to Bridgeport, and opened a boarding-school on Golden Hill, where he died Nov. 16, 1848, in his fifty-seventh year.

At the close of January, 1834, the REV. RICHARD CANNING MOORE, JR., son of Bishop Moore, of Virginia, was chosen rector, and at once entered upon his work. He graduated at Washington (Trinity) College, Hartford, in 1829, and the first year after his ordination assisted his cousin, the Rev. Dr. Bedell, of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia. He continued in charge of St. John's, Elizabeth Town, until the second Sunday in March, 1855.

At his coming his salary was four hundred dollars a year, with the usual perquisites. So acceptable and effective was his ministry that soon a considerable enlargement of the church edifice was required, and an addition of eight feet was made to each side of the house, and the interior was wholly renewed. The work was done between June 1st and Dec. 31, 1840. When completed it measured forty-five by sixty-six feet. A Sunday-school room of brick was erected at the same time, the expense of the whole improvement being about four thousand dollars. A new impulse was thus given to the congregation, which rapidly increased in numbers and efficiency. After Mr. Moore's removal from this town he became the rector of Christ Church, Williamsport, Pa., where he remained until

REV. SAMUEL ADAMS CLARK, the successor of Mr. Moore, was called to the rectorship Feb. 4, 1856, at a salary of twelve hundred dollars and the usual perquisites. He had been for eight years the rector of the Church of the Advent, Philadelphia. He entered upon his work on the first Sunday in April, and was instituted by Bishop Doane April 17, 1856. His ministry was eminently successful. The capacity of the old church edifice soon proved inadequate to meet the wants of the congregation. Measures were taken in April, 1857, to raise twenty thousand dollars for a new church. The work was undertaken in 1859. The old church was demolished, the corner-stone of the new church was laid Sept. 5, 1859, and the house completed in 1860.

The new St. John's is a noble specimen of the Gothic style of architecture of the fourteenth century. It is built of a pale brick alternating with bands of stone. It is distributed into nave, aisles, apsidal, chancel, and vestry. The windows of the clerestory are of stained glass. It has a massive tower, one hundred and twenty-six feet high, with a side porch. The pews will seat one thousand persons. The whole cost was about $50,000.

A chapel of the same material, eighty by thirty-four feet, costing about fifteen thousand dollars, adjoining the church, was built in 1867. The offerings for the year ending May, 1867, were $46,558.17, of which $18,360.57 were for parish purposes.¹ The present number of communicants is about six hundred; Sunday-school, including officers, teachers and scholars, five hundred and fifty.

REV. WILLIAM S. LANGFORD, the present rector, assumed the ministry of St. John's on July 11, 1875. He was born in Fall River, Mass.; educated at Kenyon College and Theological Seminary at Gambia, Ohio; ordained June 26, 1867; was assistant at St. Ann's, Brooklyn, until July, 1867, when he went to St. Paul's, Englewood, N. J., and in the autumn of 1870 became rector of St. John's Church, Yonkers, on the Hudson, whence he removed to Elizabeth, assuming the rectorship as above stated.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Grace Church.—This parish was founded under the labors of Rev. Abraham Beach Carter, then missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church for Essex County, the first service being held in the house of Mr. Vincent Bodine on Nov. 3, 1845. Among those present at that service was Mrs. Dayton, then nearly eighty years of age. The whole congregation consisted of about forty persons. On March 15, 1846, the first baptism was administered. Services were held in the house of Mr. Bodine up to April 26, 1846, when a commodious room in a public building was rented and furnished by the congregation.

Soon after this Dr. Carter's connection with the parish ceased, and on the 17th of September, 1846, Rev. Edward B. Boggs assumed charge. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Doane on the very day he became missionary to this parish, viz.: Sept. 17, 1846, and he remained in charge until March, 1847, when he removed to Trinity Church, Swedesborough, preaching there, and on alternate Sundays at Elizabethport and Piscataway. The parish of Grace Church contained six families and twelve communicants on the 1st of December, 1848, when Rev. David Clarkson assumed the rectorship. A Sunday-school was at that time organized. The parish was incorporated by act of the Legislature Aug. 18, 1849. In April, 1849, steps were taken towards the erection of a church edifice, the amount necessary to complete this object being subscribed mainly outside of the parish, St. John's Church contributing liberally. The cost of the church together with the furniture was about sixteen hundred dollars. It was finished and consecrated by Bishop Doane on April 2, 1850. It was a neat and commodious wooden structure with stained-glass windows, spire, and bell.

Shortly after the church edifice was consecrated Rev. Mr. Clarkson resigned, and removed to Fort Scott, Mo. The church was then supplied for a few months by Rev. Eli Wheeler and Rev. S. Chipman Thrall. Rev. Eugene A. Hoffman, now Dr. Hoffman, dean of the theological seminary in New York City, was instituted rector Aug. 24, 1851. He resigned in May, 1852, to assume the rectorship of Christ Church, Elizabeth, to which he had been called. The services were then conducted by a lay reader, Mr. Frederick Phillips, a worthy and exemplary citizen, until January, 1854, and after his death, in that year, until Sept. 6, 1855, by Mr. John J. Smith. At this latter date Rev. Mr. Clarkson, upon leave of absence from Fort Scott, whence he had been serving in the capacity of chaplain in the United States army, again assumed charge of the parish, and remained about six months. Rev. Joseph S. Mayers and Rev. J. D. L. Moore then officiated until the spring of 1857, when Rev. Clarkson Dunn became rector of the parish, and remained until his death in January, 1870. Mr. Dunn had previously been for more than thirty years rector of Christ Church, Newton, N. J. After his death in 1870, Rev. Joseph S. Mayers was chosen rector, and remained in charge of the parish until July 31, 1872, when he accepted a call to St. Luke's Church, Phillipsburg, N. J. Rev. James Stoddard succeeded him on Sept. 16, 1872. During the rectorship of Mr. Stoddard the church was enlarged at a cost of two thousand eight hundred dollars, leaving a debt upon the parish of about three thousand dollars, which has since been only partially liquidated. He resigned April 16, 1876, and in June of that year Rev. J. F. Esch was instituted rector, resigning his charge Oct. 18, 1877. Rev. Henry E. Duncan, D.D., the present rector, assumed the duties of his office in January, 1878. He had been for nearly twenty years rector of St. Luke's Church, at Matteawan, on the Hudson.

Grace Church numbers about one hundred families and about seventy communicants, and has in the Sunday-school one hundred and fifty scholars.

Trinity Church (Protestant Episcopal) was erected on North Broad Street in 1871. The property is valued at thirty-seven thousand dollars. Number of sittings five hundred. There are in communion with the church two hundred persons. The rectors of Trinity have been Rev. D. F. Warren, D.D., now of Pittsburgh, Pa.; the Rev. Robert Lowrey, assistant minister of St. Thomas, New York; and the present rector, the Rev. F. Marion McAllister, who took charge in 1874. The church edifice is a neat and convenient structure.

Second Presbyterian Church.—The Second Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth grew out of the "great revival of 1817." So numerous were the accessions to the old church as greatly to exceed the capacity of their house of worship. During the revival of 1813 a long-felt necessity had been met by the erection of a session-house on the rear of the parsonage lot, fronting on Washington Street. The expense was provided for by voluntary subscriptions, and the house was opened for worship Sept. 10, 1813. At a meeting of the trustees and sessions of the First Church on Tuesday, Feb. 29, 1820, application having been made to that effect, arrangements were made whereby the session-house might be used on the Sabbath free of rent for five years by such persons as were desirous of forming a second church. The house was enlarged in the summer following. Separate Sabbath services were commenced March 26, 1820. A religious society was organized by the election, Oct. 26, 1820, of Messrs. David Meeker, John Humes, James Crane, Richard Townley, Elijah Kellogg, William Brown, and Elihu Price trustees. A church of forty-one members, all but one from the First Church, was constituted on Sunday, Dec. 3, 1820, when Elihu Price, James Crane, and David Meeker were set apart as elders. The same month they called as their pastor the REV. DAVID MAGIE.—He was a native of Elizabeth Town, and this was his only home through life. His father, Michael Magie, was the son of Joseph and the grandson of John Magie, Sr., who came over from Scotland during the period of prosecution, 1685–87, and purchased land just west of the town plot. His ancestors were noted for their piety and Presbyterianism. His father married Mary Meeker, and both of them were exemplary members of the First Presbyterian Church. David was born at the rural homestead west of the town March 13, 1795. His father died Jan. 6, 1810. In his will, dated Aug. 23, 1806, mention is made of ten children, four daughters, Catharine Potter, Jane Brown, Phebe, and Hannah, and six sons, Benjamin, John, David, Joseph, Job, and Haines.

David was converted in the revival of 1813, and in June of that year was received a member of the First Church. He prepared for college under the supervision of his pastor, Mr. McDowell, and entered the junior class of the College of New Jersey in 1815. He graduated in 1817, and entered the theological seminary at Princeton. At the expiration of a year he was appointed one of the tutors of the college, holding the post for two years. In the spring of 1820 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Jersey, and preached his first sermon April 28th. During the summer, having frequently preached for the new congregation, he was invited to supply them for six months. He began his stated ministrations Oct. 1, 1820, with a sermon from Rom. xv. 30. He was ordained and installed on Tuesday, April 24, 1821. He married, May 7th, Ann F. Wilson, daughter of James Wilson, Esq., deceased.

Measures were taken April 30, 1821, to build a house of worship. The corner-stone of the house on Jersey Street was laid June 20, 1821, and the house dedicated May 1, 1822. In this his first and only pastoral charge among his own townsmen he continued to labor as a faithful, godly, useful, and highly honored minister of the gospel nearly forty-five years, declining promptly several calls and appointments to other fields and spheres of labor. He received in 1842 the degree of D.D. from Amherst College, and during the latter period of his life filled several stations of honor and service in connection with literary and benevolent institutions. The additions to the church during his ministry were six hundred and fifty-one on profession, and five hundred and ninety-six on certificate.

After a period of great bodily suffering, protracted through fifteen months, full of peace, hope, and comfort, he departed this life May 10, 1865.

He was, indeed, "a model pastor." Calm, genial, affectionate, sympathizing, abundant in labors, his services were welcomed by the whole people, and his influence among them gradually strengthening from first to last. Combining temperance, charity, humility, prudence, sound judgment, simplicity, and earnestness, he was a faithful, persevering, successful laborer in the vineyard committed to his charge. He preached and prayed with a power and unction which sank deep into the hearts of his hearers. . . . Besides several able published discourses he was the author of "The Spring-Time of Life," an excellent volume of three hundred and fifty pages.¹

A few months before the decease of Dr. Magie, the Rev. William C. Roberts, previously of Columbus, Ohio, was installed co-pastor, and continued in charge until his resignation in February, 1866, to become the pastor of the newly-organized Westminster Church. The Rev. James B. Patterson, for several years pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, Ohio, was shortly after installed his successor, and is still in charge of the church.

Westminster Presbyterian Church.²—The Westminster Presbyterian Church may be regarded as a colony from the Second Presbyterian Church.

Some time before the lamented death of the Rev. Dr. Magie, the people of his charge called a number of meetings to consider the expediency of altering, enlarging, or beautifying their place of worship. The prosperity of the city and the increased demand for church accommodation pointed to the necessity of doing something in that direction. Plans were more than once procured for the enlargement and improvement of the building, but the congregation could not unite in their adoption or execution.

After the decease of Dr. Magie the same demand for more pew accommodation and the rapid growth of the city forced the congregation to renew their efforts to "enlarge the place of their tent;" but they could not see eye to eye as to what ought to be done. With the view of solving the difficulty it was proposed to sell the old edifice and erect on some other convenient site a more extensive and commodious building; but a majority of the congregation, for the veneration they felt for the place where they had worshipped God so long, were utterly opposed to the measure.

Seeing that it would be impossible to secure unanimity as to any plan of rebuilding or enlarging, a goodly number of the congregation, not wanting in attachment for the old sanctuary, or in regard for the pleasant memories of the past, resolved on forming a colony that should go forth, with one heart and one mind, to engage in a new enterprise for the glory of God.

Of the five hundred and fifty-six members enrolled on the records of the Second Presbyterian Church, ninety-three went forth, and seven others with them from sister churches, to be organized as a new family of Christ's followers.

Several informal preliminary meetings were held to consider the interests of the new colony and to effect its legal incorporation, but the first regular religious meeting was held at the house of Mr. William P. Thompson on Friday evening, the 14th of July, 1865.

On the evening of the 31st day of January, 1866, the congregation assembled in the Second Presbyterian Church, when the church was organized by a committee of the Presbytery of Passaic appointed for the purpose, and suitable persons were set apart as its spiritual officers.

The persons whose names are above recorded were from the Second Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth.

The following were from out of town churches, namely: Nathan G. Brown, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Brown, William H. Magie, Miss Mary J. Peck, Leander Tallmadge, Mrs. Ruth Sutphin, Miss Mary Whiting.

Mr. Richard T. Haines and Mr. Mahlon Mulford, who had been elders in the Second Church, were duly elected ruling elders; and Mr. Henry M. Baker and Mr. Henry Seymour, deacons.

After singing "All hail the power of Jesus' name," etc., the Rev. Dr. Craven, of Newark, preached a discourse appropriate to the occasion from Rom. i. 14: "I am debtor," etc.

Mr. Haines and Mr. Mulford were then installed elders, Mr. Baker was ordained and installed deacon (Mr. Seymour being absent in a foreign land), and the church was declared duly organized after the order of the Presbyterian Church. The Rev. W. C. Roberts made the closing address, expressing his sympathy with the movement and pledging his prayers and co-operation for its success. The Doxology having been sung, the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. E. Kempshall.

On the evening of Feb. 5, 1866, a congregational meeting was held in Library Hall for the purpose of electing a pastor. The Rev. D. H. Pierson was invited to act as moderator. The Rev. William C. Roberts, then pastor of the Second Church, was unanimously elected, and a call was made out in the requisite form.

The first Sabbath services of the new church were held in Library Hall on the 4th of March, 1866, when the Rev. Mr. Roberts, the pastor-elect, preached from the words, "The God of heaven, He will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build." Neh. ii. 20.

On Wednesday evening, March 7th, the congregation assembled in the Second Presbyterian Church for the installation of the Rev. Mr. Roberts as their pastor. The Rev. Dr. Ogden, of Chatham, presided and proposed the constitutional questions; the Rev. Dr. Brinsmade, of Newark, preached the sermon from Ezek. iii. 17; the Rev. Dr. Craven, of Newark, gave the charge to the pastor; and the Rev. Dr. Hornblower, of Paterson, the charge to the people.

On Sabbath morning, April 8th, Mr. Henry Seymour was ordained and installed deacon by the pastor. Thus was completed the organization of the Westminster Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth. An unusual degree of harmony and brotherly love prevailed in all the counsels and workings of the congregation.

The first communion was celebrated in Library Hall, on the 8th of April, 1866, on which occasion the deacons Baker and Seymour presented to the church the beautiful communion service now in use.

The weekly prayer and conference meeting was held at the house of the pastor from the organization of the church to the opening of the new house for religious worship. It grew from a very small company to a large congregation, filling every foot of space that could be devoted to the purpose. Here commenced a revival of religion early in the spring of 1867. As the fruit of this work of grace more than forty persons were received into the communion of the church. The majority of these were from the Sabbath-school. The church has been visited since with two seasons of special interest, increasing its membership between sixty and seventy, and calling into more lively exercise the graces of God's people. None that attended those meetings will ever cease to feel that it was good to be there.

The board of trustees, consisting of Messrs. Alfred De Witt, president; William F. Day, vice-president; Amos Clark, Jr., Jacob Davis, A. W. Kingsley, A. C. Kellogg, and George T. Mulford, secretary, were instructed by the congregation to select and secure a suitable location for the church. The beautiful site on which the edifice now stands having been purchased, plans for building were procured and adopted at a meeting of the congregation held at the house of the pastor.

On the 13th of June, 1866, the corner-stone was laid with appropriate religious exercises. The opening prayer was offered by the Rev. John F. Pingry, the 100th Psalm was sung, introductory remarks were made by Alfred De Witt, Esq., and a sketch of the progress of the enterprise was read by the Rev. D. H. Pierson. The corner-stone was then laid by the pastor, with the use of the plumb-line, hammer, and trowel, accompanied by an address on the propriety and history of laying with ceremony the corner-stones of sacred and important buildings. The exercises were closed by the chanting of the Lord's Prayer by the children of the Sabbath-school and the benediction by the venerable Dr. King, for many years missionary to Greece.

The cost of the church buildings thus far, exclusive of the large tower and the pulpit furniture, which was kindly presented by Mrs. Amos Clark, Jr., has been about one hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars. At the time of the completion of the church edifice the pastor was absent in pursuit of health in a foreign land, and hence it was resolved to delay the formal dedication of it until his return. The house was opened for divine service on the last Sabbath of December, 1867. The Rev. John F. Pingry conducted the devotional exercises; the Rev. David Magie, of Penn Yan, N. Y., preached in the morning, from Eph. iii. 21, and the Rev. D. H. Pierson in the evening, from Zech. iv. 6.

The Sabbath-school and lecture-room were dedicated to the service of God Sept. 3, 1871, with an address by the pastor, from Luke vii. 5, the reading of Scripture by the school, an address by Mr. G. T. Mulford, Mr. T. A. Smith acting as superintendent.

The church was formally dedicated March 17, 1876. The pastor conducted the opening exercises, and offered the dedicatory prayer; Rev. Dr. S. I. Prime, editor of New York Observer, delivered an address on the connection between the past and present ministers of Elizabeth; Rev. Dr. Paxton, pastor First Presbyterian Church, New York, on the conditions of a prosperous church; and Rev. Dr. Hall, pastor Fifth Avenue Church, New York, on Christian work. The benediction was pronounced by Dr. Calhoun, of Syria.

Third Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth.—This church was organized by the Presbytery of Elizabeth Town on Nov. 17, 1851, and was originally composed of seventy-six members, who had been dismissed in equal proportions from the First and Second Churches for this purpose. Messrs. Edward Sanderson, Daniel Woodruff, John D. Norris, Benjamin Ogden, and John McCord were installed elders.

Public worship was commenced by the congregation in Collet Hall on Sept. 14, 1851. The Rev. Robert Aikman, previously of Troy, N. Y., was employed from September 21st, and having soon after received a call to be their pastor, was installed by the Presbytery of Newark (to which the church had been transferred), March 1, 1852. The ground, formerly belonging to Dr. Isaac Morse, on the southwest corner of East Jersey and Bridge Streets (one hundred and forty-five by two hundred and forty-five feet), was purchased in June, 1852, for $300, and preparations made for the erection of a house of worship. The corner-stone was laid Sept. 21, 1852; the lecture-room, or chapel, was occupied May 8, 1853, and the house completed and dedicated March 28, 1855. It is of brick, sixty by one hundred and twenty feet. It fronts on Scott Place (late Bridge Street), and the audience-room, finished with galleries, will seat about nine hundred persons. The chapel, with a lecture-room to seat two hundred persons on the first floor, and a Sunday-school room and study on the second floor, is attached to the rear of the church, and fronts on Jersey Street. The property was freed from debt in 1865. The church numbers more than two hundred members.

Marshall Street Presbyterian Church.—This church is situated in that part of the city formerly known as Elizabethport. A union religious service was commenced there in 1836 every Sabbath afternoon in an iron foundry. The Rev. Abraham Brown, a Congregational minister of Oxford, Conn., was employed as a stated supply, and began to preach Oct. 6, 1838. A Congregational Church of twenty-nine members was organized Aug. 7, 1839. Messrs. Jonathan M. Ropes and Elias Marsh were chosen deacons, and Maj. Denman and Messrs. James C. Fairbank, Joseph P. Angur, Jeremiah Robinson, and Jonathan M. Ropes were chosen trustees. At the same time the corner-stone of the church on Marshall Street, between First and Second Streets, was laid. The house was completed the following year.

Mr. Brown died Oct. 15, 1840, aged forty-five. Rev. Jonathan Huntington and others were employed as stated supplies the next eighteen months. The Rev. Oliver S. St. John was ordained the first pastor of the church June 15, 1842. The former deacons having been elected elders Feb. 9, 1846, the church was received, April 22, 1846, under the care of the Presbytery of Elizabeth Town. Mr. St. John was dismissed Oct. 20, 1846, and the present pastor, Rev. Edwin H. Reinhart, was installed Oct. 26, 1847. The church has now about one hundred and twenty members. Mr. Reinhart has had a long pastorate, having continued in the service of the church for a period of thirty-five years.

Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church.—A number of the Westminster congregation, situated remote from their church in what is known as North Elizabeth, thought it expedient to begin a chapel in that section of the city in 1873. A further inducement to take this step was the number of children in the neighborhood without any Sabbath-school privileges whatever. In order, therefore, to supply this destitution the Madison Avenue Chapel was opened with religious services Sept. 25, 1873. The Sabbath-school was organized with thirty scholars and a good corps of teachers, with many sympathetic friends present. The officers appointed by Westminster (under whose auspices the school was organized) were Charles L. Doe, superintendent; William H. Corbin, secretary; Thomas A. Doe, librarian.

Preaching began under the patronage of Westminster, Sept. 1, 1874, and continued as often as it was practicable until July, 1875, when the services of the Rev. W. S. C. Webster were secured. Mr. Webster was with the people about a year when, on Oct. 1, 1876, the services of the Rev. A. L. Clark were procured.

On May 7, 1877, the congregation took a very important step, but one which was considered to be the best thing for the real health and thorough independence of the community. This was the organization, through the instrumentality of the Presbytery of Elizabeth, of the church on its own footing. Mr. Clark, a man of God, much beloved for his piety and devotion, was released from pastoral charge of the church in April, 1879.

On May 14, 1879, the congregation voted a call to the present incumbent, Rev. C. E. Cunningham. He began his ministrations among them the first Sabbath in September, and was regularly ordained and installed as their pastor in November following.

This is the briefest possible outline of a church yet young but vigorous. The membership has increased to seventy, and the Sunday-school to one hundred and ten scholars and fourteen teachers.

German Presbyterian Church.—The congregation was gathered by the present pastor, Rev. John Rudolph, who graduated at the theological seminary in Bloomfield, N. J., in June, 1875, and in September following preached his first sermon in Elizabeth in the Marshall Street Presbyterian Church. With the view of gathering a new congregation a hall was rented on the corner of Third and Fulton Streets Nov. 15, 1875. The movement proved a success from the outset, and the hall was occupied for religious services until September, 1878, when the new church was dedicated, an American clergyman, Rev. Dr. Roberts, preaching the sermon on the occasion in the German language. The church property is valued at about ten thousand dollars. A parsonage was built in 1881.

The church at first consisted of forty members; it now numbers one hundred and fifty. From thirty-six members at the beginning the Sunday-school has increased to two hundred and fifty. The elders of the church are Henry Pfäfer, F. Schomburg, and F. Hilderbrant.

Rev. Mr. Rudolph was born in Germany, where he pursued a regular college course. He studied theology at Bloomfield, N. J. He is the editor of The German Evangelist, the organ of the German Presbyterians, now published at Newark.

Methodist Episcopal Churches of Elizabeth.—Until the close of the Revolutionary war two churches only had been organized within the village of Elizabeth Town, the First Presbyterian and St. John's Episcopal. Soon after the war the town was visited occasionally by traveling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal persuasion. Bishop Asbury, on passing through the town, preached by invitation, Sept. 6, 1785, in the unfinished Presbyterian Church. Either then or shortly after a society was gathered and taken under the care of the Conference. Of this society one of the earliest and most efficient members was the wife of Mr. Jonathan Morrell. This worthy couple originated in Newtown, L. I., but at an early day took up their abode in the city of New York, where they resided more than a quarter of a century. Mrs. Morrell was one of the small company who were induced to hear Philip Embury, the carpenter, preach in his own house at New York in the year 1766, the earliest American Methodist preacher. She was converted, and had the honor of being enrolled in the first Methodist class in America. In 1772 Mr. Morrell removed to this town, and with his wife united with the First Presbyterian Church, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Caldwell. At the organization of the Methodist society Mrs. Morrell returned to the people of her first love, and became one of the principal supports of the society.

The first who ministered to this handful of people (for such they were for many years) were circuit preachers, appointed by the General Conference, generally two by two, in the order following:

The appointments by the General Conference to the Elizabeth Town Circuit were as follows:

1787. Robert Cloud, Thomas Morrell.	1800. Joseph Totten, Jesse Justice.
1788. John McCluskey, Simon Pile.	1801. Joseph Totten, William Mills.
1789. John Merrick, John Cooper.	1802. Joseph Totten, William Mills.
1790. Jethro Johnson, Gamaliel Bailey.	1803. Samuel Thomas, George Woolley, Joseph Stevens.
1791. No record.	1804. Thomas Morrell, Benjamin Hiff, Samuel Budd.
1792. John Clark, Joseph Totten.	1805. Peter Vannest, David Bartine.
1793. John Ragan, Menzies Rayner.	1806. William McLenahao, David Bartine.
1794. John Clark, Hezekiah C. Wooster.	1807. James Moore, Jacob Heveruer.
1795. Shadrach Bostwick, Robert Hutchison, William Storms.	1808. James Moore, Thomas Stratton.
1796. John Fountain, Albert Van Nostrand.	1809. William Smith, Thomas Stratton, John Sharpley.
1797. John Clark, Timothy Merritt, John Seward.	1810. William Mills, Jacob Heveruer.
1798. James Tolleson, Samuel Thomas, Thomas Morrell.
1799. Thomas Everard, David Bartine.

With the exception of the year 1821, when Joseph Lybrand received the appointment, no preachers were assigned to the Elizabeth Town Circuit from 1811 to 1822. Mr. Morrell during this period preached regularly on the Sabbath, aided by the preachers on the Essex Circuit. In 1823, Samuel S. Kennard, and in 1824 Robert Lutton were stationed here. From 1825 to 1838 Thomas Morrell was classed among the "supernumerary preachers in connection with" this church, and from 1825 to 1853 the following preachers were stationed here:

1825. Thomas B. Sargent.	1840. Robert Lutton.
1826. Thomas B. Sargent.	1841. Robert Lutton.
1827. Joseph Holdich.	1842. Alexander Gilmore.
1828. Joseph Holdich.	1843. Joseph Ashbrook.
1829. Daniel Parrish.	1844. Joseph Ashbrook.
1830. Edmund S. James.	1845. James O. Rogers.
1831. Edmund S. James.	1846. James O. Rogers.
1832. William A. Wilmer.	1847. Richard B. Westbrook.
1833. Edwin L. James.	1848. Richard B. Westbrook.
1834. William H. Gilder.	1849. Thomas McCarroll.
1835. James Buckley.	1850. Thomas McCarroll.
1836. James Buckley.	1851. Lewis R. Dunn.
1837. George A. Raybold.	1852. Lewis R. Dunn.
1838. Isaac N. Felch.	1853. Alexander H. Mead.
1839. Isaac N. Felch.

In 1852 a second church was commenced at Elizabethport, and located on Fulton Street, now known as the Fulton Street Methodist Episcopal Church. For the next five years the appointments were as follows:

1854.—Alexander H. Mead, E. Town;	Isaac Trotter,	E. Port.
1855.—James Ayars,	" " Jonathan B. Heward,	" "
1856.—John Ogden Winner,	" " Albert H. Brown,	" "
1857.—John Ogden Winner,	" " Horace S. Bishop,	" "
1858.—Richard Vanhorne,	" " Jeremiah Cowins,	" "

In 1859 a new enterprise was started in Mechanic Street, known as St. Paul's Church, since which time the appointments for the three churches have been as follows, in the order of time,—Water Street, Fulton Street, and St. Paul's :

1859.—Richard Vanhorne, George F. Dickinson, John F. Dodd.
1860.—Dallas D. Lore, George F. Dickinson, Edward W. Adams.
1861.—Dallas D. Lore, John F. Hurst, Edward W. Adams.
1862.—George H. Whitney, John F. Hurst, Elbert Clement.
1863.—John F. Hurst, Charles S. Coit, James N. Fitzgerald.
1864.—John F. Hurst, Charles S. Coit, Sylvester N. Belout.
1865.—Richard B. Lockwood, Sylvester H. Opyke, Alexander L. Price.
1866.—Richard B. Lockwood, Sylvester H. Opyke, Alexander L. Brice.
1867.—Benjamin Kelley, James I. Roswell, Alexander L. Brice.
1868.—Benjamin Kelley, James I. Boswell, Sanford Van Benschotten.

Thus far the record has been furnished by Dr. Hatfield. We add the appointments which have been made since 1868, following the same order,—Water Street (since called Elizabeth Avenue), Fulton Street, and St. Paul's :

1869.—Benjamin Kelley, James I. Boswell, Sanford Van Benschotten.
1870.—R. S. Arndt, J. Winsor, L. R. Dunn.
1872.—R. S. Arndt, J. Winsor, J. N. Fitzgerald.
1873.—R. Harcourt, C. C. Winans, J. N. Fitzgerald.
1874.—R. Harcourt, C. C. Winans, J. N. Fitzgerald.

In 1875 the Park Methodist Episcopal Church was formed, and W. L. Hoagland appointed to the charge. After that the appointments were up to 1877 in the order named :

1875.—R. B. Yard, ¹ Elizabeth Avenue; J. W. Young, Fulton Street; James Montgomery, St. Paul's; W. L. Hoagland, Park Church.
1876.—J. W. Scran, Elizabeth Avenue; Nicholas Van Sant, Fulton Street; James Montgomery, St. Paul's; W. L. Hoagland, Park Church.

In 1877 the Elizabeth Avenue and St. Paul's Churches were merged in St. James', and the new organization purchased the property and house of worship known as the Broad Street Baptist Church, on the corner of Broad and Williamson Streets. Since then the appointments have been as follows :

1877.—James Montgomery, St. James'; Nicholas Van Sant, Fulton Street; W. L. Hoagland, Park Church.
1878.—Henry Spellmeyer, St. James'; Nicholas Van Sant, Fulton Street; Charles E. Little, Park Church.
1879.—Henry Spellmeyer, St. James'; Charles Lawew, Fulton Street; Charles E. Little, Park Church.
1880.—Henry Spellmeyer, St. James'; Charles Lawew, Fulton Street; Charles E. Little, Park Church.
1881.—A. H. Tuttle, St. James'; Charles Lawew, Fulton Street; T. H. Landon, Park Church.

We add the following statistics for 1881 :

St. James' Church : Membership, 350; Sunday-school scholars, 350; value of church property, $50,000.

Fulton Street Church : Membership, 325; Sunday-school scholars, 270; value of church property, $12,000.

¹ Mr. Yard died soon after his appointment, and W. R. Keifer was appointed to fill the vacancy.

Park Church : Membership, 160; Sunday-school scholars, 250; value of church property, $16,000.

There are two other Methodist Churches in the city, of recent origin, viz. : Mount Teman African Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. Mr. Williams, pastor, holding services in school-house No. 4, not now used for school purposes, but rented to the society; and a German Methodist Church at the Port, Rev. Albert Gratz, pastor.

Among those to whose labors the society in its infancy was under greatest obligations was the REV. THOMAS MORRELL.—He was the eldest child of Jonathan Morrell, and was born at New York, Nov. 22, 1747. His father was a native of Newtown, L. I., and a grandson of Thomas Morrell, who was at Gravesend, L. I., in 1650, and at Newtown as early as 1655, where he died about 1704, leaving four sons,—Thomas, Samuel, Joseph, and Jonathan. One of these four was the father of Jonathan, and the grandfather of the Rev. Thomas Morrell. The father was a merchant, and from the time of their coming to this town, in 1772, the son had a partnership in the business. When tidings of the battle of Lexington reached the town a company of volunteers was immediately gathered, of which he being among the foremost was chosen captain. He was in command of one of the boats that captured the "Blue Mountain Valley" off Sandy Hook, Jan. 23, 1776. He took an active part in the measures that were adopted to protect the town and neighborhood during the following summer and autumn against the British and Hessians.

In June, 1776, he received a captain's commission, with orders to muster a company of seventy-eight men and report to Gen. Washington, then at New York. Two companies of militia were parading in front of the Presbyterian Church. Young Morrell gave them an earnest talk and then called for volunteers. So effective was his eloquence that in five minutes his quota was filled, many of them being of the most respectable families in the town. They were equipped and ready at New York for service six days after the declaration of independence. They were attached to the New Jersey Brigade, under Gen. Heard, of Woodbridge, and in the fatal engagement at Flatbush, Aug. 27, 1776, were nearly cut to pieces. Capt. Morrell fell severely wounded, and barely escaped with his life. He was removed first to New York, and then to his father's house in this town, where he remained, unable to report for duty, until the advent of Cornwallis and his army of invasion, when he found a refuge at the house of Rev. Jonathan Elmer at New Providence. Soon after he was appointed a major in the Fourth Jersey Regiment, and served through the campaign of 1777, or until the attack on Germantown, Pa., Oct. 3, 1777, in which he took an active part. He also distinguished himself in the battle of Brandywine, Sept. 11, 1777. His health had now become so much impaired that, with the reluctant assent of Washington, who highly esteemed him, he withdrew from military service, and resumed his mercantile pursuits, in which he continued thenceforward nearly ten years.

The change which then ensued is best told in his own words, as recorded in his journal :

"In the month of October, 1785, I was awakened by the preaching of the Rev. John Hagerty,¹ and in March, 1786, received the witness of God's Spirit of my acceptance. In June, 1786, I began to preach as a local preacher in Elizabeth Town, and in several parts of the circuit. In March, 1787, I began to ride as a traveling preacher, and rode on Elizabeth Town Circuit [twenty months] with Robert Clond. At the Conference in New York, in October, 1788, I was ordained deacon [nearly forty-one years old], and appointed to the Trenton Circuit, with John Merrick and Jethro Johnson. At the June Conference in New York, 1789, was ordained an elder, and appointed for that city, with Brother Clond, who was with me twelve months, and Brother Merrick four months."

He continued at New York most of the time for nearly five years, residing at No. 32 John Street. During the first six months he built the Forsyth Street Church, the funds for which he raised himself. The church was dedicated Nov. 8, 1789. A great revival followed, resulting in four hundred conversions and two hundred accessions to the society within nine weeks from Jan. 1, 1790. At the Conference in 1790 he was appointed presiding elder for the district, including New York, Elizabeth Town, Long Island, New Rochelle, and Newburgh Circuits.

In the winter of 1791-92 he traveled with Bishop Asbury through the Southern States. He was stationed several months at Charleston, and returned to New York in June, 1792. In March, 1794, he left the city and retired to Elizabeth Town, having found in the society at New York in 1789 about three hundred members, and left above eight hundred and fifty. The following winter he was stationed at Philadelphia, but in consequence of a severe illness was laid aside about four years. His excellent mother was taken from him July 30, 1796, in her sixty-eighth year. In 1799 he was stationed at Baltimore, Md., and remained two years. In May, 1801, though appointed to New York, he returned home and remained a year. In 1802, with his newly-married wife, he consented to be stationed at New York, but in February, 1804, he retired from the itinerant connection and became a permanent resident of this town. His venerable father closed a long and useful life Sept. 25, 1805, in his eightieth year, having been a consistent member of the church for forty years.

The "meeting-house" of the Methodist society had been built soon after the organization of the church, directly east of and almost adjoining his own house, on Water Street, a short distance below the Adelphian Academy, that occupied in early days the site of the present spacious market-house. It was a small, unpretending frame building, adapted to the wants of a feeble congregation. In this humble structure Mr. Morrell took delight, once at least every Sabbath, in preaching "a free and full salvation" to all who came. At the time of his return to the town Mr. Austin was preaching in the Presbyterian Church. When the congregation voted against continuing him in their service, his friends procured for him the use, during the afternoon and evening of every Sabbath, of the Methodist Church, and at an expense of fifty pounds, obtained by subscription, finished the gallery of the church. The division in the Presbyterian Church brought quite a number of families to attach themselves to the lively and energetic ministry of Mr. Morrell after Mr. Austin's final removal from the town.

During a period of more than thirty-four years from the time of his locating here Mr. Morrell continued in the faithful discharge of his duties as a Christian minister, rarely failing to preach once every Sabbath until his eighty-seventh year. As "Father Morrell" he was known, revered, and greatly honored by all classes of people in the town, many from the other churches, the young as well as the old, resorting frequently to hear the old soldier discourse of the great salvation. He took an active part in all measures for the improvement of the town, and especially for the advancement of religion. On all patriotic occasions—Fourth of July celebrations and the like—he was sure to be present. During the war of 1812-15 his counsels and other services were freely tendered and were invaluable. So late as July 4, 1828, at fourscore years of age, he delivered an oration in the Presbyterian Church, full of patriotic fire and worthy of the occasion.

After the completion of his fourscore years and ten he wrote, Jan. 1, 1838, in his admirably-kept journal as follows:

"Through the tender mercy of God I have lived to see the beginning of another year, being now ninety years, one month, and nine days old,—a longer period than any of our family have lived. I have many things to be thankful for, my life being prolonged to so advanced an age, having the faculties of my mind in perfect exercise, my health tolerably good, sleep sound, appetite good, my wife in health, my children all religious and in health, my son successful as a preacher, my soul devoted to God, and everything in plenty of temporal things. Would to God I was more thankful, more holy, more heavenly-minded. This morning I have devoted my soul and body to God; and though I am unable to preach as formerly, yet I am endeavoring by grace to walk with God. The church here is in a low state. Lord, revive thy work in my soul, and in our and the other churches, for Christ's sake! Amen and Amen."

On the 9th of August, 1838, after a severe illness of six months' duration, he fell asleep in perfect peace, having lived ninety years, eight months, and seventeen days, and having been a faithful and honored minister of the gospel more than fifty-two years.

He was a man of marked personal appearance. "He was rather short in stature, but strongly built. His neck was short, his head not large, his eye bright and blue, his lips thin, and his whole appearance indicative of much more than ordinary firmness. He always wore a covering on his head, like a smoking-cap, from beneath which his hair fell gracefully on his neck. For his age his step was quick and his conversation vivacious. He was neat in person, and always appeared as if dressed for company. He wore a long frock-coat, buttoned to his chin, and, without the least ostentation, was a man of the old school. His memory was retentive to the last, and his senses unimpaired by years."

He was thrice married. The name of his first wife, whom he married about Oct. 1, 1769, has not been preserved. She was the mother of two children,—Elizabeth B. (born July 22, 1770, and died Feb. 2, 1799) and Catherine (born Feb. 29, 1772, married Benjamin Wade, and died Nov. 21, 1800, "rejoicing in the hope of a blissful immortality"). The date of her death has not been ascertained.

He married again (Bishop Asbury officiating) May 24, 1802, Lydia, a daughter of George Frazee, of Westfield. She was born March 20, 1774, and had three children,—Francis Asbury (born June 4, 1804, and died Sept. 11, 1805), Catherine (born Oct. 31, 1805, and married to Rev. William A. Wilmer), and Francis Asbury, second (born July 27, 1807, and married Mary, a daughter of Jonathan Griffith). The latter was a worthy minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church.¹ Mrs. Lydia Morrell died Oct. 11, 1808.

The bereaved husband then married, at Belleville, N. J., Oct. 4, 1809, Eunice, the widow of Theodorus James Hamilton, a well-known merchant of this town. She was the daughter of Mr. Uzal Woodruff and Elizabeth, the daughter of Samuel Ogden and Hannah Hatfield. Their only child, Eunice Theodosia (born Dec. 13, 1811), became, April 12, 1838, the second wife of the Hon. Apollos Morrell Elmer, of this town, a grandson of Rev. Jonathan Elmer. Mrs. Morrell outlived her husband about twelve years.*

First Baptist Church, Elizabeth.²—In 1844, Elkanah Drake, a thorough Baptist, and a member of the church at Mount Bethel, came to Elizabeth. Being zealous for the cause, but few months elapsed before he established a Baptist meeting in the "Select School" room in Union Street. Rev. John Wivell, pastor at Scotch Plains, is said to have preached the first sermon to seven or eight persons. Then supplies were obtained for a time and preached to congregations varying from twelve to eighteen. Then came a young Brother Seeley, a licentiate and student, who spent some time endeavoring to develop and concentrate the little Baptist strength of the community.

On June 5, 1842, delegates from eight Baptist Churches of the vicinity convened in the "Select School" room as a council, and fifteen persons having presented letters from the Baptist Churches of Rahway, Mount Bethel, and Scotch Plains, it was resolved "That we proceed to recognize this body as a Gospel Church." The names of the fifteen were as follows: Isaac Ball, Sarah Ball, Mary E. M. Ball, John W. Boyleston, Catharine Boyleston, Elkanah Drake, Sarah Drake, Elizabeth Faitoute, David S. Higgins, Margaret Higgins, Rebecca Higgins, Caleb Jeffrey, Julia Jeffrey, Rachel Ketcham, and Martha Williams. Of these, Margaret Higgins and Sarah Drake are still members of the church. Mr. and Mrs. Boyleston and Mrs. Ketcham have removed from town. The rest have gone to their reward.

Recognition services were held in the afternoon of the day on which the council met. Rev. E. M. Barker, of Samptown, preached the sermon; Rev. John Wivell gave the hand of fellowship; and Rev. D. T. Hill, of Plainfield, addressed the church. The same day David S. Higgins was chosen deacon and Elkanah Drake clerk of the church.

June 7th the church was received into the East New Jersey Baptist Association, and was also promised by the Board of the State Convention one dollar for every Sabbath they should have preaching. The board continued to aid the church for twelve years, the amount of the appropriations varying according to the necessities of the case. In a little while the church began to contribute to the treasury of the Convention, though still receiving aid themselves. The total amount received from the Convention was $1111.83. One of the first requisites for the new church was a place of worship. This was secured by the purchase and remodeling of the select school room. So promptly did they act that the building was dedicated Nov. 16, 1843, Rev. S. H. Cone, D.D., preaching the sermon from 2 Cor. viii. 9. This building was occupied about fourteen years. The title was first held by individual brethren, but on Feb. 15, 1845, the Society of the First Baptist Church was organized, and has since, by its official representatives, conducted the financial affairs of the church. The society was incorporated April 25, 1848.

Sept. 20, 1843, Charles Cox was called as the first pastor. He was ordained Jan. 23, 1844; the next Lord's Day the first baptism in the history of the church took place. The pastor's wife and Miss Ann Holton were baptized in Elizabeth Creek; a large concourse gathered to witness the ordinance, and many of the residents of this stronghold of Pedobaptists saw a scriptural baptism for the first time. During the brief but faithful ministry of Mr. Cox the church increased to thirty-one members, and a Sunday-school was organized in the latter part of 1844.

Rev. Edward Conover was the next pastor. A series of meetings in the winter resulted in quite a number of conversions; but the doctrines preached by Mr. Conover being objectionable to many he soon closed his labors.

The next experience of the church was sadly unfortunate. A licentiate, Mr. Tibbals, was settled as pastor, but soon developed strong Antinomian doctrines and was obliged to leave; but so strong was his influence that the church was forced to exclude several who held his views.

After a period in which Rev. Joseph Perry supplied the pulpit, Rev. William H. Yuston was called to the pastorate. The work before him was largely recuperative, and faithfully did he perform that work. During his pastorate a debt of eight hundred dollars was paid, and he left the church in a much better condition every way.

Again Mr. Perry supplied the church for a season, and then Rev. J. H. Waterbury became pastor. He was an earnest, prayerful, faithful minister, and his labors told for God and for souls.

The church also began to plan greater things for God and the truth, and some steps were taken towards securing a more eligible site and building a new house of worship. With the advice of the Convention Board and aid of several prominent Baptists of the State, a lot was purchased at Jersey Street, and the pastor was commissioned to raise money to build the house. This work was but half done when he was prostrated by disease which resulted in his death. This defeated the building enterprise.

Through some misunderstanding the church and the Convention now became estranged, and the board of the Convention feeling that Elizabeth was a discouraging field for Baptists withdrew the aid which from the lowness of the treasury it could scarcely give under any circumstances.

The small and struggling church now united with the Lyons Farms Church in supporting a pastor and sharing his labors. Under this arrangement Rev. T. S. Rogers served as pastor two years. But the church was not harmonious, financial difficulties increased, and the church-life reached a very low ebb in all respects. Even disbanding was seriously proposed.

But in June, 1857, Rev. I. N. Hill was secured as pastor, and the drooping interests began to revive. He served nearly two years, during which time the church became united, and a lecture-room was built in Jersey Street at a cost of over three thousand dollars. Sept. 28, 1858, Rev. Rufus Babcock, D.D., preached the dedication sermon, and the baptistry was used on the following Sabbath.

Rev. George W. Clark next assumed charge as pastor. The church had thus far been afflicted with most of the evils and few of the advantages of an itinerancy in the pastorate. But happily a change was now inaugurated, the wisdom of which is fully sustained by the subsequent history of the church. Under the wise direction of Brother Clark the church increased in numbers and in real efficiency. While previously some slight attention had been given to benevolent objects, now a "Missionary Concert" was regularly maintained, and in 1864 a plan for systematic benevolence was inaugurated for the first time in the history of the church. In 1865 a debt of two thousand seven hundred dollars was paid, and the church was enabled to enter more fully into spiritual work. The fruit was the first really extended revival enjoyed, and during the year 1866 a large number were baptized. The church, so small and feeble before, was still by no means large, yet the same year witnessed the withdrawal of forty-eight members to constitute a new interest, now known as the Central Baptist of Elizabeth. The following year Brother Clark resigned and was succeeded to the ninth pastorate by Rev. Theodore A. K. Gessler. He brought youthful vigor and consecrated talent to his work, and with a band of helpers, much improved by the judicious training of Dr. Clark, went on to dare and do in Zion. It soon became evident that a larger and more tasteful edifice was needed if the church would realize the highest efficiency, and to this work both pastor and people addressed themselves. It had been intended to erect a building in front of the chapel so long occupied in Jersey Street, but other counsels prevailed. The result was the sale of the old property and the erection of the fine and commodious structure now occupied by the church on the corner of Union Avenue and Prince Street. The entire cost, including lot, was in round numbers sixty-four thousand dollars, of which nearly thirty thousand was left unprovided for, to become in time a source of serious trouble. It is at present an open question whether the property will be saved to the church or not, but the trustees are hopeful and all are determined to "Hold the Fort" if possible.

The dedication services were held Jan. 3, 1872. Sermons were preached by Rev. Drs. H. M. Gallagher and P. S. Henson. Addresses were made by several others, and the prayer of dedication was offered by the pastor.

In 1871 thirteen members were dismissed to organize a new church at Elizabethport.

In 1874 the Lord poured out his Spirit upon the people most graciously, and as a result sixty-three were baptized. Brother Gessler continued his labors, receiving additions to the church from time to time, until Jan. 1, 1880, when he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y. He left a united people, whose cordial esteem he carried with him, and whose warm hearts were ready to welcome his successor to the tenth pastorate.

Feb. 22, 1880, Rev. J. C. Allen entered upon the pastoral charge. What the result of this union will be is known only to the Great Head of the church.

The following brethren have served the church as deacons: David S. Higgins, Hull Holton, Isaac F. Littell, David Richardson, Benjamin Winans, J. J. Coyne, J. M. Lathrop, George C. Stone, Jonathan Ives, C. H. Rollinson, James Noxon, W. H. Pooler.

The following have acted as clerks of the church: Elkanah Drake, John Brittin, David Richardson, Eugene Suyder, B. J. Spaulding, John Tetlow, J. A. Wolverton, James Sloan, A. W. Dimock, W. W.

Weaver, James Randall, George Peters, E. S. Newberry, T. J. Runyon, A. J. Bicknell.

The present officers of the church are: Pastor, J. C. Allen; Deacons, Jonathan Ives, James Noxon, C. H. Rollinson, W. H. Pooler; Clerk, John Brittin; Superintendent of Sunday-schools, William B. Daland; Treasurer, E. C. Jewett.

The church is sound in the faith and united in heart. Its comparative progress is shown in the following:

Broad Street Baptist Church.—A church under this name was organized in August, 1866, and worshipped at first in the large hall of the court-house. The corner-stone of a church edifice on East Jersey Street was laid April 23, 1868. In June, 1867, Rev. D. Henry Miller, D.D., of Trenton, N. J., was chosen pastor. He entered upon his work in November, and was installed Dec. 19, 1867. He was succeeded by Rev. H. M. Gallagher, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who was the last pastor.

The church got heavily in debt and broke up, the property being sold in 1866 upon foreclosure of a mortgage of twenty-five thousand dollars. It was bought in by Joseph Battin, and held some time in hopes that the church would be able to redeem it. But this not being done it was finally exchanged with the Methodists for two other church buildings, one on East Jersey Street and one on Elizabeth Avenue. The Broad Street Baptist Church edifice is now occupied by St. James' Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Central Baptist Church of Elizabeth was organized in 1877 with sixty members; George W. Kiersted, J. Madison Watson, Thomas O. Conant, deacons. The first trustees were Frederick Foster, Adam D. Coykendall, J. Madison Watson.

Rev. John McKinney, the present and only pastor, is a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1874, and of Rochester Theological Seminary in the class of 1877. He was ordained and installed Oct. 19, 1877, on which day the church was formally recognized as a regular Baptist Church. At present they worship in a rented church building, corner of Jefferson and East Jersey Streets. The membership of the church is one hundred and forty-one; Sunday-school, one hundred and fifty.

Fourth Baptist Church.—In the year 1873 a few colored members of the Baptist Church desired to have services and a regular pastor. A hall was hired, and since then they have met regularly in the Library Hall on Broad Street. Their membership is about forty. Rev. C. Miller is their present pastor.

East Baptist Church, situated on corner of First Avenue and Fulton Street. This church was organized in 1878. The membership is small, about thirty. Rev. H. W. Jones supplied them for a few months, when Rev. W. H. Marshall came, and remained until the present pastor, Rev. Adam Chambers, came, in 1880. They have the prospect of increasing, having a good congregation and quite a large Sabbath-school.

Roman Catholic.—ST. MARY'S CHURCH.¹—Although the borough of Elizabeth is one of the oldest settlements in New Jersey, still the Catholic Church cannot boast of having made any progress within her borders until comparatively late years. The Catholic missionary in search of the scattered sheep of the fold would pass her by, unable to discover within her limits the object of his search. In the year 1829 three Catholics were known to reside in this town, who, when their religious principles were discovered, were obliged to leave, as no employment would be given them. The first influx of Catholicity was caused by the construction of the New Jersey Railroad in the year 1833; and by this means the inhabitants, instead of being disabused of their prejudices, became scandalized at the inebriety and other vices and excesses of the laborers who professed themselves Catholics, and thus their antipathy to religion increased. The construction of this work aroused the dormant energies of the neighborhood. An impetus was given to agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial pursuits. Laborers were in demand. Necessity and interest overcame proscriptive intolerance. The proscribed race was received into employ, in the hopes that it would be enlightened. Those who were weak enough to deny their faith were indulged in their excesses, and evidences that they did are unfortunately in numerous cases permanently existing; but those whose sense of rectitude withstood the tempting offer endured as long as necessity or interest compelled them the taunts of their persecutors, and then left their places to those whose indigence compelled them to accept any situation that offered. During the time of the construction of the New Jersey Railroad, and also of the Central Railroad, the sick-calls were attended to by the late Rev. P. Moran, then the only priest in Newark. In the year 1842 Rev. Yldephon-sus Medrano, then stationed on Staten Island, visited the few scattered Catholics in this neighborhood. He celebrated for them occasionally the rites of religion; but unfortunately the only place he could procure for the purpose was a low tavern on the outskirts of the town, and his visitations were attended by the most unfavorable circumstances, not only to his own personal interest, but also to the most vital interests of religion. A few pious Catholics wept over the degraded condition to which religion was reduced, their most strenuous efforts to elevate it having proved ineffectual. In the fall of 1843 several of the most zealous visited the Bishop of New York, the late lamented Archbishop Hughes; he encouraged them by promising them that he would in the spring send them a priest. In the spring of 1844 he ordained and sent to them their present pastor, Rev. Isaac P. Howell, with instructions to visit that section of the country and report on the possibility of establishing a mission at Elizabethtown and another at Rahway. After considerable difficulty a small room in a house near the town was procured in which to celebrate mass. On Palm Sunday, 1844, a congregation of twenty-five assembled to greet their pastor and assist at the sacred rites of religion.

During the year 1844 there was somewhat of an increase in the congregation, and a collection was commenced in the fall to purchase a lot on which to build a church. In April, 1845, the basement wall of St. Mary's of the Assumption was laid, and by the first Sunday of the next Advent a substantial brick church, fifty feet square, was sufficiently completed to accommodate the congregation, which by this time had increased to about one hundred. The funds for the purchase of the lot were contributed by the congregation, but those for the construction of the building were the charitable offerings of the faithful in New York, and of the different congregations in East New Jersey, and particularly from the laborers on the Morris Canal, solicited by the untiring exertions of the pastor. No sooner was the sign of our salvation erected on the new edifice than the Catholic population began to increase, and in a few years the church became too small. In the year 1847 the German portion of the congregation erected an edifice for themselves, and in a short time were blessed with a pas or of their own. In the year 1851 a substantial brick school-house, two stories high, was erected alongside of St. Mary's Church. In the year 1858 collections were commenced for the enlargement and remodeling of the church and the erection of a pastoral residence in the rear, fronting on Race Street. The spring of 1862 found the work completed, and now a beautiful church, one hundred and thirty-three feet long by sixty-six feet wide, and a spacious pastoral residence evince the zeal and charity of the congregation. In the meanwhile the eastern portion of the city was not idle. The Catholics at the Port determined to have a church of their own; and soon, under the untiring exertions of their pastor, Rev. M. M. Wirzfeld, and the liberality of the flock, a spacious church, school-house, and pastoral residence arose as if by magic. In 1844 the entire population of Elizabethtown was about five thousand, the Catholic population only twenty-five. In the year 1866 the entire population of the city of Elizabeth was about fifteen thousand, and the Catholic population about four thousand. Probably the increase has been in about the same proportion to the present date.

In the year 1849 a substantial brick school-house, two stories high, was erected alongside St. Mary's Church. In the year 1858 collections were commenced for the enlargement and remodeling of the church and the erection of a pastoral residence in the rear, fronting on Race Street. The spring of 1862 found the work completed, and now a beautiful brick edifice, one hundred and thirty-three feet long by sixty-six feet wide, and a spacious pastoral residence evince the zeal and charity of the congregation. In the meanwhile the church was built at Elizabethport. The value of St. Mary's Church, thirty-five thousand dollars; sittings, seven hundred; communicants, two thousand.

The first pastor was Father Isaac P. Howell, 1844-66; Father Kane, 1866-72; Father Thebaud, 1872-82. Assistant priest, Father Tallon.

ST. MARY'S PAROCHIAL SCHOOL, connected with this church, was founded by Rev. Isaac P. Howell, the first pastor. The building is of brick, three stories in height, and was erected in 1861. In 1868 a new front was added to it. The school is supported entirely by the parish, and receives no aid from State or city. There are six class-rooms and six teachers, the higher branches being taught by Mr. Thomas F. Coleman and the others by the Sisters. The number of scholars enrolled is three hundred and fifty, with an average attendance of three hundred.

The parish numbers about two thousand persons. The pastors have been, first, Rev. Isaac P. Howell, who died in 1865; then Rev. Michael Kane, who relinquished his charge early in 1872; and lastly the present pastor, Rev. Leo Thebaud, who entered upon the duties of the pastorate in the autumn of 1872.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH.—Services preparatory to the gathering of the congregation of St. Michael's were first held in 1855 by the Rev. Father Balleis, O.S.B., of the city of New York. He continued his ministrations for a time, and was succeeded by several other missionary priests from the same city until 1858, when the Rev. Father Wirzfeld was appointed pastor. Two other zealous and laborious pastors have since had charge of the parish, viz.: the Rev. Henry Lemke, from 1860 to 1870, and since the latter date the present pastor, the Rev. Albert von Schilgen.

The congregation first worshipped in a rented room on Elizabeth Avenue, and afterwards built a frame church on Smith Street. The building is now used for the parochial school, and in connection therewith has been erected a house for the Sisters of Christian Charity, who are employed as teachers. While on the subject of the school we may add that these Sisters are four in number, three having charge of the day school and one of the industrial school of the parish. They are from the mother school at Wilkesbarre, Pa. The number of pupils in the school is one hundred and ninety-seven.

The present St. Michael's Church is an elegant brick edifice on the corner of East Jersey and Smith Streets, erected at a cost, exclusive of the church and parsonage lots, of thirty thousand dollars; that is, the church has cost that sum already, though the principal tower is not erected. The foundation is just being laid for the parsonage adjoining the church.

There are connected with the congregation one hundred and twenty families, while two hundred and thirty-three children receive instruction in the Sunday-school.

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH.—The corner-stone of this church was laid Sept. 26, 1858, by the Rev. Father M. A. M. Wirzfeld, who also officiated at St. Michael's. The parochial school was established in 1860, at which time the school-house, still occupied, was erected. The new building of St. Patrick's Parochial School was erected in 1880, and will probably be occupied some time during the year 1882. The cost, when completed, will be about fifty thousand dollars. It is the finest brick structure in this part of the city, and occupies a site adjoining the church and the parochial residence. The school contains about nine hundred pupils, taught by nine Sisters of Charity and one male teacher, who has charge of the highest boys' class.

Nearly one thousand families are connected with the parish, and its varied cares and duties render the life of the pastor by no means an easy one. While attending to the daily wants of his numerous flock, visiting the sick, burying the dead, and administering the stated and special services of his church, he is also extensively engaged in building, and has charge of a large cemetery belonging to the parish (Mount Olivet Catholic Cemetery), situated about three miles north of the city, in which interments began to be made in 1871. The following have been pastors of the church: Rev. M. A. M. Wirzfeld, Rev. Patrick Hennessy, Rev. Patrick Cody, and the present pastor, Rev. Martin Gessner.

ST. JOSEPH'S ACADEMY, with an academic and industrial school, on the corner of First Street and Magnolia Avenue, is also connected with St. Patrick's, and is under eight teachers of the Sisters of St. Dominick.

ST. HENRY'S CHURCH.—This parish became a separate charge from St. Michael's, under the ministry of the Rev. Henry Lemke, about 1869. It was incorporated April 18, 1871, the trustees being John Gilmary Shea and Edward Ives. The parish is composed of about two hundred families and a parochial school of one hundred and eighty-eight scholars. The school was established by Rev. Father Lemke in 1869, and was at first held in the Convent of St. Walburga adjoining, but in 1872 the present building was erected. It is two stories with French roof, the lower floor being used as St. Henry's Chapel. The upper floor consists of four class-rooms, over which are four Sisters from the convent. The convent belongs to the Sisters of St. Bernard, of whom there are eighteen, having a mission at Carlstadt, N. J., and at Easton, Pa. St. Walburga's Select School is taught by two Sisters at the convent, and numbers twenty-four scholars.

Since Father Lemke two pastors have been in charge of the parish, viz.: Rev. Father Athanasius, and since November, 1880, Rev. Father Augustine Wirth. The latter is quite a voluminous writer, having a series of several volumes now in progress.

First Congregational Church.—This church was built in 1866. The Rev. Mr. Wolcott was the first pastor, and during the building held services in a hall. The building is a Gothic frame, costing about fifteen thousand dollars, situated on First Street. Membership, one hundred; accommodation, five hundred. The next pastor, Rev. S. Rossiter, came in 1871, and remained four years. The present pastor, Rev. Thomas Heywood, came in 1876.

Siloam Presbyterian Church.—This colored church was organized in the year 1867, and supplied by a number of pastors who remained for a short time. Much of their help financially has come from the other churches, and their building erected a few years ago with accommodations of about three hundred and membership of seventy. The present pastor Rev. William Carr, 1080 Elizabeth Avenue.

German Presbyterian Church, situated on First Avenue and near the Central Railroad line or track. They built a Gothic frame church in 1879, costing about seven thousand dollars, with accommodations of about four hundred and fifty and membership of forty-seven. Their pastor, Rev. Otto Rudolph, whose labors among them is the means of drawing good congregations.

German Evangelical Lutheran Church.—The first services of this church were held by a minister from Switzerland, Rev. William Ferdinand Wirz, in 1856. Some question arose as to his being a Lutheran clergyman, but he was chosen as pastor of the congregation. Services were held in the upper part of a private building on the corner of Division and High Streets. In 1857 ground was purchased for a church; it was built in the latter part of 1878, and dedicated in the spring of 1879. Since the first minister the following have officiated as pastors: Rev. William Meynicke, Rev. G. Mantz, Rev. Christian Reichenbecher, Rev. Frederick Stuecklin. The latter has been pastor since 1867.

About one hundred and sixty families are connected with the parish; communicants, four hundred and fifty; Sunday-school scholars, three hundred and forty. The parish supports a day school with an average attendance of seventy, in which German and English are taught.

German Moravian Church of Elizabeth.—This church was organized by Rev. Christian Neu in 1867, and for about two years worshiped in the mission chapel corner of Smith and Martin Streets, near the cross-roads. The corner-stone of their church edifice on Seventh Street was laid May 17, 1869, and the structure was completed that year at a cost of thirteen hundred dollars. It is a wooden building, capable of seating two hundred and fifty persons. The present membership is two hundred and fifty; Sunday-school, one hundred and forty-five.

Rev. Mr. Neu was succeeded by Rev. Charles Nagle as pastor, who remained a little over three years. The present pastor, Rev. John Praeger, was settled over the church in August, 1876. He is a native of Württemberg, Germany, and preaches in the German language.

Missions.—Besides the above churches, there are in the city the following missions:

ST. JOHN'S MISSION, No. 1.—Superintendent, J. A. Dix.

ST. JOHN'S MISSION, No. 2.—Superintendent, W. P. Roberts.

THIRD AVENUE MISSION.—Superintendent, John Mandeville.

CHRIST CHURCH MISSION.—802 Elizabeth Avenue.

CROSS-ROAD MISSION.—Joseph Alward, superintendent.

GOOD WILL MISSION.—John Beale, superintendent.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

GEN. ELIAS DAYTON,

of Elizabethtown, was one of the heroes of the war of the Revolution, and for many years a leading resident of that historic locality, where he was born May 1, 1737.

The family from which he sprang originated at Maidstone, on the east bank of the river Medway, in County Kent, England. Ralph Dayton, the ancestor of the family in this country, came thence to Boston at an early period, but finally settled near East Hampton, L. I., where he died in 1667. Robert, his son, aged eighty-four, died in 1712. Capt. John Dayton was a lineal descendant of Ralph Dayton, and the grandfather of the subject of this sketch. He was a weaver by trade, possessed of many marked characteristics, and one of the most patriotic and influential residents on Long Island in his day. He lived two miles from East Hampton. Jonathan, his son, located at Elizabethtown about the year 1700, where he was one of the pioneer settlers and a prominent citizen. He was the father of the subject of this sketch.

Gen. Dayton entered the military service of the province as a lieutenant March 19, 1759, and was made captain March 29, 1760, serving with the British troops in the French war on the frontiers, in the regiment known as the "Jersey Blues." He participated in the battle on the Heights of Abraham at the gates of Quebec on Sept. 13, 1759, and was present at the surrender five days after. In 1764 he was sent on special service in command of an expedition against the Northern Indians near Detroit. A journal kept by him during the five months he passed in that wild region is still in existence, and is full of exciting interest. The objects of the expedition were accomplished, and he received official commendation for his success. After the disbandment of the provincial forces he engaged in mercantile pursuits in his native town, where he became an alderman, and upon the occurrence of the troubles with the mother-country soon after was active in determining the people to stand by the Bostonians. In December, 1774, he was chosen at a meeting of the town freeholders to be a member of the "Committee of Correspondence and Observation, to favor the more vigorous prosecution of the measures recommended by Congress." His father, Jonathan, who was then over seventy-four years of age, served on the same committee. In the fall of 1775, when recruiting for the Continental army was begun, he was appointed muster-master, and assisted in the organization of the first two regiments raised in the province. At the beginning of the year 1776 Congress directed that the Third Regiment be raised in New Jersey, and elected Mr. Dayton to be its colonel. On the 23d of January, 1776, he signalized himself by fitting out at Elizabethtown an expedition of three armed boats and one hundred and ten men, with which in conjunction with a boat and forty men under Lord Stirling he captured the British transport ship "Blue Mountain Valley," which lay in the lower bay of New York loaded with supplies and necessities for the British army. The prize was brought to Elizabethtown, and a resolution of thanks to the captors was passed by Congress. In April, 1776, Col. Dayton was given command in the valley of the Mohawk, where he quelled the Toryism which had been fostered by the activity of Sir John Johnson, and kept a check on the Indians of the "Six Nations" in that locality. He built Fort Schuyler on the site of old Fort Stanwix at Rome, and Fort Dayton at Herkimer. In the close of the year he took part in the defense of Ticonderoga and Mount Independence, after which his regiment was returned to New Jersey, and was brigaded with the Continental troops under Gen. Maxwell. Col. Dayton continued to serve with great bravery in the later campaigns of the army. Sept. 11, 1777, he had his horse shot under him, at the battle of the Brandywine; at the battle of Germantown, Oct. 4, 1777, he had another horse killed under him. In the winter of 1777-78 he was posted at Elizabethtown, and put in supervision of the secret service for Gen. Washington, getting information of the enemy's condition and movements. In June, 1779, he served under Gen. Sullivan in the campaign against the "Six Nations," near Elmira, N. Y. The following winter he served under Gen. Washington in his movements against the British stationed on Staten Island, and in the campaign of 1780 he participated in the skirmishes at Elizabethtown and vicinity, performing illustrious service at Connecticut Farms and Springfield, N. J. Soon after the battle of Springfield Gen. Maxwell's resignation was accepted by Congress, and Col. Dayton assumed command of the Jersey Brigade and held it during the remainder of the war, although not confirmed as a brigadier-general until January, 1783. In September, 1781, the Jersey Brigade under Col. Dayton landed on James River, about five miles from Williamsburg, and participated in the siege of Yorktown. Col. Dayton was present at the signing of the capitulation by Lord Cornwallis, Oct. 19, 1781, and in 1782 was in charge of the prison-camp at Chatham, N. J. The Jersey Brigade was discharged Nov. 3, 1783. Gen. Dayton had taken a part in all the battles in which the Continental line of New Jersey had been engaged. After the war he was commissioned major-general of the Second Division, New Jersey State Militia, which command he held at the time of his death, Oct. 22, 1807. Upon the formation of the New Jersey Society of the Cincinnati, Gen. Dayton was chosen its president, and held that office during the remainder of his life. He declined an election to Congress in 1779. In 1787 he was appointed a member of the convention to frame the Constitution of the United States, but favored the appointment of his son Jonathan, afterwards Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Fourth Congress and United States senator. In 1789 he was elected recorder of Elizabethtown, and from 1796 to 1805, with the exception of one year, he was mayor of the town, and for several years a member of the Legislature of the State. In private life he sustained a high reputation. He was open and generous, scrupulously upright, and in manners easy, unassuming, and pleasant. In person and bearing he is said to have resembled Gen. Washington so strongly that with their backs turned it was difficult to distinguish them.

Gen. Dayton married a Miss Rolfe. His children were Jonathan, Hannah, wife of Col. Matthias Ogden; Elias Bailey, Sally, wife of Isaac G. Ogden, of New York; William, Horace, Aaron, and John. Elias B. Dayton engaged in mercantile pursuits in Elizabethtown, and was the first cashier of the State Bank. He was the father of Hon. Aaron Ogden Dayton. William was a lumber merchant in the same place.

Horace engaged in trade in New York City. Aaron removed to Cincinnati, near which place he engaged in farming. John, the father of Miss Sarah O'Dayton, of Elizabeth, from whom many of these facts were obtained, engaged in farming near Madison, N. J., where he died in 1803. Hon. William L. Dayton was a grandnephew of Gen. Dayton, being descended from Robert, son of Jonathan, and brother of the general.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

CITY OF RAHWAY.

Early History.—The earliest allusions to the site of the present city of Rahway, and to settlers residing or owning land thereon, are found in the records of the townships of Elizabethtown and Woodbridge, whose geographical boundaries originally met on the marshy stream known as "Robinson's Branch," now in the heart of the city. From the Elizabethtown records—referring, of course, to the territory on the north side of the branch—we find that the following-named persons were owners of land on the "Rawack River," or "Rawack," as it was then called, at the dates given in connection with their respective surveys or settlements:

William Oliver owned "84 acres of upland at Rawack," bounded by Peter Morse, Samuel Marsh, Sr., David Oliver, and William Piles. He was one of the original eighty Elizabeth Associates, and lived on his home-lot at Elizabeth, his land here being an out-farm or plantation. His ancestors were from Bristol, England, 1632, and lived in Boston or vicinity, where they left large families. William Oliver died about 1694.¹

David Oliver, above mentioned, was the son of William, and owned land at Rahway, adjoining that of his father, where he probably lived. One of his sons, David (2d), was notorious as a Tory and refugee during the Revolution, and is described as "the dread of the inhabitants on the lines." The New Jersey Journal of Dec. 5, 1782, gives an account of his having been engaged on the Saturday night preceding, with a band of refugees from Staten Island, in attempting to take off cattle from Elizabethtown. They proceeded in a gunboat to the mouth of Elizabethtown Creek. Capt. Jonathan Dayton being informed of the route they proposed to take waylaid them with a small party near the Port. It so happened that in passing Dayton's ambush the party turned aside from the road to avoid a mud-slough, which obliged the ambushers to fire through two fences, killing one, mortally wounding another, and taking three prisoners, whereas, had not this détour occurred, it is believed that all of them might have been killed at the first fire. As it was, two escaped. Three had been left to take care of the boat, who, hearing a row-boat coming down the creek, sought to escape to Staten Island, but they were overtaken and captured by Lieut. Randall. Swaim Parcel informed them that Oliver had fled to Rahway. He was pursued and found "concealed in a house at Rahway," and captured that night.¹

Peter Morse owned a parcel of land described as a "Neck of Land at Rawack." He also owned one hundred and forty acres along "West Brook, Rawack Swamp, and the Common." He was the son of Robert Morse. He and his father were among the eighty original Associates, and came to the township in 1665 from Rowley, Mass., having lived in Boston in 1644, and in Newbury in 1654.

The Morse homestead was on Thompson's Creek, more generally known as "Morse's Creek," long the boundary between Rahway and Elizabeth. Peter Morse died in May, 1702.

Samuel Marsh, Sr., another of the original Associates, had one hundred acres of upland at "Rawack," called by the name of "Ragged Neck," bounded by Jeffry Jones, Simon Rouse, and his own meadow. He also owned other parcels of land in the vicinity. He came from New Haven, Conn., among the first settlers, with a wife and seven children. His eldest son, Samuel, Jr., was admitted among the eighty Associates, and had an allotment of eighty acres at "Rahwack," bounded by Robert Vanquellin, Simon Rouse, Thomas Moore, Benjamin Wade, and a great swamp; also ten acres of meadow, "lying at Rahwack in the Meadow of Samuel Marsh, Sr." The elder Marsh, familiarly called "Old Marsh," died in September, 1683.²

William Johnson owned one hundred acres on the "West Branch of the Rawack River," and sixty acres of upland on the "Rawack River," adjoining lands of Simon Rouse. Also sixty acres of upland on "Rawack Plaine" and other lands. He was a resident of the New Haven colony as early as 1648, and came here with the first settlers. His property, however, in 1678, amounting in all to two hundred and sixty-two acres, was mortgaged to Roger Lambert to secure the payment of one hundred pounds, and Lambert subsequently became the owner.³

Robert Vauquellin, the surveyor-general under Carteret, was the proprietor of forty acres of land "at Rawack." It adjoined the lands of Simon Rouse and Samuel Marsh, Sr. Vauquellin, often styled in the East Jersey records "Sieur des Prairies," was a Frenchman from the city of Caen. He is thought to have resided later in the island of Jersey, whence he and his wife came in the ship "Philip" with Carteret in August, 1665. Having been appointed by Berkeley and Carteret surveyor-general of their domain in America, he exercised the functions of that office until 1681. He was also a member of Carteret's council. In 1678 he removed to Woodbridge, where he obtained grants of land and continued to reside.

Thomas Moore owned sixty acres of land described as lying "towards Rahwack," and adjoining Benjamin Wade. Also twenty acres of meadow adjoining William Piles' upland. He was one of the original Associates, and came to the town in 1665. He died in 1708.⁴

Jonas Wood was the owner of one hundred and fifty acres of upland "at Rahwack," adjoining Jeffry Jones; sixty acres of upland and twenty acres of meadow "on Rawack Neck." He was one of the original Associates, and came from Southampton, L. I. He was licensed July 10, 1679, to "keep an ordinary," and was chosen Nov. 3, 1693, and in 1694 a deputy to the General Assembly. He owned a good deal of land about Rahway, both meadow and upland, and was a highly-respected citizen. His household of six acres adjoined the land of Samuel Marsh, Sr., on the northeast.

William Letts had seventy acres of upland "at Rawack," adjoining Robert Vanquellin and William Cramer. He was a weaver by occupation, married Elizabeth Laud, lived on house-lot (thirteen acres) adjoining Joseph Frazee. He removed to Perth Amboy, where he died in March, 1702.

Simon Rouse, whose lands have so often been referred to in the boundaries, was a son of John and Annie Rouse, of Duxbury, Mass. She was a daughter of John Peabody. He was born in 1645, and came here before 1676. He had surveyed to him fifty-eight acres of upland "on Rahwack River," adjoining William Johnson; also ninety-eight acres adjoining the above on the northeast, having Robert Vauquellin's land on the northwest. He had also one hundred acres on the east side of "Rahwack River, opposite Pope's Brook." He resided at Rahway. His lands in the other part of the town he exchanged with Jonas Wood, May 29, 1678, and Nov. 27, 1679, bought Vauquellin's lands adjoining his own. He died in 1690. His wife, Alice, died soon after without issue. Frances, a daughter of Samuel Moore, of Woodbridge, inherited the estate, being probably an adopted daughter, as she lived with them.⁵

Benjamin Wade, who was a clothier in Elizabethtown, and became quite wealthy in real estate, owned an interest in "Rahwack Swamp" to the extent of forty-eight acres allotted to him by the town, and twelve acres of meadow "at Rahwack." He was the ancestor of a very highly respected family, and died about 1698.

William Robinson, who appears in the records as "William Robinson, Doctor of Physick," was the proprietor of seven hundred acres of land lying on the branch of the Rahway River called Robinson's Branch. On his first arrival in the town he purchased lands of John Toe, and subsequently (April 1, 1686) he had surveyed to him the above tract of seven hundred acres, adjoining the lands of Joseph Frazee, Richard and John Clarke, George and John Alexander, William Piles, Simon Rouse, and Thomas Rudyard.

Dr. Robinson's lands extended along the branch on the north side of the wood bridge. He also bought of John Toe, Sept. 12, 1688, another parcel on the west branch of Rahway River. He was a large land-owner both here and in Monmouth County, where he had surveyed to him in 1692 "550 acres in full of his share of the first division."

Dr. Robinson is supposed to have emigrated from Scotland, and to have received his education in that country. He was evidently a man of ability, means, energy, and wide influence.

The following, found in "An Account of the Settled Towns in East Jersey," given under the hand of Capt. Nichols, secretary to the Duke of York, in 1680, probably has reference to Rahway: "There are several Out-plantations on the North end of the River which divides the bounds between this town (Elizabethtown) and Woodbridge, particularly where the road passes over, to which place is about seven or eight miles." If this refers to Rahway, it shows that there was a considerable settlement here in 1680, over two hundred years ago. All the circumstances go to show that Rahway is the place meant: (1) the river dividing Elizabethtown from Woodbridge is the Rahway River; (2) the settlement is located at the place where the road to Woodbridge crossed the river; (3) the distance, seven or eight miles from Elizabethtown, corresponds also to the facts. We therefore conclude that the account refers to Rahway. There were "several out-plantations" on the river at this time, but the writer¹ refers particularly to the one "where the road passes over" in going from Elizabethtown to Woodbridge, indicating that it was the most considerable settlement. This ancient settlement appears to have been nearly equidistant between Elizabethtown and Woodbridge, and, inasmuch as it was regarded as an out-plantation of Elizabethtown, was undoubtedly on that side of the river within the town bounds.

A settlement of equal antiquity, no doubt, was made on the Woodbridge side of the river, known later as Bridge Town or Lower Rahway. This settlement seems to have attained sufficient dignity and independence of the mother-hamlet of Woodbridge by the beginning of the eighteenth century as, in the estimation of the freeholders of the township, to deserve a separate pound for the lodgment of animals unlawfully running at large; and so it was voted at the Woodbridge town-meeting for January, 1701, that Rahway be granted the privilege of building a pound. This is the earliest mention which we find of the settlement, at least the earliest indicating the growth of a village in that locality.

Woodbridge was first settled in the latter part of 1665. The land was originally purchased of the Indians by the same parties who made the Elizabethtown purchase, viz.: John Bayly, Daniel Denton, and Luke Watson, on the 28th of October, 1664. These parties made it over to Governor Carteret and John Ogden, who in 1666 sold it to Daniel Pierce and eight associates from Newbury, Haverhill, and other places in Massachusetts. The price paid for it was eighty pounds sterling. Daniel Pierce and his associates took immediate possession as proprietors of the township, receiving from Governor Carteret, on behalf of the Lords Proprietors, a liberal charter and having their boundaries and lots surveyed to them. In December, 1667, plots were ordered surveyed and assigned to the settlers and roads laid out. The boundaries of the township were defined in June, 1669. The line began at the mouth of the Rahway River (called Rawack), and followed the stream as high as the tide flowed to a fresh-water brook running west-northwest (afterwards and to this day called Robinson's Branch), "where there stands a beech-tree that is marked on the four sides of it." From this tree the line ran straight west through one large swamp and two small ones until it reached a walnut stake in an open field. This stake was marked with two notches and a cross. The distance from the beech-tree to the walnut stake was five and a half miles. The line turned sharply to the south at this point, running through "Dismal Swamp," and striking the Raritan River at a distance of seven and a half miles from the aforesaid walnut stake. This point on the river was about ten chains east of two red cliffs on the opposite side. From this the line followed the Raritan River to its mouth. The township was therefore bounded on the east by the Sound or Kills which divide Staten Island from the mainland, on the north by the bounds of Elizabethtown, on the west by Piscataway, and on the south by Raritan River.

It was not many years before that portion of the township now included in the city of Rahway became thickly settled. Among the early settlers in this section many belonged to the Society of Friends. The Friends having purchased the province and established the proprietary government in 1682, a new impulse was given to many persons of that order to seek homes in the country. Many had already established themselves in different towns. Shrewsbury, one of the seven associated towns of the province, had been settled almost exclusively by the Friends as early as 1667, the first religious meetings of the society being held there in 1672. The territory of West Jersey after 1674 had been in the possession of the Friends. In East Jersey they constituted an important element in Amboy and Woodbridge. The Friends who settled in this section mostly purchased lands along the Rahway River, some of them living in Woodbridge and some of them in Elizabethtown. In 1686 they established a monthly meeting at Amboy. This continued to be held for three years, when a monthly meeting was begun at Woodbridge on the 17th day of August, 1689. On the 16th of October, 1742, the first weekly meeting of the Friends was begun at Rahway in the house of Joseph Shotwell.

We shall, however, defer the religious history of the Friends, to be considered hereafter in connection with the history of the churches.

Among those who were early settlers of Rahway and met with the Woodbridge society we have the names of William Robinson, John and Joseph Shotwell, the Marshes, Hunts, and others. This William Robinson was a son of Dr. William Robinson, and was a prominent man among the Friends, as we learn from the following entry in the records of the Woodbridge meeting: "William Robinson 'is ordered to gett bords for y^e meeting-house flore & to speak to y^e brick-maker for bricks for y^e chimney.' At the next meeting he reported that he had spoken to the brickman about the bricks, and he said that 'as soon as he hath done burning a kill at Elizabethtown he will burn som hear & then we may have som.'"

In the Woodbridge records we find the name of John Jaques, son of Henry and Hannah Jaques. He was born on the 2d of August, 1674. He had brothers, Henry, born Sept. 12, 1675; Jonathan, born April 9, 1679; and sister, Sarah, born Jan. 12, 1677. Henry Jaques, Sr., was a carpenter, and one of the original nine Associates of Woodbridge. To him and his son Henry were granted three hundred and sixty-eight acres of land in 1670. This land extended along the Rahway, including what is now Main Street in the city of Rahway, as far up as the Pennsylvania Railroad crossing.

Prior to the incorporation of Rahway as a city three separate villages occupied portions of the area within its limits. Long stretches of undrained meadows and considerable marsh at the confluence of the branches of the Rahway River intervened between them. The northernmost village was Rahway proper, situated in Essex County; the other two, lying south of the river, were known respectively as Milton and Bridgetown, though the latter was known also as Lower Rahway. A fourth hamlet, known as Leesville, was also for a time a distinct settlement from Lower Rahway, lower down the river, but still within the present corporate limits of the city.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

First Mills and Roads.—The first saw-mill in Rahway was built by John Marsh on the south side of the river, just above the present railroad bridge, as early as 1683. The following quaint and interesting document is proof of this assertion:

"A meeting of y^e Inhabitants of Elizabethtown, June y^e 25, 1683: Voted that John Marsh have Liberty and Consent from y^e towne soe far as they are Concerned to gett timber to saw at his Saw-mill upon Land not Surveyed, lying upon Rahway River or y^e branches or else-where, so far as he shall have occasion to fetch timber for y^e above mill.

"And the said John Marsh doth pledge himself to y^e inhabitants of y^e towne to saw for them Logs if they bring them to y^e mill, one-half of y^e boards or timber for sawing the other, that is so much as is for their particular use.

"Att A towne meeting June y^e 28, 1684,

"John Marsh desired y^e towne to grant him liberty to clear Rahway River & y^e Branch for the Conveyance of his mill, which was granted to him y^e said John Marsh, and passed by a free vote for y^e same, with this proviser that there should be no hindrance of bridges or stoppage of passages.

"December y^e 19th, 1684, y^e towne Committee of Elizabethtowne did give and grant leave and liberty to John Marsh to set up a grist-mill upon y^e stream whereon his saw-mill stands, namely, y^e stream called Rahway River, y^e aforesaid Committee did upon y^e above said day give him y^e stream for y^e ends and purposes above named.

"All y^e above written & true Copie taken out of y^e Records of Elizabethtowne by me.

"ISAAC WHITEHEAD, Clerk."

Transfers of the Mill Property.—John Marsh to Stephen Van Cortlandt, March 2, 1695. Stephen Van Cortlandt to William Donaldson, July 11, 1733. William Donaldson deeded to Samuel Marsh, Dec. 11, 1739, three and one-fourth acres and one half of the mills, and at the same date conveyed to Joseph Meyer three and one-fourth acres and one-fourth of the mills. He also, Dec. 11, 1739, conveyed to Joseph Marsh three and one-fourth acres, described as "beginning at the stone house."

Donaldson sold the remaining one-fourth to Mordecai Marsh, and it remained in the Marsh family until it was bought by Lufbery & Vail in 1826. It is now the property of Ayres & Lutbery, where their steam-mill and planing-mill are located.

The oldest house of the Marsh family—that of Samuel Marsh, Sr., of Rahway—stands on the corner of Main Street and Elm Avenue, covered with shingles and inclosed with wrought nails. This house is over one hundred and fifty years old. Samuel Marsh married Mary Shotwell, of Shotwell's Landing.

Jonathan Bishop, who was admitted as a freeholder of Woodbridge in 1682, was granted a parcel of common land in consideration of his building a saw-mill on it "alongside of the southern branch of the Rahway River." The mill was to be exempt from tax for five years. The southern branch is sometimes subsequently called "Mill Brook" in the records. Thus in January, 1686, John Bishop "engaged to make a sufficient bridge over the brook called Mill Brook, in the Country Highway leading to Elizabeth Town." This is the stream in Lower Rahway (Leesville) which is now spanned by a bridge, as in those days, and probably at the same place.

There was a road district in this part of the town in October, 1684, of which Capt. John Bishop was overseer. He was appointed by the town "to look after the Rahway roads." All the inhabitants were required to "appear at the several places appointed by the several overseers and be ready to go to work at sun an hour high, or else the overseer may refuse them."¹

Capt. John Bishop had a grist-mill on the Rahway River. This mill was, of course, above tide. His residence was a little east of his mill.² The place was known as Bishop's Landing. Another landing was at Robert Wright's (William Edgar's corner, just as you enter Rahway from the Woodbridge road). These landings were reserved by order of the town for public docks perpetually. They were "first built for the transportation of hay;" but, although that continued for many years to be one of the principal articles of export, an extensive trade was gradually developed in breadstuffs, etc., which rendered the landings well known and important points. But the advent of steam, superseding the oar and sail in commerce, has nearly obliterated them from the memory of those now living.

"A highway was laid out on the 8th of January, 1687, for the Rahway settlers, beginning at Robert Wright's Landing, and extending thence easterly down to 'John Codington's Point' into the meadows." This road connected the point and the meadows with Wright's Landing at Lower Rahway. Robert Wright was a tanner and shoemaker, and came from Staten Island. In asking for a certain tract of land, formerly the property of John Trueman, he was granted permission of it on condition that he should settle on it and work at his trades. He was constable of the town in 1689. Noah Bishop was constable in 1693.

Capt. John Bishop was president of the town court, 1688-1700; was an assistant justice, 1669-75, 1683-87. Jonathan Bishop was an ensign in the militia, and John Bishop, Jr., captain, 1682-97.

In 1685 eight men were appointed by the town, in as many different localities, to guard the timber which was being unlawfully cut on the common lands. "John Conger and Noah Bishop were chosen for Rahwack (Rahway) and parts adjacent."³ The inference is a just one that John Conger and Noah Bishop were residents of Lower Rahway in 1685, and that the Bishop estates were in this portion of the town. John Bishop was overseer of highways here the year preceding, and the year following had charge of building a bridge across the creek.

John Conger and Noah Bishop, who in 1685 were appointed to prosecute any one in Rahway or adjacent places who illegally cut the timber on the common land, were the victims of a suit brought against them by Thomas Thorp in 1687 for removing from the commons some of Thorp's dressed trees, by a mistake doubtless. "The costs fell upon the town, as Conger and Bishop were acting as the town agents and were beaten by Thorp."

John Conger and Jonathan Bishop were two of the ten citizens appointed to make the second division of the common town lands in 1687. "Sixty acres of upland" were apportioned to each freeholder, and it was required that these ten men should make it their business forthwith "to Lay out the said Divisions of Land; six hands to be each Day about the said work, and to have for their pains three shillings per day."

The old road from Elizabeth Town to Woodbridge followed substantially what is now Linden Avenue, crossing the river about where the Pennsylvania Railroad bridge now crosses it. At a point about a hundred rods northeast, near the railroad, was located the post-office of the village at an early time, and within the recollection of some of the immediate ancestors of old residents now living.

ROAD TO CORTLANDT'S SAW-MILL.—Cortlandt's saw-mill was the old Marsh mill, where the steam-mills of Messrs. Ayres & Lufbery now stand, for, as we have seen, John Marsh conveyed the property to Stephen Van Cortlandt in 1695. The Woodbridge records furnish the following:

"February ye 9th, 1699: Then laid out by us undernamed a Highway Six Rods in Breadth: Beginning at the Highway which Runs by Jonathan Bishops New Dwelling House about ten Rods Eastward from the North East Corner of the said Bishops Orchard: from thence Running over the Mill Brook, and so Extending on the Southerly side of John Rolphs Dwelling House to the House of John Jaquis: from thence Running through the said Jaquis his Land four Rod in Breadth, by the Bank side and through the land belonging to Jonathan Jaquis: from thence upon a Direct Line to John Stewards Dwelling House: the whole way between the House of the above said John Jaquis and John Stewards House being but four Rod broad.

"Also a Highway from the Landing on the River; about fifty Rod below the said Stewards House, beginning at a Black Oak tree marked on three sides: thence Running by the River Six Rod broad to Mr. Cortlands saw-mill: from thence to a Black oak tree standing Near the Bank of the said River; the way Running between the said tree and bank; thence Extending along by the bank to town line: from thence by the Town Line and through a Corner of John Jaquis his Land on the South Side of a Rowe of marked trees into the Common; the said way from Cortlands Mill being four Rod broad:

Spanktown.—One of the names of Rahway, perhaps the earliest to be found on record, was Spank Town. Whatever may have been the origin of this name, it is made famous in the annals of the Revolution. A battle was fought here which, according to the best authority, lasted about two hours. It was the last engagement of our forces with the British when the latter were driven out of New Jersey, with the exception of Amboy and New Brunswick, after their disastrous defeat at Trenton and Princeton early in January, 1777.

The success of Washington in this respect was one of the greatest military achievements of the war. He had surprised and captured nearly a thousand Hessians at Trenton, with the loss of only four men wounded. "This brilliant manœuvre completely turned the tide of affairs. The British, who believed themselves masters of the country, and scouted the idea of any opposition, were painfully roused from their reveries, and began to be alarmed for their safety. The Americans, on the other hand, were electrified and delighted, and inspired with new life." That Washington foresaw what course would be taken by the British and planned his movements with consummate skill is evident from what follows:

"On the 30th, at Trenton, Washington wrote to Maxwell to collect as large a force as possible at Chatham, 'and after gaining the proper intelligence, endeavor to strike a stroke upon Elizabeth-Town or that neighborhood,' instructions which Maxwell prepared at once to carry out. Following up his advantages, Washington once more crossed the Delaware, passed around the British at Trenton, marched forward by night, surprised and captured Princeton on the morning of Jan. 3, 1777, and then took post for two or three days at Pluckamin, in Somerset County, thus compelling the British commander to evacuate all his posts beyond New Brunswick, and to provide by a concentration of his forces for the safety of his stores at the latter place. On Monday, the 6th, Washington removed to Morristown to give his wearied troops some rest, and to watch the panic-stricken foe.¹

"Gen. Sir William Howe writes from New York, Jan. 5, 1777, that 'Lord Cornwallis returned with his whole force to Brunswick, and the troops at the right being assembled at Elizabeth-Town, Major-General Vaughan has that command.'²

"Taking advantage of the consternation of the enemy and the advance of the American army, General Maxwell, with the militia under his command, came down from the Short Hills, compelled the British to evacuate Newark, had a brush with them at Springfield, drove them out of Elizabeth Town, and fought them at Spank Town (Rahway) a couple of hours."

If Spank Town had never had the name before it was entitled to it from this time certainly on account of the spanking rate at which Maxwell came down from the Short Hills with his militia and punished the rear of the retreating enemy.

The fullest account we have of this affair is taken from a letter dated at Philadelphia, Jan. 16, 1777:

"Our army marched from Pluckamin and arrived at Morristown on the sixth. General Maxwell with a considerable body of Continental troops and militia, having marched towards Elizabeth Town, sent back for a reinforcement, which having joined him, he advanced and took possession of the town, and made prisoners of fifty Waldeckers and forty Highlanders who were quartered there, and made prize of a schooner with baggage and some blankets on board. About the same time one thousand bushels of salt were secured by our troops at a place called Spank Town, about five miles from Woodbridge, where a party of our men attacked the enemy at that place; they sent for a reinforcement to Woodbridge, but the Hessians absolutely refused to march, having heard we were very numerous in that quarter. The English troops at Elizabeth Town would not suffer the Waldeckers to stand centry at the outposts, several of them having deserted and come over to us."

The battle at this place is also alluded to in another letter dated Trenton, Jan. 9, 1777:

"A regiment of British troops at Spank Town, six miles below Elizabeth Town, was attacked on Sunday by a party of Jersey militia; the encounter continued about two hours. Two regiments marched up from Woodbridge and Amboy to reinforce the enemy, and thus saved them."

As to the "one thousand bushels of salt" which was stored here, it was probably a cargo which had been brought up the Rahway, which was navigable by small vessels as far up as the old bridge, which gave to the place at an early time the name of Bridge Town. The principal fort at Elizabeth Town being then in possession of the British, this salt and possibly other valuable stores were brought in here to be more secure from the enemy. In later times a considerable commerce was carried on in vessels between this place and New York via Rahway River.

After the Revolution vessels were laden with produce at Shotwell's Landing and sailed directly to Bristol, England, returning with dry-goods in exchange.

CHAPTER XXXV.

File of an Old Paper.—We have before us a file of the Bridge Town Museum and New Jersey Advocate, extending from July 13th to Dec. 23, 1822. The first three numbers were published when Lower Rahway was known as "Bridge Town." The name was then changed to The Rahway Museum and New Jersey Advocate. This file begins with No. 1, vol. i., which is dated July 13th, and contains twelve weekly issues. It is a folio thirteen by twenty-one inches in size. "Published every Saturday morning by Smith Edgar, proprietor. Office, Main Street, Bridge Town. Terms: The Museum will be furnished to subscribers at two dollars per annum, payable half yearly. If the half year is suffered to elapse without payment fifty cents will be added. Distant subscribers to pay half yearly in advance. No subscription taken for less than six months. No paper discontinued until all arrearages are paid up. Every attention paid to advertisements, which will be inserted at the following rates: one dollar a square for the first three insertions, and twenty-five cents for each succeeding week. A liberal deduction will be made to all those who wish to advertise by the year."

Advertisements are quite liberally furnished from New York, Elizabethtown, New Brunswick, and other places. The following firms and dealers appear as doing business in Rahway:

Jacob Parker, lumber-yard.

J. H. Ransom, cheap boot and shoe store. All sorts of country produce taken in exchange.

Benjamin S. Force & Co., boots and shoes.

Meeker & Clarkson, furniture warehouse.

Michael Brown, dry-goods, groceries, crockery, cedar-ware, etc., two doors north of the post-office, Rahway, N. J.

Vail, Thorp & Co., dry-goods, hats, caps, clothing, and fancy goods.

Peter Morgan & Co., hat-store.

Thomas J. Laing, Jr., dry-goods, crockery, etc.

Smith & Shotwell, dry-goods and groceries.

We will give a few of the advertisements found in this old file. Smith Freeman advertises the "Rahway Stage-House" as "An eligible stand opened some years since by Oliver Martin near the centre of Rahway. He takes this method to inform his friends and the public that he has furnished his house with every necessary convenience to render it agreeable to all those who may honor him with their company.

"Parties will be served with rooms, etc., at the shortest notice.

"Horse and carriages to let.

"SMITH FREEMAN.

"RAHWAY, July 10, 1822."

Then follows :

"THE BRIDGETOWN STAGE.

"The above stage will in future leave Bridgetown at six o'clock every morning, reach Elizabeth Town Point for the eight o'clock Steamboat to New York, leave the Point for Bridge Town every day at half-past twelve. In addition to this stage the subscriber will furnish conveyances to the Point at all hours of the day.

"SMITH FREEMAN.

"BRIDGE TOWN, July 12, 1822.

The mode of conveyance from Elizabeth Town Point to New York is described in the following announcement, which appears in every number of the file :

"The Regular Steam-Boat

"ATLANTA

"(CAPT. HUGHWORT, MASTER)

"Has recommenced running between Elizabeth-Town Point and New York.

"Fare, 37½ Cents.

"She leaves the Point at 8 o'clock A.M., and at half-past 12 and at 5 o'clock P.M.

"She leaves New York at 6 and at half-past 10 o'clock A.M. and at 3 o'clock P.M.

"This boat has at great expense been lately fitted up, and in the most convenient manner, for the transportation of Horses, Carriages, and Freight, as well as of Passengers. And the owners beg leave to assure the public that nothing will be omitted which may tend to promote their accommodation or to preserve her known reputation for punctuality and the uniformity of her trips.

"N. B.—On Sunday she will make but one trip, leaving New York at half-past 6 o'clock A.M. and Elizabeth-Town Point at 6 o'clock P.M.

"Aug. 26, 1822."

Stephen Cooper advertises for sale at public vendue on Monday, Sept. 30, 1822, at the residence of Ann Richards, in Rahway, 5 hogs, 2 cows, 3 acres of corn in shock, some hay, 50 bushels of winter apples, one elegant eight-day clock, beds and bedding, and a variety of household and kitchen furniture not necessary to enumerate.

"A very convenient and well-shelved store in the centre of Rahway is advertised for rent a short time on accommodating terms. Apply at the office of the MUSEUM." Aug. 30, 1822.

Cornelius Vanderhoven and Robert Burwell, Jr., give notice of a dissolution of the firm of Vanderhoven & Burwell on the 16th of August, 1822.

"Joseph P. Tucker offers for sale at his store, on reasonable terms, twenty barrels of superior cider spirits. Rahway, Sept. 20, 1822."

John T. Vail, "at Force & Vail's saw-mill, near Rahway," gives notice to the public that

"Having the advantage of water-power for turning, &c., he ventures to assure those who may favor him with their custom of having the following description of works done in the best manner and at short notice, to wit: Cranks, Spindles, Gudgeons, Rag Irons, Pitman Irons, Stirrups, Dogs, Mill Bars, Carding Machinery, Turning Lathes, Smith's Screw Tools, Carriage Springs, Brass Castings, Fire-Engines, Iron, Wood, and Brass Turnings of every description."

Peter Cohn, who has a woolen-factory near Barnett's mill, in Rahway township, advertises for wool for cash, or in exchange for woolen goods, announcing to the public that he "Continues the manufacturing of fine Blue and Black Broadcloths and Satinets of various descriptions, which he offers for sale on the most liberal terms. Also wool manufactured for customers in various branches and the best manner, viz., Carding, Spining, dyeing, Weaving, Fulling, and Dressing Cloth."

Joseph Stansbury offers a farm for sale on the road leading from the bridge to the Blazing Star Ferry, now occupied by David Carpenter.

Notice is given that "The Bridge-Town Packet will ply regularly twice a week from the dock at Rahway to Whitehall Slip in New York, for the transportation of freight to and from each place." This packet was a small sailing-vessel, and was owned by Smith & Shotwell, of Rahway. George Brown had also an interest in it.

Some of the marriage notices of this period may be of interest. We give the following. The first is from the Museum of July 20, 1822 :

"In Rahway, on Saturday evening last, by the Rev. Berkley Carle, Isaac Vader to Miss Charity DeCamp." Some one, probably the minister who married them, expressed his well wishes in the following lines :

"Long may they live in tranquil peace and joy,
And nothing ill their happiness alloy;
May love for each each rising sun increase,
And all its contrasts ever, ever cease,
May each the other every rolling day
Epy new charms in various circles play;
In their blest union may they ever find
A soothing conscience and a placid mind."

Aug. 17, 1822 :

"On Saturday evening last, by Richard Marsh, Esq., Mr. John Swaine to Miss Nettie Haud, all of Rahway."

The deaths reported from July 13 to Sept. 22, 1822, are the following :

Mr. Randolph Jacques, aged thirty-four.

Ann, daughter of Jonathan Squires, young lady.

Miss Susan Shotwell, of Rahway, of pulmonary consumption.

It appears that in August, 1822, yellow fever prevailed quite extensively in New York, so much so that the business portion of the city was largely deserted, the people going into the country. The death from this disease at the Blazing Star Ferry of Mr. D. R. Jacques, of the firm of M. & D. R. Jacques, of New York, is noticed in the paper for Sept. 14, 1822, and Mrs. Warner, of Broad Street, New York, died of the disease in Woodbridge. Also Frederick Everson, of New York, died of the disease at Springfield ; all died soon after their arrival in the country.

The death notices in Rahway and vicinity are mostly of children and young people.

The following subscription has been found among the manuscripts of the late Joseph O. Lufbery :

"We, the subscribers, promise to pay J. B. Mant or J. O. Lufbery the sums affixed to our names for the purpose of paying the expenses of the committee to Trenton in aiding us in getting a charter for a bank.

Rahway in 1827.—The New Jersey Advocate and Middlesex and Essex Advertiser, which was the successor to the Museum. We have a single copy of this paper, dated Rahway, Tuesday, Oct. 9, 1827. It contains many local matters of interest which throw light on that period of the history of Rahway.

Jacob Parker was agent for the United States Fire Insurance Company, and had an office in the village.

Phineas Munday and Frazee Ayres had opened a grocery-store, under the firm-name of Munday & Ayres, at No. 55 Whitehall, New York, and offer to take all kinds of country produce to sell on account or on commission, and, if required, liberal advances will be made on goods left with them for sale.

A valuable tan-yard is offered for sale in the township of Westfield, near Scotch Plains, by Job Clark, executor of the estate of Rachel Clark, deceased; likewise a blacksmith-shop and lot of ground in Milton.

A. Shotwell & Co. advertise for an apprentice to the soap and candle business, Rahway, July 2, 1827. The factory of Alexander Shotwell was in the rear of the building owned by Nathan Shotwell.

At that time two regular freight-boats, the "Thomas Gibbons" and the "Nonpareil," made trips between Rahway and New York. One of these boats left the dock at Rahway on Tuesdays and returned on Fridays, the other on Fridays and returned on Tuesdays. "Freight carried as low as any boat out of the river."

"London Porter, dried beef, English cradle-scythes, 1 cask English horse nails, pork, shad, mackerel by the barrel, paints, oils, etc., just received and for sale by J. P. Tooker."

Luke Haviland, harness-making and trimmings.

New bakery, J. S. Smith.

New grocery-store, Alexander Shotwell & Co.

Hats and caps, Thomas Crowell.

Watch-making and repairing, John Pressaq.

Smithing, Vail & Guyon.

Isaac Osborn, gig- and carriage-manufactory.

"NEW YORK AND STATEN ISLAND STEAMBOAT.—The well-known steamboat 'Bellows,' Capt. J. H. Vanderbilt, will commence running on Monday, the 2d of April, as follows: Leave Rising Sun Landing every day except Sundays at 8 o'clock A.M., half-past 12 P.M., 5 o'clock

P.M. Leave New York at 6 o'clock A.M., half-past 10 A.M., 3 o'clock P.M., touching at Mersereau's Dock on Staten Island on her passage each way. "Passage 12 1-2 Cents."

A convenient, new, and superior sociable stage-coach provided to take passengers from Elizabeth Town to the landing free of charge. Stages from Easton, Pa., Basking Ridge, and Morristown, N. J., are admitted to run in connection with this boat.

The following advertisement appears:

"FRIENDS' SCHOOL-HOUSE,

"Rahway.

"The inhabitants of Bridgetown and its vicinity, and all others whom it may interest, are respectfully informed that on Wednesday, the 12th of the present month, the subscriber will open a school in the Friends' School-House, Rahway.

"As the subscriber is a regularly-graduated Master of Arts, and has long been familiar with the various modes of education now in use, both in English and Classical Schools, it is his intention, whenever the advancement of the youth of the place and the wishes of their parents and guardians shall require it, to offer here the facilities for as extensive and complete an education as is to be obtained in any similar institution elsewhere.

"The price of tuition will be as follows, viz:

For Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic, per quarter.....	$2 50
With English Grammar and Geography.....	3 00
With the Elements of Geometry and their application to Surveying, Navigation, &c. The Rudiments of Algebra.....	4 00

"The strictest attention will be paid to the instruction and morals of the children, and it is hoped that the School will be found worthy of the public patronage, which is hereby respectfully solicited.

"HENRY B. POOLE.

"BRIDGETOWN, 10th Sept., 1827."

In this number is to be found a "Prospectus of The New Jersey Magazine, to be published in monthly numbers at Rahway, N. J., by James A. Bennett & Co." The editor's name is not given, but it is announced to be under the editorial superintendence of "a native of this State, who is accustomed to literary and editorial pursuits, and conversant with domestic and foreign periodicals." Subscriptions to the work were advertised to be received at the office of the New Jersey Advocate.

In this paper also are reported the "Proceedings of a Convention for the Internal Improvement of the State of New Jersey, held at Princeton on the 25th day of September, A.D. 1827." This convention was the inception of the Delaware and Raritan Canal and of the Camden and Amboy Railroad. It was attended by leading men from all parts of the State, and adopted a plan of organization of a permanent society having the object of internal improvements of the State in view. Richard Stockton was chosen president; Daniel Cox, vice-president; John M. Sherrard, secretary; and David C. Croxall, assistant secretary.

Rahway in 1834.—The following is a description of the town of Rahway in 1834 by Joseph O. Lufbery:

"SIR:

"In answer to the enquiries of your letter requesting information relative to this town and its vicinity, I shall very briefly remark:

"This town contains from 350 to 400 houses; population about 5000. Stores of various kinds, 25; Taverns, 3; Public Buildings; 1 Presbyterian Church, brick; 1 Methodist; 1 Baptist, building; 1 Friends and 1 Orthodox Friends, and 1 Meeting-House for the Blacks; 1 Academy, called the 'Athenian,' 36 by 68 feet, two stories. This building is just finished, and was built by a few enterprising and public-spirited citizens.

The stock is in shares of $25 each, and cost about $5000. It will accommodate on the first floor 150 scholars. The managers have limited it to 100, which it now contains. The upper room is 36 by 60 feet, and ceiling 16 feet high, and furnished in the best manner. This is for a lecture-room, on subjects such as will aid the pupils in gaining general information of the arts and sciences. We have also 1 Academy, built by one of our spirited citizens, Mr. Samuel Oliver. This also is rented as a Boarding-School, and is now in operation, with a full complement of scholars. There is 6 other schools, all well supported. We have a Bank, capital paid in $70,000, a post-office mail every day North and South, a printing-office and weekly journal, an incorporated fire-Engine Company, extending over 2 miles square, a Mutual Insurance Company.

"We manufacture for exports Hats, Shoes & Boots, Carriages, Cabinet furniture, ready made Clothing, Sitting-Chairs, Soap & Candles, Cotton & Woolen goods, tiware, coach lace, plated ware for carriages. The capital employed in manufacturing is about $300,000, value of exports from 10 to 1200,000 dollars. We have 4 Millinery-Shops, 2 Watchmakers, 3 Bikers, 6 Lumber & Coal-yards, 1 Soap and Candle manufactory. On the river 2 Saw-mills, doing a very extensive business in sawing lumber braces, joists, sealing lathe, &c. There is now laying in the river near the mills more than $30,000 worth of timber. Distance to New York by land 20 miles, to Newark 10 miles, Elizabeth 8, Woodbridge 3, Amboy 8, and New Brunswick 11. There is a railroad now making from Jersey City to New Brunswick, passing through this town. Soil very good, generally a light loam on a Sandy, gravelly, or red shell bottom, well adapted to grass, grain, &c. We have at this time 5 vessels, one or two leaving each day for New York.

"This town is sometimes called, by way of designating the several parts, Upper & Lower Rahway and Leesville. Upper Rahway is on the East side, is divided from Lower by the river. The South End of Leesville takes its name from a family named Lee, who have long resided there. This family has furnished our most enterprising and public-spirited citizens as merchants and manufacturers, who were the first to lead the way to our extensive trade to the Southern States, and by their industry and perseverance, liberal and enlightened views have greatly added to the prosperity of our place.

"I have extended this further than I expected.

Yours."

Removal of the Mill-Dams.—In 1854 the late Dr. David S. Craig and others procured an act of the Legislature to tear down and abolish the mill-dams in Rahway, on account of the malarial fevers produced by the stagnant ponds. The desirableness of such a measure was generally concurred in by the citizens, who had approved of it at a public meeting held in the fall of 1853. But it met with strenuous opposition on the part of some, and the act of 1854 proving defective in some of its provisions it was resolved to seek an amendment at the next sitting of the Legislature. That body was memorialized by the resident physicians as follows:

"To the Honorable the Legislature of the State of New Jersey:

"The undersigned, physicians, practitioners of medicine, residing in the district referred to in an act passed third of March, 1854, would beg leave to state to your honorable body, that from experience and observation we believe the health and prosperity of the village of Rahway and surrounding country is greatly injured by ponds of water occasioned by erection of dams obstructing the course of nature's pure and healthful streams, and we are also of opinion that the removal of said dams is the only means whereby the health and prosperity of the place can be restored.

"MOSES JACQUES, M.D.,

"LEWIS DRAKE, M.D.,

"SILAS COOK, M.D.,

"DAVID S. CRAIG, M.D.,

"S. ABERNETHY, M.D.,

"JOHN H. JANEWAY, M.D.,

"ELIUB B. SILVERS, M.D."

The law was amended, and the trustees proceeded to give public notice of its execution by inserting the following in the local papers:

"The subscribers, trustees for carrying out the law authorizing the removal of the mill-dams, hereby inform the public that they have determined to take down all the dams authorized to be removed at one time, and have the assessment made for the whole amount required at once. In announcing this determination, the trustees would state that they had taken into respectful consideration the recommendations of a meeting of a portion of their fellow-citizens, advising that only two of the dams be removed this year, and the remaining two the year following. But it having been represented that the only objection to the removal of all the dams this year was in consequence of the distress the levying of the tax would occasion to many small property holders, who had been thrown out of employment during the past dull business season, a number of gentlemen who had taken an active interest in the matter pledged themselves to raise by subscription an amount necessary to pay the taxes of those unable to pay themselves. With this assurance the trustees considered the cause of the recommendation of the public meeting referred to as having been removed, and no other objections having been presented, no obstacle was foreseen to the accomplishment of the trust confided to us. The fund subscribed is considered ample to pay the taxes of all who will be unable to pay, and also to loan to many others who may require temporary assistance the amount of their taxes, but the subscription was tendered and intended especially as a gift to those whom the tax would be peculiarly oppressive, and of all such as the taxes will be paid before loans are made.

"DAVID S. CRAIG,

"WM. B. CROWELL,

"JOS. T. CROWELL,

"Trustees.

"RAHWAY, Aug. 22, 1855."

A bill of complaint was taken to the Court of Chancery praying for an injunction to restrain the action of the trustees. But it was decided against the petitioners, and the act for the removal of the dams was upheld. The dams removed were those of Jesse C. Hendenberg, Ayres, Williams & Lufbery, Henry B. Shotwell, and Isaac Jones. Steam has since entirely superseded water-power as a motor in the various manufacturing interests of Rahway, and the improved healthfulness of the city has added greatly to its prosperity in other respects.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Incorporation of the City, Original Boundaries and their Changes.—Rahway was incorporated as a city by an act of the Legislature approved March 12, 1858. The original boundaries, as defined by the charter, were as follows:

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That all that part of the several townships of Rahway, in the county of Union, and Woodbridge, in the county of Middlesex, in this State, beginning at the Stone Bridge over King's Creek, where said creek crosses the road leading from East Rahway to Trembley's Point; thence in a northwesterly direction on a straight line to the brook which crosses the road leading from Kinsey's Corner to Florence's Mill, intersecting said brook two hundred yards to the eastward of said road; thence in a southeasterly direction to the road which leads from Rahway to Westfield, and known as the Westfield road, intersecting said Westfield road at a point where the road which leads to Madison Hill intersects it; thence in a southwesterly direction, on a straight line, to the road leading from the Six Rows to Mount Pleasant, intersecting said Mount Pleasant road at a small bridge, about two hundred yards to the northwest of the house owned and occupied by Moses B. Bramhall; thence in a southwesterly direction along the line of said Mount Pleasant road to the road which leads from Kinsey's Corner to Woodbridge, and known as the old Woodbridge road; thence along the line of said road to the bridge which crosses the South Branch of the Rahway River; thence in a southeasterly direction, and nearly due east, to the road leading to New Blazing Star, and along the line of said New Blazing Star road to a point where the lands of Walter Fuller and Aaron Wilkinson adjoin; and thence in a northeasterly direction in a straight line to the place of beginning; and all citizens of this State who now are or hereafter may be inhabitants within said limits shall be and are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate by the name of 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Rahway,' with all the powers incident to a municipal corporation and necessary for the purposes of carrying out the objects of this act."

Section second of the act divided the city in four wards, the boundaries of which it is not necessary here to describe.

The city at the time of its incorporation was situated in two townships in two separate counties, viz., the township of Rahway, in Union County, and the township of Woodbridge, in Middlesex County. Each of these townships maintained its original boundaries and jurisdiction independent of the city government, so that the inhabitants for the time being were under three governments, viz., that of the city and those of the townships of Rahway and Woodbridge respectively, each holding its sceptre over its portion of the territory, and the city extending its municipal hands over both. Surely, if good government were in the ratio of its quantity, the city of Rahway must have been well governed. But such is not always the fact. This anomalous state of things, however, did not last long. By an act of the Legislature approved Feb. 16, 1860, that part of Woodbridge township included in the city was taken from Middlesex County and attached to the township of Rahway, in Union County. Thus the city got rid of the difficulty of being situated in two townships and two counties, and the number of governments was reduced to two. The city and the township governments—a sort of wheel within a wheel, though less complicated than the former structure—ran on together until March, 1861, when by legislative enactment the township of Rahway was divided, part of its territory formed into the new township of Linden, and the rest absorbed in the extended limits of the city. Thus the old township of Rahway, being cut in two by a legislative blow, died, at the age of fifty-seven years. Part of it, perhaps we may call it the head, came into the city under the name of the Fifth Ward. Whether it was found to be as useless in the corporation as "the fifth wheel to a coach," or whatever may have been the cause, the Legislature took it out March 23, 1864, and constructed out of it the present township of Clark. It certainly could be put to no better use than to be converted into a monument to that worthy citizen of yore, the signer of the Declaration of Independence.

Organization of the City Government.—The first election for city officers was held on the 19th of April, 1858, under the direction of the commissioners of election appointed by the charter for the several wards, viz.: For the First Ward, Joel Clarkson, Francis Labaw, and Stephen Jackson; for the Second Ward, Jeremiah Tunison, William Gibby, and Enoch

M. Ayres; for the Third Ward, Jacob L. Woodruff, Henry Platner, and James McKelvey. The mayor and Common Council elect met pursuant to the requirements of the charter at Washington Hall on Monday, the 3d day of May, 1858, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and proceeded to count the number of votes given at the election for city and ward officers. The following were declared to be elected, they having received the highest number of votes for the respective offices: Mayor, Edward Y. Rogers; City Clerk, John R. Chapin; Treasurer, William Osborn, Jr.; Collector, Peter B. Sharp; Collector of Arrears, Enoch M. Ayres.

WARD OFFICERS.—First Ward: Councilmen, Abel V. Shotwell, James O. Halsey; Judges of Elections, Joel Clarkson, Horace H. Roberts, Augustus M. Laing; Ward Clerk, Albert G. Sym; Constable, John Harvey; Commissioner of Appeal, Eden Haydock.

Second Ward: Councilmen, William Gibby, Crowl Macann; Judges of Elections, George J. Trussler, Andrew J. Halliday, Jeremiah O. Tunison; Ward Clerk, William Geery; Constable, John J. Cladek; Commissioner of Appeal, Amzi W. Williams.

Third Ward: Councilmen, Abraham Ackerman, Benjamin C. Watson; Judges of Elections, Almeth White, Francis E. Terrell, John R. Ross; Ward Clerk, John H. A. Wobbe; Constable, Benjamin Parker; Commissioner of Appeal, Jacob L. Woodruff.

Fourth Ward: Councilmen, John Woodruff, Thomas J. Lee; Judges of Elections, Edward E. Hooker, George J. Merrick, John A. Jaques; Ward Clerk, Abraham S. Bonney; Constable, John J. Brown; Commissioner of Appeal, James Vanderhoven.

The oath of office and allegiance were administered by Thomas H. Schafer, Esq., Master in Chancery, to the members of the Council and the city clerk, and the following officers gave bonds in the sums named for the faithful performance of their respective duties: City Treasurer, $6000; Assessor, $500; Collector of Taxes, $6000; Collector of Arrears, $3000; Constables, $300.

At two o'clock P.M. the Council assembled, and being opened by prayer the mayor proceeded to deliver his inaugural address, which was listened to by a large assemblage of people.

The machinery of the city government thus put in operation has continued, with some necessary modification, to the present time. In 1865 (April 4th) an act was passed authorizing the appointment of commissioners to lay out streets, avenues, and squares in the city of Rahway. An act to revise and amend the charter of the city was approved March 23, 1865, and a supplement was added to it April 6, 1871, providing that the Common Council by ordinance from time to time may vacate or alter the lines or courses of any of the streets or sections thereof in said city already laid out, whether opened or not at the passage of such ordinance, provided that written application for the passage of such ordinance shall first be made by persons owning three-fourths of the lineal feet along the street or section thereof proposed to be altered or vacated, and that two-thirds of the whole number of councilmen vote in favor of the passage of such ordinance. This act gave authority to the Common Council to license, regulate, and control the sale of spirituous and fermented liquors in the city, to punish the violation of ordinances on this subject, or to revoke the licenses granted. It also gave power to the mayor and city clerk to administer all official oaths or affirmations required to be taken by any officer in the said city.

The revised charter with its various supplementary acts was brought fully into use in 1871. Since then no change has been made in the city government.

The mayors of the city from its incorporation to the present time have been:

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Fire Department.—In the file of the Bridge Town Museum, a copy of which we have as late as Dec. 23, 1822, we find no allusion to a fire company in Rahway. In less than a year later, however, such an institution was incorporated by the Legislature, which became possessed of valuable apparatus and real estate, and was in active existence at the time of the incorporation of the city. We quote from the following act, entitled "A Supplement to the Act entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the City of Rahway,'" approved March 12, 1858:

"WHEREAS, by an act of the Legislature of this State, entitled 'An Act to incorporate the Rahway Fire Company,' passed December five, eighteen hundred and twenty-three, and the Supplements thereto, a company have been organized and become possessed of valuable real estate, engine-houses, engines, and other fire apparatus, as provided in said act and supplement.

"AND WHEREAS, the said Rahway Fire Company are desirous of disposing of their property so acquired to the City of Rahway, and cease to exercise their powers as an independent corporation. Therefore,

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That it shall and may be lawful for the Rahway Fire Company to sell, convey, and otherwise dispose of to 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Rahway,' hereafter to be elected by virtue of the provisions of the act entitled 'An Act Incorporating the City of Rahway,' upon such terms as shall be agreed upon between them, all real estate, engine-houses, engines, reservoirs of water, ladders, buckets, fire-hooks, and other implements and machines as they may now possess, to the sole use and benefit of the said City of Rahway.

"SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Rahway,' and they are hereby authorized to raise by tax, in addition to the annual taxes limited in the eighteenth section of the act to which this is a supplement, any sum not exceeding four thousand dollars, for purpose of purchasing the said property of the said 'The Rahway Fire Company.'

"SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That upon the purchase by the said 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Rahway' of the said property, the said 'The Rahway Fire Company' shall be disbanded, and the act incorporating the same and the supplements thereto shall be and the same are hereby declared to be repealed.

"SEC. 4. And be it enacted, That this act shall take effect immediately."

The original fire company, which was disbanded by the above act, was in operation in 1834, as we learn from Joseph O. Lufbery's description of the town at that date. It was superseded by the present fire department of the city, organized under the charter.

The present organization of the fire department is as follows: President, D. R. Parker; Treasurer, John F. Lufbery; Chief Engineer, Lewis Gehring; Assistant Engineers, J. Lester La Forge and William H. Randolph.

Washington Hose Company, No. 1, Milton Avenue. Foreman, James D. Miller.

Franklin Hose Company, No. 2, Seminary near Church. Foreman, John Gehring; Assistant Foreman, Augustus Lang.

Warren Hose Company, No. 3, Main Street near Elm Avenue. Foreman, Michael Boyne.

Independent Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1, Seminary Street near Grand. Foreman, Caleb Ward; Assistant Foreman, John Hughes.

The Rahway Gaslight Company was chartered on Feb. 18, 1853, but no organization was effected under this charter. A supplementary act was approved March 20, 1857, incorporating the following-named persons as the Rahway Gaslight Company, viz.: Josephus Shann, Isaac Osborn, Edward Y. Rogers, Joseph S. Smith, Amos C. Watson, Joseph T. Crowell, Jonathan Woodruff, Jacob R. Shotwell, Francis La Baw. The capital stock was placed at $20,000, with the privilege of increasing it to $50,000. A further supplement was passed March 6, 1873, authorizing the directors to increase the capital to any amount not exceeding $200,000.

The company was organized on Oct. 3, 1857; Jacob R. Shotwell, Joseph T. Crowell, Francis La Baw, Joseph O. Lufbery, and Isaac Osborn, directors. At the first meeting of the directors, Jacob R. Shotwell was elected president, and Edward Y. Rogers, secretary and treasurer. Mr. Shotwell is still president, and has been for a number of years treasurer.

On Oct. 6, 1857, a contract was made with William D. Parrish, of Philadelphia, for the erection of the gas-works. Mr. Parrish fulfilled his contract, and the works were accepted by the directors in December, 1857. They have since been greatly extended, and their capacities and facilities increased to meet the demands of a growing city. The company commenced making gas on the 17th of December, 1857. There are now nearly twelve miles of mains in the city.

In 1861 the first contract was made with the Rahway Gaslight Company for supplying the streets with gas. The first lamp district in the city was adopted by ordinance Aug. 2, 1859. On June 16, 1874, the district was extended so as to embrace the following boundaries: Beginning at the junction of Union and Whittier Streets; thence along Whittier Street to Harrison Street; thence along Harrison Street to St. George's Avenue.

Rahway Library Association.—The Rahway Library was opened June 15, 1858, under the auspices of an association of ladies, with a collection of books presented by a previous organization, numbering one hundred and forty-four volumes.

This voluntary association continued six years, during which time such additions were made to the library as the small amount of money received from subscribers would permit.

An increasing desire for the prosperity of the library being apparent in the community, it was thought best to have the interests connected herewith secured and enlarged by an act of incorporation. The charter printed herewith was obtained from the Legislature of this State in 1864, and the present organization was formed under its provisions.

The need of a better and larger room, coupled with a desire to have a permanent building for the library, induced the trustees to make great efforts to obtain money enough to purchase a lot, and to build thereon a structure that would be a credit to them and to the city of Rahway.

These efforts were so far successful that they were enabled to construct a substantial brick building in a central location, at a cost, including the lot, of about ten thousand dollars.

The books were removed to the new building at the corner of Seminary and Irving Streets in the summer of 1869, and the library was opened to the public with fifteen hundred volumes upon its shelves.

On the 1st of June, 1871, a lady of the city, well known for her liberal contributions to many and varied objects of philanthropy, presented the association with the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be securely invested, and the interest derived therefrom to be used for the purchase of books of science, biography, history, travels, etc., and the better class of periodical literature.

On the 1st of May, 1872, the "trustees of the Rahway School for Colored Children" made the association a gift of six thousand dollars, on conditions and with restrictions similar to those in the donation mentioned above.

These trust funds now yield the annual sum of eleven hundred and twenty dollars, nearly all of which is expended in the purchase of standard works.

At this time the library contains six thousand nine hundred and eighty-three volumes.

The act of incorporation is as follows:

"WHEREAS, A number of ladies, inhabitants of the city of Rahway, of this State, have now an association known as 'The Rahway Library Association,' it is apprehended that the object of the said association will be promoted by an act of incorporation; therefore,

"1. Be it enacted by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That William C. Squier, Jacob R. Shotwell, and Benjamin M. Price, and their associates are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate, in fact, name, and law, by the name of 'The Rahway Library Association,' and by that name they and their successors shall have perpetual succession, power to sue and be sued, plead, and be impleaded, answer and answered unto, in all courts and places whatever, to make a common seal and alter it at pleasure, to purchase, take, have, hold, receive, and enjoy any lands, tenements, hereditaments, in fee simple or otherwise, any goods, chattels, legacies, donations, annuities, or other personal property of whatever kind or quality aforesaid, by gift, grant, devise, bequest, or otherwise, and the same to grant, convey, assign, sell, or otherwise dispose of for the purposes of said corporation; provided, always, that the clear value of said real estate shall not exceed the value of ten thousand dollars.

"2. And be it enacted, That the property, affairs, and concerns of said corporation shall be managed and conducted by nine trustees, to be elected on the first Monday in June next; the same corporation shall name nine ladies, now associated with the stockholders of the Rahway Library Association, residing in the city of Rahway or its vicinity, as trustees of the said association, and the persons so named shall constitute the first board of trustees, and in case any vacancy shall happen in the said trustees by death, removal, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the said board, and the seat of any trustee who may have neglected to attend four successive meetings may be vacated and the vacancy filled by a majority of the board of trustees. The trustees shall meet annually, on the first Monday in June, and choose by ballot from their number a first and second directress, secretary, and treasurer, and such other officers as may be expedient, and the duties and powers of such officers shall be defined by such by-laws as the board of trustees may make.

"3. And be it enacted, That the object of said corporation shall be the establishment of a circulating library in the city of Rahway. A majority of the trustees shall constitute a quorum to transact business, who shall have power to make and provide such by-laws as to them may seem needful for the purposes of said corporation not inconsistent with this act and the laws of the State.

"4. And be it enacted, That this act be and is hereby declared a public act, and the Senate and General Assembly of this State at any time may hereafter amend, repeal, or modify the same.

"5. And be it enacted, That this act shall take effect immediately."

The first trustees were Mrs. William C. Squier, Mrs. B. M. Price, Mrs. W. E. Bloodgood, Mrs. John Woodruff, Mrs. J. L. Woodruff, Mrs. F. La Baw, Mrs. Jos. T. Crowell, Mrs. W. B. Oliver, Mrs. J. R. Shotwell.

The present trustees are Mrs. William C. Squier, Mrs. A. V. Shotwell, Mrs. A. F. Shotwell, Mrs. J. U. Underhill, Mrs. J. R. Shotwell, Mrs. Leslie Lupton, Mrs. Thomas Martin, Mrs. H. H. James, Mrs. J. Edward Marsh.

Officers.—First Directress, Mrs. W. C. Squier; Second Directress, Mrs. J. R. Shotwell; Secretary, Mrs. J. U. Underhill; Treasurer, Mrs. W. C. Squier.

John Urmston

John Urmston is a lineal descendant of an Episcopal clergyman of England, who spelled his name "Armstrong," and is supposed to have changed it to Urmston, and who came to America in search of his son, and died at Charleston, S. C., shortly after his arrival.

This son, an only child, chafing under parental restraint, left his native country at about the age of fourteen, and is supposed to have landed at New York, for subsequently he married a lady of New Brunswick, N. J. Among the effects of his father left at his death in Charleston he found a book, "Body of Divinity," with the name Abraham Urmston (Armstrong) written in it, but it is not known that his name was Abraham; the book was dated "1743."

It is known that there were two sons born of this union,—Thomas and Benjamin, the latter of whom settled in the Western States. Thomas was grandfather of our subject, resided on a farm on the mountain near Martinville, in Somerset County, N. J., where he reared a family of seven children. He was a member of the State militia during the Revolutionary war, and one of his sons, Daniel, was drafted in the war of 1812, reported for duty at Trenton, but was never called upon to serve. One daughter of Thomas Urmston settled in Scioto County in 1842, another at the age of eighty-two was at Jerseyville, Ill., with her grandson, George Radolph, in 1868, and a third was the widow of a Methodist clergyman of Augusta, Me., at the same date. The sons were William, Daniel, and Thomas, of whom the latter settled near Green Bay, Wis., in 1840. Daniel, father of our subject, followed the business of turning and hub-making at Green Brook and near Bound Brook, N. J., during his active business life, and died at the latter place in 1840, aged fifty-one years. His wife, Deborah Streets, whom he married in 1810, and who died in 1878, aged eighty-seven years, bore him the following children: John; Hannah Ann, wife of Henry A. Brower; Joseph; Mary Jane, wife of James Stout; and Rachel, who became the wife of Richard Ten Eyck, of Somerset County. All are living in 1882 except Joseph, who was in business in Rahway with his brother, and died in 1842, and Daniel B. and Thomas. John Urmston, eldest son of Daniel and Deborah Urmston, was born at Green Brook, Sept. 2, 1810, and received the usual advantages for an education that the schools of his native place afforded. At the age of eighteen he began an apprenticeship with Jeremiah Parcell in the manufacture of fancy chairs. Upon completing his trade, at the end of three years, he worked as a journeyman in Philadelphia for a short time, returned home and established himself in the same business in a small way, but after two years gave up the business. In 1835 he came to Rahway, and in connection with his brother Joseph, before mentioned, established a hub-manufactory near the Taurina Works, doing their turning by water-power. Here he continued business for eleven years in a small way, and carted his hubs to New York, Newark, and other markets for sale. In 1847 he purchased a lot on the corner of Union and Ludlow Streets, in Rahway, erected a hub-manufactory, and until 1851 did the turning by horse-power, at which time he introduced steam-power, which he has used since.

He has erected on this lot a substantial dwelling-house, store-house, and made large additions to his first manufactory, which was forty by seventeen feet, and one and a half story high. During the late civil war Mr. Urmston made the hubs for seven hundred cannon. The superiority of his work and quality of material used, together with his long experience, has made his name widely known throughout the United States and other countries, and his business has so increased that his shipments are made direct to England, Australia, South Africa, Sandwich Islands, and to the Pacific Coast.

Mr. Urmston has led an active and industrious life, and although unassisted pecuniarily when starting out for himself, he has by his judicious management secured a good competency. He was a member of the Common Council of Rahway for two years after it became a city, and for two years served on the board of education. He is interested in and a member of the First Presbyterian Church, and has served for many years on its board of trustees. His wife is Latitia, daughter of Daniel Garthwait, of Westfield, whom he married in 1838. She was born June 11, 1813. Their surviving children are Daniel G., John J., Frank, and Thomas, all in business with their father, and two daughters,—Latitia, wife of J. E. Stiles, of Morristown, and Louisa B. Their deceased children were Mary Elizabeth, Mary Elizabeth (2), Marietta, George Washington, and Deborah Ann, who was the wife of Elias Whitehead.

Daniel G. Urmston enlisted Aug. 9, 1862, in Company E, Fourteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, Third Brigade, Third Division, Sixth Army Corps of the Army of the Potomac, was engaged in its numerous battles and skirmishes, ranking as orderly sergeant, and was wounded through the right side in a bayonet charge at the battle of Cold Harbor, Va., June 1, 1864, and honorably discharged from service Aug. 26, 1865.

D. B. Dunham

David B. Dunham came of English and Scotch ancestry, who were among the early settlers of New Jersey. The ancestry is traced as far back as his paternal great-grandfather, Benyew Dunham, born in May, 1732. Married Mary Heath, who was born in April, 1737, and bore him twelve children, who settled in New Jersey, New York City, and one in Pittsfield, Mass.

His paternal grandfather, David, born Feb. 13, 1762, settled or resided at Larger Cross-Roads, Somerset Co., N. J. His wife was Martha Barkley, born Jan. 31, 1763. David Dunham died Jan. 9, 1826, his widow died Sept. 1, 1846. They had eight children, all but one of whom (who died in infancy) were married and settled in Somerset and Hunterdon Counties. In early life they were all, with their parents, active members of the Presbyterian Church at Lamington. One (Robert B.) died at seventy-five years of age, two (Mary and Nancy) died at eighty-three years of age, and four are still living, the eldest (Eliza Vanderbeck) in her ninety-first year; Martha Nevius, eighty-three; Benyew, eighty; and David, the youngest, seventy-eight. The latter still lives on the homestead farm of his father, at the Larger Cross-Roads, in vigorous health, an active, influential citizen, and a prominent and useful elder in the church at Lamington.

Robert Barkley Dunham, the father of our subject (the eldest of the family), was born Feb. 23, 1788, and died May 8, 1863. He commenced his active business life, a partner with his father, as a tanner and manufacturer of leather, but later bought a neighboring farm, and the remainder of his life was spent upon it. He was a man of strict integrity and of firm Christian principles. For nearly forty years he was an elder in the church at Lamington, and his influence for good in the community was always noted and felt. He married Catherine, daughter of Ralph Nevius, of South Branch, Somerset Co., who was born in October, 1793, and survives in 1882. Their children are Martha M., wife of Garret Simonson, of Lamington, now of Racine, Ill.; Anna E.; John N., of Brooklyn, N. Y.; David B.; and Robert E., who died at the age of seventeen. David B. Dunham was born at Larger Cross-Roads, Bedminster township, Somerset Co., N. J., Nov. 9, 1829. He spent his boyhood on his father's farm, was educated with a view to entering college, and was being prepared for college by Rev. Dr. Blauvelt, of Lamington, when he decided upon a business instead of a professional life. At the age of seventeen he began as a clerk in the dry-goods store of Post & De Camp, at Somerville, N. J., and after clerking four years in Somerville and New Brunswick, and one year with W. K. Post, of Rahway, he engaged as clerk in the store of J. & A. Woodruff, of Rahway, who were then merchants in dry-goods and carriage materials, and also carriage manufacturers. He became a partner in 1856, under the firm name of J. & A. Woodruff & Co., which continued until 1860, when John Woodruff and Mr. Dunham bought out the interest of the other partners, and continued the business under the firm name of Woodruff & Dunham. Meanwhile the business had increased from about thirty-five thousand dollars in 1852-53, to one hundred thousand dollars in 1860-61 annually. In 1863 they connected with their mercantile business the manufacture of carriages, of which Mr. Dunham assumed the management, and in 1875 became the sole proprietor as successor of Woodruff & Dunham. His aim was from the beginning to build only the best class of work, and to sell direct to the consumer. By a strict adherence to this principle, and close personal attention to all the details of the business, he has succeeded in establishing a reputation for the production of first-class carriages second to no other manufacturer in the State. He is now the largest carriage manufacturer in Rahway (a place noted for a half-century for its carriage manufactories), and with one or two exceptions the largest in the State, employing about sixty men, and is unable in 1882 to supply the demand for his manufactures.

Mr. Dunham has always been identified with interests tending to promote the welfare of the city since his residence there. He is a member of the Second Presbyterian Church, and has been one of its trustees for a number of years.

His wife, whom he married in October, 1857, is Emma F., daughter of George F. Webb and Julia A. Smith, natives of Connecticut, who removed to Rahway about 1825. Mr. Webb was an influential citizen, and at one time a large property-owner. He was engaged in the mercantile business for many years, and afterwards founded the Rahway Savings Institution and the Building Loan Association, of which he was manager and treasurer until his death in 1860. He was one of the organizers of the Second Presbyterian Church, and a ruling elder of the same until his decease. Mr. and Mrs. Dunham's children are Frederick Webb, Fannie Louise, and Carrie Nevius.

Rahway Water Supply.—An act to authorize the construction of works for supplying the city of Rahway and places adjacent with pure and wholesome water was approved April 7, 1868. It enacted that A. Maurice, J. Henry Stone, James Vanderhoven, John H. Durand, and the mayor of the city for the time being should constitute the first board of water commissioners, who for and in the name of the mayor and Common Council of the city of Rahway were authorized to take and hold any lands or other real estate necessary for the construction of any canals, aqueducts, reservoirs, basins, or other works for raising, conveying, or containing water, or for the erection of any buildings or machinery, or for laying any pipes or conduits for conveying the water into or through any places, or to secure and maintain any of the works, or in general to do any other act necessary or convenient for accomplishing the purposes contemplated by the act. Nothing having been done previous to March 6, 1871, to carry out practically the provisions of the act, and some modification of the plan being deemed desirable, it was then enacted that the board of water commissioners shall consist of five members, of which board the mayor, or acting mayor, and the chairman of the committee on the fire department of the Common Council of the city of Rahway for the time being shall be members ex officio, and the remaining three members of the board shall be elected as hereinafter mentioned.

The first board of water commissioners, in addition to the ex officio members, shall be composed of Jacob R. Shotwell, De Witt C. Hough, and Benjamin R. Miller. The board was duly organized, and the works constructed and put in operation. The Rahway water-works may be briefly described as follows:

The pumping station is located on the North Branch of the Rahway River, at the point where the ancient Indian path leading from Amboy to Elizabeth Point crossed, the stepping-stones used by the Indians being visible as late as 1856. The branch here is capable of a mean daily supply of nine million gallons of water. The city has no reservoir, the works pumping directly "against the mains." The building inclosing the works is a substantial brick structure about fifty feet square and two stories high. The machinery consists of two duplex compound condensing engines (direct-acting) capable of pumping three million gallons every twenty-four hours. They are supplied by two forty-eight-inch horizontal tubular boilers.

The present consumption of water in the city is one million gallons every twenty-four hours. There are twelve miles of mains, along which are distributed one hundred and thirty hydrants, used in extinguishing fire without the use of fire-engines of any description.

The board are Joseph W. Savage, President; C.

L. Woodruff, Superintendent; W. Updyke Selover, Samuel Leonard, James T. Melick, Lineus High.

The water is filtered by an improved filter (a very ingenious contrivance), invented by Patrick Clark, engineer of the Rahway gas-works.

Manufacturing in Rahway.—TAURINO FACTORY.

—On the north branch of the Rahway River, near St. George's Avenue bridge, stands the ruins of a large brick building, formerly used as a manufactory. It was known as the Taurino¹ Factory, erected by William Shotwell, a resident of Rahway, in 1814. On account of the embargo on British importations during the war, it was undertaken as a good investment in the direction of home manufacture, and was so until the close of the war, when the business proved unprofitable and was abandoned. It was afterwards employed as a woolen-mill, a silk-printing establishment, and for many other purposes, employing many hands and being a great benefit to the town. It was destroyed by fire some fifteen years ago.

He built the residence known as "Shotwell's Folly," on the corner of Lafayette and Montgomery Streets. He was known as "Governor."

Among the later operators were Daniel Stansbury, of New York, John Y. Van Tuyl, Samuel, Edward, and William Dudley (brothers), Stone & Brown, then Thomas Hale, who converted it into a silk-factory. Then Daniel Wilcox took it and started carpet-weaving. After it was repaired from the effects of the fire which had destroyed the upper story, it was occupied as a carriage-factory by Denman & Freeman. It was finally blown up by the bursting of a boiler about 1870, and the ruin of it only remains.

The manufacture of carriages became an important industrial interest in Rahway quite early. It appears from Mr. Lufbery's letter describing the place in 1834 that the business was then considerable, and that trimmings and plated ware for fine carriages were also manufactured here at the same time. The great market for these products was the South, and so largely was the capital of the city employed in this industry that when the civil war broke out in 1861 and suddenly cut off this market, making it impossible longer to sell or to collect outstanding accounts in the Southern States, it had nearly ruined the place. Only the most substantial and energetic manufacturers succeeded in passing through the trying ordeal and getting their business again on a prosperous footing.

The following are the principal parties who are engaged in the manufacture of carriages in the city at present:

HETFIELD & JACKSON, manufacturers of light carriages, sulkies, etc., began business on Seminary Street in 1865. In 1866 they bought the shops of Ackerman, Nos. 75, 77, and 79 Irving Street, to which they have added from time to time as the exigencies of their business have required. Their policy or governing principle has been to compete with all parts of the world for the best light work, and they have made everything else subordinate to success in this direction. At the Centennial Exhibition they obtained the international medal awarded by the United States Centennial Commissioners for two buggies, one skeleton wagon, and one sulky. Also at the State Fair last year they obtained the three first premiums on light work. They employ about twenty hands, and their sales average from twenty-five to forty thousand dollars per annum.

MILLER BROTHERS commenced the manufacture of carriages in 1859, building a factory on Fulton Street. The war broke out before they had fairly got their business established, and they were heavy losers at the South. They, however, struggled to recuperate their business, and since the war have produced as high as twenty thousand dollars' worth of work in a year, but usually their sales amount to not more than from ten to twelve thousand dollars a year. They are occupying the shops on Irving Street for many years the carriage-factory of the late William H. Flatt, which they removed to in 1871.

ANDREW JARDINE was born at Dumbarton, Scotland, April 17, 1808, where his father, Andrew, grandfather, James, and great-grandfather, Andrew, spent their lives, reared families, and were active business men. The former was by occupation a wood-sawyer, and died at the age of eighty, his wife, Marion Cook, dying at the age of eighty-nine years. His grandfather was a machine-printer by trade, which he followed during the early part of his life in Sterling's print-works, but was a farmer afterwards, and at his death left three sons and four daughters.

The children of Andrew and Marian Jardine were Andrew, subject of this sketch; James, a block-printer in Scotland, visited this country during the Centennial, and died soon after reaching home, aged sixty-nine; Archibald, came to America in 1839, was a block-cutter by trade, settled first at Lodi, N. J., was afterwards superintendent of the color-making department of calico-printing in a Philadelphia house, and retired in Rahway; Robert, came to Staten Island in 1833, is a block-printer by trade, and resides in Philadelphia; Jane, deceased, was the wife of George McIntyre at home, although some of her children have come to America; and Elizabeth, came to America in 1842, and is the widow of Allen McLeish, of Rahway.

Andrew Jardine, subject of this sketch, learned the trade of block-printing at home, and served an apprenticeship of seven years. He was then a clerk in a grain and grocery store there for a time. Thinking to better his condition in life he set sail for America, the first of the family to emigrate, and landed in New York May 29, 1832. Not finding ready work to suit him, but willing to do any honorable labor that would turn an honest penny, for three years he was engaged in selling milk in that city, and for three years following worked at his trade on Staten Island. In 1838 he came to Rahway, N. J., where for seven years he worked at his trade in the factory of Thomas Hare, but after the burning of the factory he was for two years in New York and Philadelphia. In 1847, returning to Rahway, he began paper-staining and making window-shades on his present site in a small way, which laid the foundation of what has become a business employing a large capital and a partnership concern. In 1854 his business had so increased that he built his present manufactory, which is fifty by twenty-five feet besides its additions, and in 1856 he introduced steam-power, and has since carried on the business of manufacturing wall-paper on an extensive scale. Mr. Jardine continued in business alone until 1870, when Sylvanus White and his son, Freeland Jardine, became partners, under the firm-name of A. Jardine & Co. Mr. White withdrew after three and one-half years, and in September, 1873, Thomas M. Martin joined the partnership, the firm-name remaining unchanged. Mr. Jardine built a substantial residence in 1870 near the site of his manufactory, and now ranks among the representative business men of Rahway. His sterling integrity, energy, economy, and judicious management, although unassisted in starting out in life, have been the levers to secure him a fair competence. His life has been one of activity, and unmoved by any desire for public place or the emolument of office. He is an attendant of the Presbyterian Church at Rahway, of which his wife is a member, and a contributor to all worthy objects.

His wife, Ann McKeehnie, born at Barhead, Scotland, Jan. 10, 1803, came in the same ship with him, and they were married the same year they landed in New York. Their children are Freeland, before al-

JOHN L. FREEMAN.—The Freeman family is mentioned as residents of Woodbridge by Rev. Joseph W. Dally, in his history of that township, prior to 1700, and hence were among its early settlers. John L. Freeman's grandfather, Daniel Freeman, is supposed to come from the same stock, and died Oct. 13, 1823, where his parents resided. His father, William Freeman, born Nov. 19, 1788, died Oct. 10, 1830, married Feb. 3, 1810, Phebe, daughter of John and Elizabeth Hinds, who was born Aug. 4, 1793, and died in 1864. William Freeman was a harness- and saddle-maker by trade, which he followed in Mendham, N. J., and Morristown, dying in the latter place. He served in the war of 1812, and his widow, who survived him many years, received a pension. After his decease she removed to Newark, where she supported and reared her family by her own toil, and where she resided until her death. She was a devoted wife and mother, and a member of the Halsey Street Methodist Episcopal Church of Newark. John L. Freeman, born Dec. 27, 1823, in Morristown, N. J., was upon the death of his father obliged to do something for himself, and at the tender age of seven years engaged in spinning cotton at Rol-sonton Cotton-Mills, where he remained for two years. Between the ages of nine and fourteen he was kept in school by his mother at Newark. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed by his mother until he should reach his majority to Charles C. Hedenberg, a large carriage manufacturer of Newark. Here he remained for four years, when, upon the failure of that gentleman in business, he was released from his indentures. For several years following he first worked as journey-man, then as foreman, and finally became general superintendent in various manufactories: at Newark, for Douglas & Post, Baldwin & Thomas, and Hedenberg & Littell, of the same place, and for John C. Parker and James Flynn, of New York.

He became conversant with all kinds of carriage-making with these various firms, and was now ready with capital of his own earning and experience to start business for himself. In 1855 he became a partner with Alexander Turnbull, of Newark, which, however, continued only till December of the same year, when arrangements were made for a partnership with John C. Denman, of Rahway, to begin in the following May (1856). He acted as Mr. Denman's superintendent until that time, and afterward until Mr. Denman's death, on Feb. 4, 1864, the firm of Denman & Freeman carried on carriage manufacturing in Rahway on an extensive scale. From the latter date until Dec. 13, 1870, he had associated with him Rolph M., brother of his deceased partner, when, upon the decease of Rolph M. Denman, he purchased the Denman interest in the business, and has since carried it on alone.

In 1872 he built his present carriage manufactory on Irving Street, and he has continued a successful business since, making his shipments to the principal markets of this and other countries.

MANUFACTORY OF JOHN L. FREEMAN.

Mr. Freeman is one of the active, enterprising business men of Rahway, and has taken a somewhat active part in the local affairs of the city. He was councilman of the Fourth Ward for three years, is one of the Board of Finance, and a director of the savings-bank of the city.

His wife is Agnes, daughter of John Higginson, of Newark, whom he married in April, 1845. His only daughter, Mary E., died at the age of eleven in 1857, leaving an only son, Frank P. Freeman, who is in business with his father.

HOUSEMAN & McMANUS.—Firm established in 1872, and began business in a shop on Seminary Street owned by John R. Ross. In 1875 they purchased their present buildings, which were built and owned by Randolph Ross, who had carried on carriage-making for several years, and had been succeeded by his sons, Milan and Bedott Ross, who carried on the business up to the late civil war.

The present firm manufacture about twenty thousand dollars' worth of carriages per annum.

AYRES & LUFBERY, STEAM SAW-MILL, PLANING-MILL, AND LUMBER-YARD.—This firm are the successors of an old establishment, Joseph O. Lufbery and John T. Vail having built a saw-mill on the premises in 1827. The property, including the mill-site, belonged originally to Henry Moore and Henry Mundy. In 1827, Lufbery & Vail also purchasing the old Marsh property on the south side of the river opposite their saw-mill, erected a grist-mill and a mill for cutting logwood for dyeing purposes. In 1830, Mr. Vail retired from the firm and removed to the West. In 1833, Mr. Lufbery built a new grist-mill on the south side, and at the same time removed his logwoodmill to the north side, attaching it to his saw-mill. From that time, however, he did little with it, as log-wood extracts began to come into use.

Mr. Joseph O. Lufbery continued to carry on these enterprises until 1846. In November of that year — Ayres, — Williams, and John H. Lufbery formed a copartnership under the firm-name of Ayres, Williams & Lufbery, and rented the premises for five years, at the expiration of which they purchased the property, paying therefor the sum of twenty thousand dollars. The mills up to this time had been operated by water, but in 1855 the dams were removed by an act of the Legislature, and the mill was converted into a steam-mill. On the 3d of September, 1868, the saw-mill was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt and in operation three months later. Mr. Williams died in 1865, and the year following the firm was changed to Ayres & Lufbery, and so remained until Jan. 1, 1868, when Thomas M. Martin was admitted, and the firm of Ayres, Lufbery & Co. continued until the retirement of Mr. Martin, Aug. 29, 1873, since which the style has been Ayres & Lufbery.

The business of this firm has varied somewhat, according to circumstances and the conditions of the market. The proceeds of the business increased from about $25,000 a year in 1847 to $100,000 per annum from 1868 to 1873, the most profitable period. During those years they employed from fifteen to twenty men. Prices have since declined, so that boards which sold for forty-two dollars and forty-five dollars per thousand in 1868 now bring only about thirty dollars to thirty-four dollars. There is also less control of the market and greater competition than formerly, so that the business of the firm for 1881 amounted to about $30,000.

I. & J. LAFORGE carry on quite a large business in the manufacture of wheels, spokes, and wagon and carriage springs. They started on Cherry Street, near the depot, in 1865, making at first only spokes and wheels, to which they added the manufacture of springs in 1874. They purchased their shops of Samuel Sanders in 1870; run of 50 horse-power steam-engine, and employ about thirty hands. Sales in 1881 amounted to about $60,000.

Messrs. Ira and Joel Laforge were born in Woodbridge, and have lived in Rahway since 1852. They have enlarged their factory by several additions, making it in all respects convenient for their large business.

GORDON PRINTING-PRESS WORKS.—The Gordon job printing presses are too well known to require a description in this article. There are probably ten thousand of them in operation in the United States to-day, besides many which have been sent to foreign countries. Mr. George P. Gordon, the inventor, was born in Salem, N. H., in 1810, and early in life became a practical printer. The well-known press which bears his name was invented in 1851, and was for a time manufactured in Rhode Island.

The factory at Rahway is situated in the central part of the city, occupying a space of about three hundred by three hundred and fifty feet in area. The main building, of brick, is thirty by one hundred and thirty feet, four stories high, with a two-story addition about sixty feet square. Adjoining the main building is the foundry, where the castings used in the manufacture of the presses are made; also numerous small buildings for the storage of lumber, moulding-sand, iron, and coal.

The machinery is driven by a twenty-five horse-power steam-engine; the buildings are warmed by steam, and communication is had between the various stories of the factory by means of an Otis elevator. The capacity of the factory for the production of presses is about six hundred machines a year; the average production in prosperous times is about four hundred presses per annum, and the sales amount annually to about $150,000.

Mr. Gordon died Jan. 27, 1878. The factory is owned by his daughter, Miss Mary A. Gordon, now in Europe. The business manager is A. Sidney Doane, No. 97 Nassau Street, New York. Superintendent at the factory and master-mechanic, Amos P. Barber.

The Gordon Opera-House was built by George P. Gordon, the inventor of the Gordon printing-press, and was erected in 1875. Mr. Gordon having plenty of means acquired in his successful invention, built the opera-house which bears his name more as a compliment to Rahway than as an investment of hopeful profit. It is said that a portion of his early life was spent in connection with some sort of a traveling theatrical company, and that he built the house partly as a reminiscence of that experience and of the value which he attached to amusements.

Among the prominent business places of Rahway is the printing and publishing house of W. L. Mershon & Co. (William L. and Samuel D.), established in 1875. Though so recent in its origin this establishment is already one of the largest in the State, and is complete in all its appointments. To meet a steadily enlarging trade the enterprising proprietors are constantly adding to their business facilities. We here see under the one management departments for printing, electrotyping, and binding, with everything else belonging to a complete publishing house. The firm are proprietors and publishers of The Rahway Advocate, a semi-weekly paper, Republican in politics, which dates its origin back to a period of sixty years ago, when it was founded under the name of The New Jersey Advocate. Among their other publications is Leisure Hours, a literary magazine, issued monthly, which has a wide circulation, with subscribers in every State.

Banks.—RAHWAY NATIONAL BANK.—Capital, $100,000. This is the successor to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, chartered in 1828, and which closed its business in 1867, returning to its stockholders the capital and about forty per cent. in surplus. The National Bank of Rahway was chartered in 1865, and purchased the banking-house owned by the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank. A. F. Shotwell, president; Walter Fuller, Jr., cashier; A. F. Shotwell, A. V. Shotwell, Joel C. Ayres, A. B. Wood, and Hampton Cutter, directors.

UNION NATIONAL BANK.—Capital, $100,000. Organized in 1865. Jonathan Woodruff, president; Robert C. Brewster, cashier; Joseph S. Smith, Jonathan Woodruff, J. H. Durand, H. H. James, G. E. Ludlow, J. R. Potter, A. E. Woodruff, and R. C. Brewster, directors.

RAHWAY SAVINGS INSTITUTION.—William C. Squier, president; Jacob R. Shotwell, Abel V. Shotwell, vice-presidents; Ross Vanderhoven, secretary and treasurer. Began business Feb. 19, 1851, on Main Street, opposite Cherry. George F. Webb, the first secretary and treasurer, died in November, 1860; and Dec. 3, 1860, his place was filled by the election of Joel Wilson, who served as secretary until May, 1870, and as treasurer until May, 1875, the offices being divided at the former date. John C. Coddington was elected secretary May 9, 1870; John Bowne was chosen treasurer in May, 1875, and Joseph S. Smith in June, 1876, remaining in office until August, 1879; Ross Vanderhoven was elected secretary in May, 1879, and treasurer in August, 1879. Joseph S. Smith and James B. Laing were chosen first and second vice-presidents at the organization. In 1854 Benjamin M. Price was made second vice-president, and Mr. Smith first. In 1855, Benjamin M. Price was chosen first vice-president and Mr. Laing second. In 1858, A. C. Watson was made second vice-president. In 1863, A. V. Shotwell and J. R. Shotwell were made respectively first and second vice-presidents, and have so remained ever since.

The bank building is the City Hall, erected and occupied in May, 1868.

Schools of Rahway.—SCHOOL LANDS.—We find the following in the Woodbridge town records touching the school lands in Rahway:

"March ye 28, 1716. Then Lay'd out by us under written (Purcunt to a town Grant to the Inhabitants of Rahway) two acres of School Land Begining att a white oak tree Markt on four sides, standing by the Rod that Runn ye widow Jones' house; thence running southwest and be west twenty-eight Rod to another white oak markt on four sides; thence south southeast twenty Rod to a small white oak markt on four sides; thence Northeast by East sixteen Rod to a Wallnut tree markt on four sides; and from thence on a straight Line to ye place where 11t begin;

"THOS. PIKE, Lott layer.

"JOHN JAKES,

"GEORGE BROWN,

"WILL. LLESLEE,

"Committee."

This two acres of school land granted by Woodbridge to the inhabitants of Rahway we presume was rented for the benefit of schools in the Rahway neighborhood. But it must have produced a very small income. The school lands of the township were rented and managed by a committee appointed from year to year by the annual town-meeting. In 1764 a fund had accrued from this rental amounting in principal and interest to £434 7s. 9d. The increase from that time till the beginning of the Revolution is shown by the following table:

1765.....	465	5	3	1773.....	900
1766.....	533	8	2	1774.....	985	4	10
1767-69.....	-	-	-	1775.....	1063	14	11
1770.....	740	-	-	1776.....	1162	12	6
1771.....	794	-	-

During the Revolution the interest of the fund was devoted mainly to the war. In 1789 the interest of this fund, together with the tax on dogs, was appropriated by the town to the "schooling of poor people's children."

FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.—Probably the earliest schools established in the settlement were those of the Friends or Quakers. The first school-house of the Friends was built on the same lot as their meeting-house in 1785, viz., on Main Street, on the place recently occupied by George Walker as a hardware-store. William Shotwell was one of the early teachers there. The building fronted the road (now Main Street), was twenty by thirty feet in size and one story high.

In 1804 another meeting-house was built by the Friends on Irving Street, and a school-house was erected a little south of it, which was removed when the railroad went through. It was a two-story wooden structure, and built soon after the meeting-house. Lindley Murray Moore (named after Lindley Murray, the grammarian) was one of the early teachers. Then followed Eli Vail, Abel Marsh, Aaron Byllinge (a descendant of Edward Byllinge, one of the proprietors of West Jersey), Henry B. Pool, Joseph Shotwell, and others. This Friends' school was for many years the only school in the place.

One of the old schools kept for many years was in the "White School House," so called, in Lower Rahway, opposite the residence of John H. Lufbery, in Grand Street. Alvan Fox, William B. McGougen, Robert Dennis, and others were among the teachers.

A building called the "Academy" in Upper Rahway stood on St. George's Avenue near Jardine's marble-works. N. Morse and John W. Seymour were among the teachers. It was abandoned about the time the districts were consolidated in 1848.

There was an old school-house, which stood on the east bank of the south branch of Rahway River, on the place now occupied by John Hults. It was a plain low building, and school was kept in it until about fifty years ago. It was built at an early time.

The building on the east side of Main Street, corner of Adams, on the premises lately occupied by Mr. Prentice, justice of the peace, was built for a school-house at an early day. John W. Seymour and James McKelvey were among the teachers there some fifty-five years ago. Mr. A. V. Shotwell and others now living attended school there in 1830. It has been converted into a dwelling, and is still standing on the same spot.

Up to the year 1821 there was no school building in Milton. In that year a school-house was built on St. George's Avenue about half-way between Milton and Elm Avenues, on ground belonging to George Brown, now the property of B. A. Vail. It was a plain one-story building, never painted, and only a scratch coat of mortar on the inner walls. School was kept there till about twelve or fifteen years ago, although the house was removed to another lot by the heirs of George Brown upon his decease. The first teacher was Miss Mary Hannahs, who afterwards taught a young ladies' select school at Princeton; other teachers were Robert Dennis, Charles M. Saunders, William Griffin, Alfred Herbert, Ichabod Kirkland, Howard M. Henderson, Royal Coleman, Penina Hampton, and James McKelvey.

Some sixty years ago an open, unfenced lot stood opposite the Bramhall property near Six Roads, on which was a small, low school-house. The land was set apart by the early settlers. It was known as the "school-house on the hill." The property was sold some forty years ago, being vacated by act of the Legislature, and the school known as "Six Roads School" in Woodbridge township took its place. Ichabod Kirkland was an early teacher.

ATHENIAN ACADEMY.—Among the academical schools of Rahway the old Athenian Academy was probably the most famous in its day. It stood on Main Street near Commerce, not far from the present Second Presbyterian Church, and was for many years both a school-house and a public hall. The second story, to which the name of Athenian Hall was applied, was capable of holding fifteen hundred people. It was built in 1833 by the Athenian Association, Robert Lee, president; Clayton Moore, secretary. The address at the opening of the academy was delivered by John D. Scoles, a prominent lawyer of New York. The principals of the Athenian Academy were as follows in the order named: Alvan Fox, John A. Grant, Frederick Kingman, James Anderson, Sidney Avery.

After the public school system was adopted the building was abandoned for school purposes, and was converted into a theatre.

Mrs. Willard Phelps and Mrs. Lydia Sigourney, the poetess, kept a boarding-school for young ladies in a house now occupied by John R. Morse, built especially for their accommodation by Samuel Oliver, deceased. Their school continued here several years, when they removed to Troy, N. Y. There are many persons in middle life in this city and vicinity who can testify to advantages received from their instruction.

Rev. Mr. Ely for several years occupied the building near the corner of Irving and Grand Streets as a boarding-school. Some years after it was taught by Mr. Dwight, of Boston.

THE FRANKLIN SCHOOL.—The district schools in the townships of Rahway and Woodbridge within the limits of the village continued without change until 1848. In that year an effort was made by a few leading citizens, prominent among whom were John A. Van Ortwick and the late Enoch M. Ayres, two intelligent and enterprising gentlemen, to inaugurate a better system of education for the children and youth of the village. They proposed to consolidate the three districts in the village into one, and to establish one large school under better appliances and a higher grade of instruction. Simple and reasonable as the plan was, it met with strenuous opposition from quite a large number. It was openly opposed by Rev. Mr. Ely, at that time superintendent of schools for Rahway township, and who had charge of a private seminary on Grand Street near Whittier. The measures, however, were approved by a vote of the people, the districts were consolidated, and a school was opened in a building known as "Military Hall," which stood on the corner of Grand and Church Streets.

This was the preliminary step towards the erection of the Franklin school-house, now the oldest building used for school purposes in the city of Rahway. The school in the rented hall filled up so rapidly that in a short time a larger building was needed, and the Franklin school-house was erected. In the mean time, Rev. Mr. Ely's time having expired as superintendent, Mr. Patrick Clark was elected in his stead. The latter co-operated heartily with the trustees in their plans to improve the educational advantages of the village, and, indeed, he was elected because he was known to be in favor of the new measures. A considerable struggle ensued over the question of expenditure in the construction of the Franklin building, some being in favor of a cheap wooden structure, and others favoring a substantial and commodious brick building. The latter, with the trustees and friends of improvement, carried the day, the people voting a sufficient appropriation to build the new school-house.

The Franklin building was erected in 1851. It is a brick structure, fifty by seventy-five feet, two stories and basement,—practically three stories in height,—and cost about six thousand dollars, a considerable sum to be raised for a school-house in those days. When the present public school system was adopted this building was turned over to the city.

Among the principals of this school have been the following: James Anderson, in 1862, succeeded by his son, Edward L. Anderson, Stephen A. Blazier, and Peter Wyckoff.

BOARD OF EDUCATION.—The Board of Education of the city of Rahway was incorporated by act of the Legislature March 8, 1861. An amendatory act was passed March 2, 1869, making the board to consist of one commissioner of public schools for each of the wards of the city, and one commissioner at large, who shall hold their office for one year. No commissioner is eligible either to the office of superintendent of public schools or to that of secretary of the board.

The present members of the board are the following: First Ward, John A. Mallow; Second Ward, Henry Howard; Third Ward, William Rollinson; Fourth Ward, Walter Brewster; at large, Almeth White; City Superintendent, Gilbert R. Lindsay; Clerk, James M. Silvers.

Under the management of the board are the following public schools:

Franklin.—Union Street near Church. Frank L. Stiles, principal.

Washington.—Lawrence Street near Grand. H. C. McIlvain, principal.

Columbian.—New Brunswick Avenue corner of Hazelwood. James Jones, principal.

Third Ward.—Central Avenue near St. George's. This building was erected in 1873 and contains the High School. Samuel D. Hillman, principal.

Colored.—No. 59 Central Avenue. Mattie V. Putnam, principal; Miss E. Hazard, principal of grammar department.

The first class graduated from the High School June 30, 1876, and were the following: Miss Clara E. Mills, Miss Minnie C. Ayres, Miss Emily Reynolds, Miss Julia Merrick, S. B. Morse, L. B. Mundy.

Statistics of schools in the city of Rahway, 1881:

CHAPTER XXXIX.

First Presbyterian Church.¹—It was during the pastorate of the celebrated Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, D.D., that the members of the First Church of Elizabeth residing in this vicinity were organized into a church. It is said of this celebrated divine that in visiting this portion of his extensive field he was accustomed to preach in a barn located on the site of the mansion on St. George's Avenue recently owned by Jeremiah Johnson, an elder of this church, now the property of John Harper.

It is worthy of note that the project of building the first church edifice in Rahway was undertaken soon after a precious revival of religion had quickened the people of Dr. Dickinson's charge.

In writing, Sept. 4, 1740, to Rev. Mr. Foxcroft, a ministerial friend in Boston, giving some account of the work of grace among his people, Dr. Dickinson says, "I have had more young people address me for direction in their spiritual concerns within this three months than in thirty years before."

It was doubtless under the divine impulse of the historic revival of 1740, which extended its influence and power into most of the English provinces of America, that the people of this community were aroused to build a house of worship. Put the fact of the revival of 1740–41 in conjunction with the tradition that about the time of the memorable winter, known familiarly as the "hard winter," 1741–42, we can account for the desire to have a place of worship here; the unity of the people, how some who were not of the Presbyterian faith co-operated with fraternal spirit in the work of building the Lord's house. The spirit of new-born faith and reconsecration led "the people even in that trying season to give liberally of their meagre means to the project." "Each one, both young and old, seemed anxious to do to the extent of their ability what they could to the advancement of the great work in which the people were engaged."

The edifice erected in 1741–42 was located on what is now St. George's Avenue, just within the church cemetery inclosure. The present carriage-way passes directly over what was the church site. The brown sandstone memorial stones used in marking the graves that were made on the north, south, and west sides of the church designate clearly to-day the location of the first church edifice.

An old account-book of Amos Terrill, a carpenter by trade, in possession of his grandson, Amos Terrill, Jr., shows that he performed considerable work on the church building in 1788. After standing for nearly half a century and through the Revolutionary war, repairs were needed. Some minor alterations in its construction may have been made at the same time.

The building, remembered by the older members of the congregation, was a two-story frame, of heavy timber, sides inclosed with shingles; two rows of windows let in an abundance of light; the surmounting tower for the bell culminated in a spire, upon which was adjusted a copper weather-cock, perforated by a bullet said to be a mark of the Revolutionary period. Within, galleries were upon three sides; the pulpit, located in the west end of the church, was high, of barrel shape, in size small, having room for but one, and overshadowed by a sounding-board. There were four rows of pews, with backs high and straight, approached by two aisles. The floor was laid of heavy hewn plank, not closely joined, the cracks widening with age, making it necessary for the ladies in the winter season to bring foot-stoves to neutralize the cold of the under-current that came through the crevices of the uncarpeted floor. The pulpit was modernized before the pastorate of Dr. Janeway (1829). He speaks of it as being moderately low, ascended by a stairway on either side, having room to seat three or four persons.

This is the original and the first church edifice in Rahway. The Friends, who located on the Rahway River in 1682 and in subsequent years, like their Puritan and Scotch-Irish neighbors, had their place for religious assemblage and worship outside of what is known as the Rahway vicinage to-day. The Puritans and Scotch-Irish worshiped in Elizabeth, many of them going afoot, crossing the river on stepping-stones at the point where the Rahway water-works are now located. The Friends first attended meeting in Perth Amboy; subsequently a meeting was organized in Woodbridge, and they attended there. Like their neighbors, they had meetings for religious worship in private houses in this vicinity before they had an organization or a building specifically for this purpose. It appears in the minutes of the Woodbridge meeting that, by request, privilege was granted to hold a meeting in the house of William Robinson, which stood near the house now occupied by Mr. John Durand, on Hamilton Street. This meeting took place in 1707, on the 12th day of the eighth month, and the first day of the week. It was not, however, until March 17, 1759, that the Woodbridge meeting ordered a house to be built. This building is located on Main Street, and occupied by George Hall as a hardware-store. The first record of a business meeting is 1763, the 19th day of the 10th month.

The Presbyterian Church, built in 1741-42, doubtless had an organization formed about the time the structure was completed. The records from the organization of the church until 1795 have been lost. The data we have is from Presbyterial records and collateral history.

Nov. 15, 1748, the Presbytery of New York installed Rev. Aaron Richards pastor of the church. As there is no mention in this minute of the church being organized immediately preceding the ordination, it is presumable that the church was organized at the instance of Dr. Jonathan Dickinson at the completion of the church edifice in 1741-42. This makes the First Presbyterian Church the first church of Rahway historically. It antedates the first business meeting of the Friends by twenty-one years. Taking the absolutely certain date of Rev. Aaron Richards' installation, Nov. 15, 1748, it has the precedence of sixteen years.

This church was from the commencement of its organization Presbyterian. The primitive church organizations in Newark, Elizabeth, Freehold, and Woodbridge were Independent or Congregational. They afterwards became Presbyterian, and were under the care of the Presbytery of Philadelphia.

These churches were all connected with this Presbytery before the year 1717. It was at this date, after he had served the Elizabethtown Church nine years, that Dr. Dickinson became a member of the Presbytery.

In 1733 the Presbytery of East Jersey was formed out of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and Dr. Dickinson at once became the acknowledged leader of the new Presbytery.

In 1738 the East Jersey and Long Island Presbyteries were united, forming the Presbytery of New York. It was under the care and direction of the Presbytery of New York, about 1742, that the First Presbyterian Church of Rahway was organized. The church being formed from a portion of the pastoral charge of Rev. Jonathan Dickinson, D.D.,¹ who was an acknowledged prince among his brethren in theology and Presbyterian government, is a pledge of its pure Presbyterian origin.

The first five years of this church's history we must denominate the period of supplies.

Mr. John Cleverly was the first supply.² He was of New England birth, a graduate of Harvard College in 1715. He first supplied the church at New Providence; from thence he came as a supply to the Rahway Church. The people under the pastoral care and teaching of Dr. Dickinson for a generation had a high standard of ministerial qualifications, which was not met in Mr. Cleverly. He retired after his first engagement to Morristown, where he continued to reside until his decease, Dec. 31, 1776, aged eighty-one years.³

Mr. John Grant, a young man of unusual promise, succeeded Mr. Cleverly as supply. He graduated at Yale College in 1741. How long he preached here is not definitely known. He was subsequently settled as pastor of the Westfield Presbyterian Church. After a brief, faithful, and successful pastorate of three years he was called from his earthly labors to his heavenly reward. "He died much lamented, Sept. 16, 1753, aged thirty-seven years." "His body lies in the Westfield graveyard, near the street, under a table monument."⁴ He was succeeded by a Mr. Strong, probably the Rev. Nathan Strong, of Woodbury, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1742, the year following the graduation of John Grant. He returned to New England, and was settled at Coventry, Conn., Oct. 9, 1745.

"A Mr. Watkins, probably Rev. Hezekiah Watkins, who graduated at Yale in 1737, was employed for a short period."⁴

After being supplied for five years the church extended a call to the Rev. Aaron Richards. The call was accepted, and Mr. Richards became the first pastor of the church. The grandfather of Aaron Richards came at an early date from Hartford, Conn., to Newark. Aaron had a twin brother named Moses. They were the children of John and Jane Richards, born in Newark, 1718. Aaron was sent to Yale College, where he graduated in 1743. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, Nov. 15, 1748, and on that day installed the first pastor of this church.

He is spoken of as naturally buoyant and vivacious, but often thrown into periods of darkness and spiritual melancholy.

Dr. Samuel Davis, subsequently president of Princeton College, on his return from meeting of Synod in Elizabethtown in 1753 called to see him, and strove to cheer him up and lead him out of his darkness by giving an account of a similar period of gloom and depression through which he had passed himself.

He was an ardent patriot during the war of the Revolution. He was compelled to flee from the British invaders in 1776 to escape being captured and carried off, as were his co-presbyters,—McKnight, of Shrewsbury, and Roe, of Woodbridge. His place of refuge was in South Hanover, N. J., where he supplied the Presbyterian Church until he could return home in safety.

Towards the close of his ministerial life he was again the subject of acute melancholy, in which his spirit was depressed and buffeted by imaginary terrors. In 1790 he ceased to preach. The pastoral relation was dissolved Nov. 2, 1791. It is to the credit of the congregation that in petitioning the Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral relation they made generous provision for the comfort of their disabled minister's family. He died May 16, 1793, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.¹

His body is buried in the church graveyard, within a few feet of the spot where for more than forty-two years he preached the gospel. The following is the inscription on his tombstone:

"Sacred to the Memory
OF
REV. AARON RICHARDS, of Rahway,
Who deceased May 16th, 1793,
Aged 75 Years,
And in the 45th Year of his Ministry.

"All who knew the man will join
Their friendly sighs and tears to mine;
For all who knew his merits must confess
In grief for him there can be no excess.
His soul was form'd to act each glorious part
Of life untaught with vanity or art;
No thought within his generous mind had birth
But what he might have own'd in heaven and earth."

His wife, Susannah Smith, a native of England, survived her husband but a few months. Her remains are interred beside her husband's. The remains of Alexander Richards, son of Rev. Aaron Richards, deceased Oct. 4, 1813, in the fiftieth year of his age, are interred near the grave of his father and mother, also those of his first wife, Rhoda, who died June 8, 1792, and two children by his second wife,—Stephen C., died July 19, 1814, in the nineteenth year of his age, and Daniel Cooper, died November, 1796.

During the pastorate of Aaron Richards, one hundred years ago, the existence of this church was in great peril. The declaration of independence, that brought hostile troops to this vicinity, drew the line of separation between the sons and daughters of liberty and the adherents of the British crown. The Presbyterian ministers of East New Jersey and the churches to which they ministered were hostile to the British cause. So universally was this the case that to be a Presbyterian minister or a member of a Presbyterian congregation was prima facie evidence of being an advocate of American independence. Let your eye run along that part of the chain of Presbyterian Churches in which we find ourselves. Dr. McWhorter, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Newark; Rev. James Caldwell, of Elizabeth; Rev. Aaron Richards, of Rahway; Rev. Azel Roe, of Woodbridge; and Rev. Charles McKnight, of Shrewsbury, all Christian patriots, having the care of congregations from which went able-bodied men and youth to fill up the ranks of the Continental army. Many of the homes in this vicinity a hundred years ago were left without their natural protectors. The husband and father and sons were called away from home to the camp and the battlefield. During the greater part of the Revolutionary war the British troops were located on Manhattan and Staten Islands. From this base line of operation the enemy on several occasions came in force, marching over these highways, with view to actual possession, and when driven back to his fastness on the islands, foraging parties, often under the lead of some refugee, kept the people in constant terror and vigilance by their forays in the night, often made memorable in robbing the stable of horses or driving away herds of cattle. The incendiary's torch was sometimes applied to the forage that could not be carried away to the barn or house of a loyalist. Unarmed citizens were carried away as hostages. Here, too, there was actual conflict, wounds given and received, and the foray crowned with ghastly death. When the morrow's sun rose upon the scene the British flag could still be seen floating on Staten Island, and the bugle blasts of her trumpeters could be distinctly heard by the watchmen on Rahway Neck. The oppressive burden upon the hearts of the aged ones, the women and the children in the homes here one hundred years ago, was that the foray of last night, in which there was robbery, fire, fright, skirmish, wounds, and death, might be repeated again to-night or in the near future.

troops located in the "Short Hills," a few miles west from this point, in a letter that he wrote to his wife in Carlisle, Pa., June 18, 1780, speaks thus of the dangers and sufferings of the people of this district:

"You may think your situation happy indeed, my love, when compared with that of the poor people of this part of our country. It grieves me beyond expression to see their distressed situation, particularly that of the women and children. Murder and rapine await them wherever these barbarians come.

"Were it possible I would suffer a thousand deaths rather than see you in the situation some poor gentlemen here are forced to see their wives and daughters left in."¹

William B. Crowell, one of the senior elders of our church, has in his possession a large family Bible that was taken by British marauders from the home of his mother and carried with other plunder to Staten Island. This event occurred before Miss Eunice Bloomfield became Mrs. Crowell, when still at her father's home near Metuchin. The sacred volume, with a favorite cow that had also been taken, were a heavy loss to the spiritual and material comfort of the family. Miss Eunice, with resolute spirit, resolved, if possible, to recover the stolen book and cow. With this object in view, accompanied with two servants, she crossed over to Staten Island at Blazing Star Ferry, now Tuft's Landing, and made known the object of her mission to the officer in command. The personal presence and spirit of the heroic petitioner secured at least a favorable hearing from the officer. After inquiry and search the Bible was found in a gunboat near to the shore. When brought to the officer he examined it, and, noting in the registry of deaths a recent entry of a brother of the petitioner as having been killed by the British in battle, he handed the volume to the applicant with the remark, "Well, there is one rebel less to fight us." As to the cow, the petitioner could have it if she could identify it among the great herd that had been gathered from East Jersey farms in the recent raid. They were huddled together by a fence inclosure near by. It was a dangerous and fruitless endeavor to go within the inclosure and move among the restive beasts to make search for the one that was supposed to be among the many. The herd was scanned by searching eyes again and again, but the favorite cow could not be found among them. Before giving up the search as fruitless it occurred to Eunice to use an expedient that was successful at home in bringing the cow from the neighboring field to feed and to the pail by a call. The call was given with natural home tone, and, to the surprise of the commanding officer and subalterns, and to the great joy of Eunice, the favorite responded to the call by leaping over the inclosure and coming toward her. The commanding officer without hesitation said, "That cow is yours: you can take her home." With both Bible and cow identified and reclaimed, there was a going home with great gladness of heart.

Amos Morse, deceased in 1871, for many years an elder in this church, had in his possession an heirloom that was a constant reminder of an incident in his father's life in the war of the Revolution. His father held a captain's commission in the Continental army. His home was just north of the north branch of the Rahway River, on St. George's Avenue. The house of Capt. Morse was surrounded in the nighttime by a detachment of British troops and refugees from Staten Island. The captain was taken out of bed and hurried off a prisoner, and for six months thereafter suffered the rigors of confinement and scant rations in the New York Sugar-House.

Among the articles stolen from the captain's house on this occasion was the stately eight-day clock that had been the family monitor for years. The size of the clock made it a cumbersome prize to transport. After carrying it some distance, the soldiers took out the works and abandoned the wooden case. The case, minus the essentials for keeping time, was restored to its former place in Capt. Morse's home. Subsequently Isaac Brokaw put in this historic case new works, and it still echoes to the time-beats of its restored works in the home of Mrs. Mary H. Tichenor, in Seminary Street, Rahway. Mrs. Tichenor is a granddaughter of Capt. Amos Morse.

The pastorate of Rev. Aaron Richards was followed by a vacancy of more than five years. The pulpit was supplied by a "Mr. Cooley," who had sought admission to the Presbytery, "but not producing satisfactory testimonials could not be admitted." He was followed by Mr. Henry Cook, a licentiate. During the rest of the interval supplies were furnished by the Presbytery.

Rev. Robert Hett Chapman was of New England ancestry. He was the second son of the Rev. Jedediah Chapman and Blanche Smith, and was born at Orange, N. J., March 2, 1771. He was educated at the College of New Jersey, where he graduated in 1789. After a full course of theological study, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, Oct. 3, 1793. In the winter of 1794-95 he visited the Southern States on a missionary tour. On his return he supplied for a while the newly-organized church of Wardesson (Bloomfield), N. J.

The call from Rahway was laid before Presbytery Oct. 12, 1796, and accepted. The ordination and installation took place Jan. 5, 1797. Feb. 14, 1797, he was married to Hannah Arnett. This pastorate was of short duration. The disasters of war, that had broken up many families, destroyed and prostrated much of the material wealth of the community, the inability of Mr. Richards in the closing years of his ministry to perform the needed pastoral duties, and the more than five years of vacancy conspired to leave the church in a low estate spiritually and poor in earthly substance.

After three years' labor the pastoral relation is dissolved, Oct. 2, 1799, for want of adequate support, the people being unable to fulfill their engagements. Mr. Chapman was subsequently the honored president of the University of North Carolina, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Williams College in 1815, and died on a journey at Winchester, Va., June 18, 1833.¹

Rev. Buckley Carll was born in Cohansey, Cumberland Co., N. J., in 1780. In 1799 he became the pastor of the Pittsgrove, N. J., Presbyterian Church. In the summer of 1802 he received a call to this church. Oct. 6, 1802, he was received from the Philadelphia Presbytery by the New York Presbytery. On Dec. 28, 1802, he was installed pastor of this church. During Mr. Carll's pastorate of twenty-three years there were three occasions of special religious interest in the church. The revival in the First Church of Elizabeth under the pastorate of Dr. John McDowell in 1808, in which one hundred and eleven persons were added to his church on profession, extended in its gracious effects into the bounds of the Rahway Church. At this time sixteen persons were added on profession. In the winter of 1814-15 there was an addition of fifty-six to the church on profession. In addition to the stated ordinances of the church there were prayer-meetings held at private houses in the evenings of the week. Several men who came from Springfield and were at work in the Taurino Factory were especially active in conducting the cottage prayer-meetings.

In the spring of 1825 Mr. Carll, at the request of many of his people, invited the Rev. N. C. Sexton, an evangelist, who had with special divine favor been conducting religious services in Springfield and Westfield, to come to Rahway and hold similar services here. When Mr. Sexton commenced his special services he had also the co-operation of the Rev. Mr. Wiggins, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway. Mr. Sexton had associated with him by special invitation James Brainerd Taylor, an intelligent, earnest, spiritually-minded young man, who was now in his junior year in the College of New Jersey.

In June, 1825, thirty-two united with this church on profession of faith, still others who experienced a change of heart during this work of grace united with the church at subsequent communions; some united with other churches. While Mr. Carll was earnestly devoted to his Master's cause, and wrought faithfully in the line of his duty as he saw it, he did not seem to have that liberality of spirit and tact which were necessary to enable him successfully to co-operate with others, and to give general and specific direction to others who were willing to work under judicious leadership, when the awakening and quickening spirit of revival was present.

In the revival of 1814-15 the members of his own flock did not conduct their meetings for social prayer just according to his pattern. When the revival of 1825 took place under the direction of Mr. Sexton, it is not to be wondered at that Mr. Carll, with his naturally positive and nervous temperament, now suffering, as he himself writes, "with premature old age, attended with painful chronic diseases, from which I can expect no relief but by the hand of death," should demur at some things in the teachings of the young evangelist, his fellow-worker, at modes of operation, and currents of thought, feeling, and expression that at high tide were breaking over old landmarks.

The reason why Mr. Carll, who had with great fidelity recorded the transactions of the session from 1802 until the close of the year 1815, ceased after this date to make any entry in the record is accounted for by the exceptions that Presbytery in 1816 took to the proceedings of the session in some cases of discipline, which exceptions are recorded in the session-book by order of Presbytery, and are as follows:

"In several instances members of the church are considered as guilty before they are tried.

"There are instances in which members have been suspended from the communion of the church without due formality in taking and recording the testimony."²

At the stated meeting of the Presbytery of Elizabethtown at Connecticut Farms, April, 1826, at the request of the congregation, the pastoral relation between Mr. Carll and the Rahway Presbyterian Church was dissolved.

More than a year after the pastoral relation was dissolved, when Mr. Carll was located on his farm near Deerfield, he thought it necessary for self-vindication to publish a series of articles in the New Jersey Advocate, a Rahway paper. In these articles he was unsparing in the judgment he pronounced on revivals, also on those who were active in promoting them, and upon those who, by God's grace, had been brought to accept of Christ in revival times. These articles, which are still in some of your homes, should not be taken as a correct index of the man. His naturally legal mind, under the stress of disease and increasing years, became morbidly positive when he thought himself wronged. His pastorate of twenty-three years here left a better record for him than this controversy. He certainly had more wisdom than many of his ministerial brethren in managing the temporalities of his home. While he had means of his own, he made his salary of three hundred dollars per annum, on which he was called, go a good deal further than it would with many others. The people in good will came to his help with voluntary labor, in drawing wood and in subduing the briars and thorns that had taken possession of the twenty-five acres that were attached to the parsonage.

He came to the church when it was in debt and there were but few members. The feeble folk were gathered together and the debt seems to have been disposed of, and everything pertaining to the church property put on a new face. The spiritual life of the church was at a low ebb. While he was not in favor of some of the revival measures that were in vogue in his day, it should be remembered that in the years coming between the revival periods mentioned he had additions on profession of faith that indicated fidelity in dispensing the ordinances of the church. Speaking of the field in the early period of his ministry here he says,—

"During my ministry the Presbyterian congregation had nominally attached to it near three hundred families, about fifteen hundred souls. From various causes about one-half of these were never seen in the house of public worship. But each and all expected and received my services in their sick-rooms, at their dying beds, and in burying their dead.

"I preached twice and often three times on the Sabbath, catechised and instructed the children and youth with no little diligence and care, lectured at private houses in the evenings throughout the week, promoted and attended prayer-meetings, and made many ministerial visits from house to house. . . .

"In the autumn of one year for six weeks (besides meeting and performing my other duties) I preached as many funeral sermons as there were days.

"This is a specimen of my labors as a minister in Rahway for the space of twenty years, during which, taking one week with another, I preached five times a week."¹

After the pastoral relation was dissolved, Mr. Carl returned to the neighborhood of his former charge, purchasing a farm within four miles of Deerfield, N. J. He died at Deerfield, May 29, 1849, and was buried at Pittsgrove, N. J. His third wife, Mrs. Abigail Carl, survived him, and subsequently resided in Bridgeton, N. J. His first and second wives died during his pastorate here, and their remains are interred in the church cemetery.

At a congregational meeting Sept. 15, 1825, moderated by the Rev. John McDowell, a unanimous call was extended to the Rev. Elias W. Crane, at the time stated clerk of the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, and pastor of the Springfield Church. Mr. Crane did not accept the call.

In addition to Mr. Crane the pulpit was supplied at this period by Rev. A. G. Fraser, who supplied the pulpit continuously for eighteen weeks, Mr. George Coan (licentiate), Rev. William B. Barton, and Rev. Lewis Bond.

At a congregational meeting, moderated by Rev. David Magie, May 16, 1826, Rev. Alfred Chester was chosen pastor of the church. He graduated at Yale College in 1818, and pursued his theological studies at Andover, Mass., and Princeton, N. J. On July 18, 1826, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, and installed pastor of this church. This pastorate was brief. In less than three years, March 3, 1829, the pastoral relation was dissolved. That the most amicable relation existed between the church and Mr. Chester is indicated by his continuing to supply the pulpit and act as moderator of the session for some time after the relation was dissolved.

The spiritual life of the church, that had been quickened into zeal and vigor in the revival of 1825, did not manifest itself in continued power and progress during the pastorate of Mr. Chester. During the same year in which his pastoral relation with this church was dissolved (1829) he became principal of the academy in Morristown, N. J., in which capacity he served until 1843. Afterward he was agent for our church board of publication. In his latter years he resided in Elizabeth. He made his closing days useful in furnishing religious reading and preaching to the prisoners in the county jail. He died in Elizabeth, July 2, 1871, aged seventy-three years. He was married to Miss Mary Ann F. Chetwood, of Elizabeth, N. J.

At a congregational meeting July 20, 1829, Rev. John McDowell presiding as moderator, Rev. Abraham O. Halsey received a majority of votes cast for pastor. The minority voting against his present election were anxious to have Mr. Halsey preach as a stated supply for three months with a view to mutual acquaintance and future settlement. The majority acquiesced in the proposition, and in the spirit of Christian unity and fraternity extended an invitation to Mr. Halsey to supply their pulpit for the next three months.

Rev. Thomas L. Janeway was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 27, 1805. He was the son of Rev. Jacob J. Janeway, D.D. His mother's maiden name was Martha Gray Leiper. He had peculiar advantages in being prepared for the ministry, from the position that his father occupied as a minister in Philadelphia.

He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1823, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827.

In the autumn of 1829, Dr. John McDowell, pastor of the First Church of Elizabeth, commended Mr. Janeway to this church, and soon thereafter Dr. McDowell moderated the congregational meeting that made out the call for the pastoral services of Mr. Janeway. He had been licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October, 1827, and on Nov. 3, 1829, was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabeth Town, and installed pastor of this church. On this occasion Rev. John McDowell, of Elizabeth, preached the sermon, Rev. Albert Barnes, of Morristown, gave the charge to the pastor, and Dr. Magie, of Elizabeth, the charge to the people.

At this time piety was at a low ebb, and many unbelievers and scoffers at religion were in the habit of speaking reproachfully and bitterly of the Scriptures, the church, her ministers, and her members. On street corners, where there were groups of men gathered in the evening, these topics were often the themes for ridicule and discussion. In some of the shops and stores Christian ears were made to tingle because of the reproachful and blasphemous words uttered by the men who gathered in these places for an evening's ribaldry. It was, therefore, at a critical juncture in the moral and religious life of the community that the young pastor entered upon his duties.

On several occasions as he was passing along the street or entering shop or store, he was put to the test by an intentional and profane attack on the truth and the cause of which he, as a minister of the gospel, was an exponent. What might have been an imprudent and perilous course for some young ministers was successfully adopted by Mr. Janeway. He met the challenge on the spot. Familiar with the popular objections urged against the Scriptures and the church, schooled from youth in the knowledge of the Scriptures and theology as a system, having a well-poised mind, a fruitful store of anecdote, an unusual discernment of character, he was enabled to meet the opponents of the truth with such thoroughness and effect that if not convinced they were at least sufficiently impressed with the young minister's intelligence, readiness, and courage thereafter to be respectful in deportment and speech while he was present.

At the commencement of Mr. Janeway's ministry the practice of two services, with but short intermission, was still in vogue. The young pastor objected to the two services coming so near together. He plead for a later hour in the afternoon, or an evening service. He stated that unless this was done he would have to use a manuscript and read at the second service. As there seemed to be a decided preference on the part of the people that their pastor should preach without manuscript, his desire in regard to change of time for the second service was granted.

During his pastorate several extensive revivals of religion blessed the church. Some of the oldest members of the church remember a precious work of grace that had its origin in sunrise prayer-meetings held in the academy building, that was located within the inclosure of the marble-yard adjoining the cemetery, facing St. George's Avenue. This was in 1831, when forty-one united with the church on profession of faith. Identical with this revival the project of building the new church edifice commenced.

The year 1834 is the year of grace in the history of this church: one hundred and fifty-seven united with the church on profession of faith and twelve by certificate, making a total for the year of one hundred and sixty-nine. During Dr. Janeway's pastorate of eleven years two hundred and sixty-two were added to the church on profession of faith, and one hundred and twenty-seven by certificate, making an aggregate of three hundred and eighty-nine during his pastorate.

At this time the Society of Friends and the First Methodist Episcopal Church were the only additional religious organizations in Rahway. The pastor of the Presbyterian Church had an immense field from which to gather, and he did his work well.

The discerning members of his church and congregation in the second year of Mr. Janeway's ministry saw that policy and necessity demanded a new church edifice. Some could not think of giving up the old location, and so it was decreed at parish meeting that the new building was to be planted upon the spot occupied by the old one. But at a subsequent meeting, held March 1, 1831, this action was rescinded, and the trustees were authorized to purchase from Samuel Oliver and Job Squire the property known as the Richards lot, at the price they had previously paid for it, viz., eighteen hundred dollars. It was also determined at this meeting that the new church should be located on this Richards lot. It was called the Richards lot because it had been the property of Rev. Aaron Richards, the first pastor of the church.

The house that was on the lot was subsequently removed, and is now located on the southwest corner of Union and Oliver Streets, the property of Lawrence Bumgartner, Sr. The land, having the present church and parsonage front, extended north to the river, all north of Union Street being subsequently disposed of by the trustees of the church.

The church edifice was commenced in May, 1831, under the auspices of John Y. Van Tuyl, Samuel Oliver, Job Squire, Dr. D. S. Craig, John Wood, Jr., and Henry Mundy, trustees at that time.

The contract for building was given to Moses Dodd, the builder of the Third Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J. It was a general specification that this church was to be patterned after the Third Church of Newark, with the definite requirement that in some of the interior appointments and finish it was to be superior to its model. The work was well and faithfully executed. When completed it was regarded as superior to most of the churches in the neighboring towns, and excelled by few, if any. The contract price for the erection of the church was fourteen thousand six hundred dollars. In addition to this, five hundred dollars was paid for the upper bent or story of the cupola, which was not contemplated in the original design. This would make the aggregate cost of the church fifteen thousand one hundred dollars. The erection of the parsonage, which followed that of the church, cost about three thousand dollars, making the cost of the church and parsonage eighteen thousand one hundred dollars.

After the proceeds of the sale of the parsonage and ground on St. George's Avenue and the old church building were added to the amount subscribed by the people, there was the sum of ten thousand dollars to be raised to clear the church and parsonage of debt. I am told that Mr. Job Squire and Samuel Oliver each advanced five thousand dollars, taking as their security for future reimbursement pews at a specified valuation. By this noble act the church and attached property were freed from debt.

The church was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God Feb. 5, 1832. The Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., of Princeton Theological Seminary, preached the dedicatory sermon in the morning; Dr. J. J. Janeway, father of the pastor, preached in the afternoon, and Dr. McDowell, of Elizabeth, in the evening.

The old church was purchased by Mr. Job Squire, moved to the lot on which the Franklin school-house is located, where it was used as a tenement-house until 1851, when it was sold and removed in fragments to give place for the school-house.

At the request of Dr. Janeway, the Presbytery of Elizabeth dissolved the pastoral relation with this church Nov. 17, 1840. This request was made that he might accept of an urgent call extended him by the North Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. He was installed pastor of the North Church in December, 1840. He remained pastor of this church for nearly fourteen years, when impaired health compelled him to resign, April, 1854. With partially restored health he was settled in 1855 as pastor of the Kingston Presbyterian Church, New Jersey. In 1861 he was chosen to the responsible position of secretary of our Board of Domestic Missions, and was called upon to administer its important interests when the church was dismembered by civil war, and there was peril and confusion in the finances of the country, and many of our churches on the war line were threatened with complete extinction. He resigned this secretaryship in 1868. He has also served the church as director and trustee of the theological seminary at Princeton, N. J., and has discharged other important duties to which the church on special occasions has called him. The College of New Jersey conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1850.

In the good providence of God, this church was not at this time long exposed to the perils of pulpit vacancy. Before a month had expired after the time the Presbytery had dissolved the pastoral relation between the church and Mr. Janeway, Dr. Magie, of Elizabeth, was requested to preside at a congregational meeting in this church having as its object the election of a pastor. The result of this meeting, on Dec. 11, 1840, was the election by a unanimous vote of Charles K. Imbrie as pastor.

Charles K. Imbrie was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 15, 1814. His father was James Imbrie, of Scotland, and the maiden name of his mother was Margaretta Kisselman, of Philadelphia. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1835, and after a four years' course graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, Oct. 7, 1840. In the same year he was called to the pastorate of this church. On Jan. 5, 1841, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, and installed pastor of this church.

While the pastorate of Mr. Imbrie had the sanction of the Divine Presence in securing additions to the church on profession of faith during each passing year, the years 1842 and 1843 were years of peculiar blessing. In 1842 thirty-two were added to the church on profession of faith, and in 1843 sixty-seven.

The session made record of their gratitude for the divine blessing in these words:

"It was a season of great joy and edification to the church, and the session here record their grateful acknowledgment to the Lord Jesus Christ, the great head of the church, for the great blessing with which he has favored ourselves and the other churches of the Presbytery."¹

The qualities that secured a successful pastorate to this faithful servant here were the cause of his being sought and desired for other important pulpits. Being called to the First Presbyterian Church of Jersey City, he deemed it his duty to accept it. The people of his charge complied with regret with his request to have the pastoral relation dissolved. This was done by Presbytery Jan. 6, 1852, after a pastorate of about the same length as Dr. Janeway's, eleven years. Dr. Imbrie still continues the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Jersey City. His peculiar and manifold qualifications give him an adaptation to the varied duties of an efficient and honorably conspicuous ministerial life. He has not sought places away from his own pulpit and the vineyard of his own pastoral charge, but the church and the Christian public have sought him. It is thus that he has been called to membership in the executive committee of the Board of Foreign Missions. His bold handwriting, his clearly articulated paragraphs, and his analytical mind in the arrangement and record of facts, that we have exhibited to us in the sessions book of this church during the years in which he served as both moderator and clerk, show us why he was selected the recording secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, and served in that capacity for a period of thirteen years. It was not the fact that he was a good penman, but the fact that he was a man of thought and intensely interested in the living issues of the day from the Christian stand-point, and could express himself clearly and pungently in regard to them, that he was called to the editorship of the New York Evangelist in 1870. It is because he is deeply interested in the work of educational institutions that he was called to the trusteeship of the State Normal School of New Jersey, and to that of the College of New Jersey. It was because he was worthy that his alma mater, the College of New Jersey, in 1861, conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. Yet you love him and revere him when he comes among you, not because he has been called to these places of honor, but because he was your faithful pastor, because he lived a holy life among you, and with great diligence, faithfulness, and tenderness preached unto you Jesus, because with sympathetic heart he was the partner of your sorrows, the sharer of your joys.

As soon as the pastoral relation between Mr. Imbrie and the church was dissolved, Jan. 6, 1852, the session without delay addressed their former pastor, Mr. Janeway, in regard to a successor. He commended to them the Rev. Samuel S. Sheddan, of Northumberland Presbytery, Pennsylvania. Arrangements were at once made for him to supply the pulpit for two Sabbaths, on the last Sabbath of January and the first Sabbath of February.

The pleasant fraternal relation that existed between this people and their surviving ex-pastors is illustrated in the fact that Mr. Janeway is requested to recommend a minister for the vacant pulpit, and after the minister commended by him is heard, Mr. Imbrie is requested to preside at the congregational meeting, Feb. 9, 1852, which after a month's vacancy elected his successor, the Rev. Samuel S. Sheddan. Mark also the minute giving an account of the installation:

"The Rev. Samuel Sheddan was this evening (April 21, 1852) installed pastor of this church by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, acting by their committee. Sermon by the Rev. Thomas L. Janeway, D.D.; charge to the pastor by the Rev. Mr. Murray, and to the people by Rev. Charles K. Imbrie."¹

Samuel Sharon Sheddan was born in Northumberland County, Pa., Sept. 13, 1810. His grandparents, who were Scotch, located on a farm not far from the Susquehanna River, where the family homestead still remains. He pursued his academic course at the academy in Milton, Pa., and graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1831. After teaching for a short time he entered upon his theological course at Princeton, N. J., where he spent over two years.

In the autumn of 1834 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Northumberland. In this year he was stated supply of the church at Williamsport, Pa. In 1835 he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Muncy, Pa. With the pastorate of the Muncy Church, he for about two years gave half his time as stated supply to the Williamsport Church. In 1837 his services were desired as co-pastor with Dr. Bryson, the venerable pastor of the Warrior Run Presbyterian Church. The half of his time that had been previously given to the Williamsport field was now as co-pastor given to Warrior Run, the church of Mr. Sheddan's childhood and ancestors; his father and grandfather were both ruling elders in this church. Dr. Bryson had already served this church a half-century.

The co-pastorate continued for four and a half years, when the aged patriarch resigned his charge, and Mr. Sheddan, who had been baptized and reared in this church, became its sole pastor. At this time the Warrior Run Presbyterian Church was one of the largest and most influential churches in the Presbytery of Northumberland. While here, in addition to preaching and pastoral work, he conducted successfully a large classical school. From the young men he was instrumental in preparing for college, more than a dozen of them subsequently became ministers of the gospel.

From Warrior Run he came to this church, where he remained throughout a pastorate of twenty-two years, when the Lord, the Great Shepherd of the fold, pronounced his work done and called him to his reward in the home of the blessed.

The field and influence of this church was divided with the formation of the Second Church about two years before Mr. Sheddan's settlement here. The active, earnest element that was dismissed from the First to form the nucleus of the Second Church left a gap in congregational presence and life that it was hard to fill.

The increase of population within the contracted field bore but a small ratio to the aggregate number of persons who had a few years previously been identified with this congregation. While Dr. Sheddan's pastorate was not characterized by any such extensive revivals as those of 1825, 1834, 1843, yet there were seasons of quickening in which there were encouraging additions to the church on profession of faith, as in 1855, when 28 united with the church, 19 of whom by profession of faith. In 1858, again, 19 united on profession of faith. Subsequent years are designated by 10, 15, 13, 12, 11 uniting on profession. During his pastorate 151 united with the church on profession of faith and 184 by certificate. Dr. Sheddan had some peculiar characteristics that distinguished him as a man, a preacher, pastor, and brother in Christ. His habit of taking hold of the central truth of a passage or paragraph and evolving it in a series of pictorial representations, always faithful to the main thought, attracted attention, secured interest, and was calculated to lodge in the mind and heart the master thought of the preacher.

In acknowledgment of his abilities as a preacher and his especial acquirements as a divine, Columbia College, in New York, in 1864, conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

Dr. Sheddan's health was seriously impaired several years before his decease. The visits made to the old homestead in Pennsylvania, the scenes of his boyhood days and early ministerial life, and to the seashore, the tender care of loving friends, and the skill of his physicians alleviated for a time the sufferings that came from his deeply-seated pulmonary disease, but they could not avert death.

On Oct. 18, 1874, Dr. Sheddan fell asleep in Jesus, in the hope of a blessed immortality. He was sixty-four years of age Sept. 10, 1874.

The Synod of New Jersey, of which Dr. Sheddan had a few years previously been moderator, was in session at Camden, N. J., when his death was announced. There was a solemn pause in the business routine to permit the event to speak and teach its lesson to the members of the Synod. A committee, composed of as many members as there are Presbyteries in the Synod, was appointed to attend the funeral.

The following persons were appointed as this committee: Revs. George Shelden, D.D., Charles K. Imbrie, D.D., J. M. Ogden, D.D., H. Hamill, D.D., A. M. Jelley, W. T. Findley, D.D., and L. C. Baker.

The Common Council of the city of Rahway, on learning of the decease of Dr. Shedd, adopted the following preamble and resolutions, a spontaneous tribute to his memory:

"WHEREAS, We have heard with sadness of the death of Rev. Dr. S. S. Shedd, which occurred on Sunday last, after a lingering illness, the sufferings of which he bore with that fortitude which only a true Christian can endure; and whereas we deem it proper, considering the warm place he occupied in the hearts of our citizens, from his long association with us as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, to take some official action in relation to his death; therefore,

"Resolved, That we bear testimony to the loss the city of Rahway has sustained by the death of one who has so long labored for the cause of Christianity among us, and who, by his mild disposition, able preaching, and earnestness in his calling, endeared himself to all who became acquainted with him; and, further,

"Resolved, That we will gratefully cherish the memory of him who was always faithful in the discharge of his duties, and who was ever ready to perform any act of charity or mercy that came in his way; and, further,

"Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with his family, and with the congregation over which he so long presided, in the irreparable loss they have sustained by his death; and, further,

"Resolved, That as a mark of respect we will, as a body, participate in the funeral ceremonies, and also invite all the city officers to join with us in paying the last tribute of respect to an honored minister and citizen; and, further,

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Common Council and published in the papers of the city, and also that an engrossed copy be presented to the family of the deceased."

The following messages, dictated by the dying pastor to his elders and people but a few days before his death, when read under the shadow of the sore bereavement, struck chords of tender and pathetic interest in the hearts of all:

"Oct. 6, 1874.

"TO THE SESSION:

"I had expected to have taken you once more by the hand, but God has seen fit to order it otherwise.

"I want to thank you as a Session for your kindness and liberality to me.

"Forgive my shortcomings, and forget my omissions of duty.

"And now the welfare of the church rests with you. Be true to her. Be men of prayer, be men of wisdom; not rash, yet not slow; not overbearing, yet not weak.

"And may the blessing of God rest upon you always.

"YOUR PASTOR."

"Oct. 6, 1874.

"TO MY PEOPLE:

"I had hoped to see you once more face to face and thank you for your kindness to me, but it is denied me.

"Please accept my thanks for your never-failing kindness to me as your pastor for twenty-two years, and your continued goodness to me during my sickness.

"I know I have not filled up my measure of duty, but I ask your forgiveness for my shortcomings.

"I have tried to labor with the ability God gave me, and I trust him for His blessing on the seed sown in such weakness.

"And now to you as a church I would say one word: Keep together, study the best interests of the church, and as far as possible be of one mind.

"To you who are Christians I say be prayerful, be zealous, be ye workers for Christ, and work while it is called to-day, for the night cometh when no man can work.

"And you whom I have so long invited to come to Jesus, and whom I have so often told there is no other way, hear me once more urge you to come. And oh! hear your dying Pastor as he pleads with you not to wait until you come to your death-bed to prepare for the other world.

"And to the Sabbath-school one last word: To the teachers, be faithful and weary not in your work. To the scholars I say God takes little ones home as well as those of threescore; be ye ready.

"Now may God's blessing rest upon you, my people, until one by one you are gathered home, and we all meet again where there is no parting.

"YOUR PASTOR."

The funeral services were conducted Thursday, October 22d, commencing at 2 P.M. The interior of the church was heavily draped with the sombre folds of mourning. The casket containing the body of the beloved minister was placed in the church at twelve o'clock, and from this time until the voice that announced the introductory service was heard an almost continuous procession was passing through the church to look upon the still, placid features of the man of God, who seemed to be in sweet repose by the pulpit from which for nearly a quarter of a century he had preached Jesus.

Dr. Shedd was unable to preach after May 17, 1874. On the morning of this day he exchanged with the Rev. W. H. Roberts, of Cranford. In the evening he preached his last sermon to his own people. From this date until the first Sabbath in March, 1875, the pulpit was supplied. The following persons preached for the congregation during this period:

Revs. W. H. Roberts, J. F. Pingry, Ph.D., E. B. Edgar, J. A. Liggett, Aaron Peck, of the Presbytery of Elizabeth; Drs. W. H. Green, Princeton, N. J.; Cyrus Dickson, New York; Charles K. Imbrie, Jersey City; and D. M. Halliday, of Princeton, N. J.; Revs. Francis Rand, Charles S. Dewing, of Union, N. Y.; O. H. Elmer, of Moorhead, Minn.; William Imbrie, of Jersey City; J. E. Peters, of Huntingdon, W. Va.; William C. Rommel, of Helena, Mon. Ter.; J. A. Chambers and W. J. Bridges, of theological seminary, Princeton, N. J.; and Messrs. I. M. K. Pittenger, C. N. Cate, C. B. Ramsdell, and Washington Choate, of Union Theological Seminary, New York City; and the Rev. G. W. Pendleton, of the Baptist Church, Rahway.

At a congregational meeting held Jan. 5, 1875, moderated by the Rev. J. A. Liggett, a unanimous call was extended to the present pastor of this church. He commenced his ministerial duties on the first Sabbath of March, 1875, and after having been received as a member of the Presbytery of Elizabeth, April 20th, he was duly installed as pastor April 29th.

On this occasion the Rev. C. K. Imbrie, D.D., of Jersey City, preached the sermon from the words, "The common people heard him gladly." Mark xii. 37.

The Rev. Samuel Parry, of Pluckamin, N. J., moderator of the Presbytery, presided and proposed the constitutional questions. The Rev. William C. Roberts, D.D., of Elizabeth, gave the charge to the pastor, and the Rev. J. A. Liggett, of Rahway, the charge to the people. The closing prayer was offered by the Rev. A. Craig, of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway, and the benediction pronounced by the newly installed pastor.

Since the commencement of the present pastorate to the time of writing, a period of about two years, one hundred and ten persons have been added to the membership of this church, ninety-one of this number on profession of faith. That a large proportion of this number has come from families not identified with the church in membership is shown from the fact that the ordinance of baptism was administered to forty-three out of the ninety-one uniting on profession of faith.

That heads of families connected with the church are claiming the blessings of the covenant promised to themselves and their children is indicated by the fact that in the same period twenty-six infant children have been baptized.

Accompanying the spiritual quickening of God's people and this addition to their numbers there has been an energetic and liberal spirit manifested in discharging duties pertaining to the temporal affairs of the church.

It is a fact worthy of commendation that this congregation continued the salary of their deceased pastor to his family to January, 1875, and that in the following spring liberal expenditure was made in changing and improving the interior of the parsonage for the reception of the new pastor and his family.

Expenditure on church property became a necessity when the city authorities graded the three streets, Grand, Church, and Union, that are the southern, western, and northern boundaries of the lots upon which the church and parsonage are built. To the expense of curbing and paving on these three streets was added the expense of five hundred and seventy-nine dollars for the iron fence in front of the church, and of seventeen hundred and seventy-five dollars for the stone and work in erecting the steps and platform in front of the church.

These changes environing the church edifice very naturally raised the question as to what should be done to improve the interior of the church. This resulted (1870-71) in remodeling the lecture-room. Old partitions and seats were removed, the floor was lowered a foot and a half, and the darkness, gloom, and inconvenience of the old order of things were displaced by the conveniences that made it a delightful room for weekly religious meetings, social gatherings, with special adaptations for the Sabbath-school, that by sliding sash-doors can in a few moments be divided into four apartments or thrown into one.

In June, 1875, a project was started with the object of securing by subscription a fund of ten thousand dollars, to be devoted to reducing the debt of the church and making needed improvements on the church edifice.

An organization was formed at a congregational meeting, termed the "The Centennial Association of the First Presbyterian Church."

The object was to secure the fund of ten thousand dollars in the year 1876. The subscription was made on the percentage plan, viz., a certain per cent. of the ten thousand dollars, or of whatever sum raised less than ten thousand dollars.

In soliciting subscriptions from the people for this fund, many persons were found in favor of making radical changes and improvements in the interior of the church. Under the co-operation of the trustees and the centennial committee the work was commenced and carried forward, securing in the end a total transformation of the main audience-room and the addition of organ annex, and painting the wood-work of the exterior. In the fall of 1875 the church had been re-roofed. Feeling quite secure under this new covering, after months of test, the work on the interior was commenced early in May, 1876. We owe it to those who come after us at least to note some of the changes that have been made. The old cylinder-shaped wood-stoves in the back part of the audience-room, raising their burly heads above the backs of the pews, and surmounted in the gallery with capacious turret-drums, have been displaced by heaters, doing the work better from the basement. The old pulpit was removed, giving place to one smaller and of neater proportions, placed on a low and roomy platform. Fitted underneath the top of the pulpit is a large tin bowl, terminating as a funnel, the pipe of which runs underneath the platform of the pulpit, and from thence pipes are conveyed under the floor to several pews, where there is connection with flexible gutta-percha tubes that can be adapted to the ears of persons hard of hearing. The top of the pulpit is perforated, so that there is little obstruction to the sound of the speaker's voice. It is the simple principle of the ordinary speaking trumpet brought in a practical way into church.

The organ has been brought from the gallery and placed in the new annex built especially for it immediately in the rear of the pulpit. The organ is pumped by water-power, the motor doing its work in the kitchen underneath, being supplied with water from the pipe in the street, connected with the city water-works. The side galleries have been removed. The end gallery, since the removal of the organ and the placing of arm-chairs on the neatly carpeted floor, has been made one of the most desirable locations for hearing in the audience-room. The doors have been removed from the pews, and new arms, paneled ends, and book-racks have been added. The new cushions in the pews are covered with wine-colored rep. The upholstering of the new chairs in the pulpit and the carpet are in complete harmony with the exquisite frescoing on the ceiling and walls.

The most notable improvement consists in the thirteen stained-glass windows that fill the old frames. The material of which they are composed is of excellent quality, the colors rich without being gandy, and the harmonious blendings of the different shades produce a pleasing effect. The simple scriptural symbols that adorn the heads of the windows are strikingly appropriate for a house of divine worship.

After worshipping for six months in the lecture-room of the church, the congregation quietly, without having the fact published, assembled in the remodeled audience-room, Sabbath morning, Oct. 29, 1876.

The object, as stated by the pastor, was not to have the usual service, but reverently, and in the spirit of worship, look upon the changes that had been wrought, and to provide for the pecuniary obligations resting on the church, and thus to prepare in good faith to rededicate the house to the service of Almighty God. After a brief outline of the work performed, commendation of the spirit of harmony with which the trustees of the centennial committee had performed their respective duties, it was stated that the debt on the church previous to the commencement of the recent improvements was nine thousand dollars, the accumulation of years; that the improvements recently made cost eight thousand dollars, making a total of seventeen thousand dollars. The centennial committee reported the ten thousand dollars they set out to raise as pledged by subscribers. The people were now asked for additional subscriptions to create a sinking fund of seven thousand five hundred dollars to remove every vestige of debt that rested on the church. At this point the pastor introduced Mr. Jeremiah Johnson, Jr., a former elder of this church, who, in Christian spirit and with admirable tact, called for and secured pledges to the proposed sinking fund. The people responded to the call nobly, and in about half an hour monthly pledges, extending over the period of three years, were received from one hundred and forty persons, reaching in the aggregate eight thousand dollars, five hundred more than had been requested in the call.

The membership of the church, 1882, is two hundred and eighty-eight; Sunday-school, three hundred and one.

Whole amount of money raised by the congregation for the ecclesiastical year ending April 1, 1881, was six thousand six hundred and thirty-five dollars.

CHAPTER XL.

Friends' Meeting.—The records of Friends' meetings in East New Jersey have been very carefully kept since 1686, the date of their first Monthly Meeting at Perth Amboy. In a single volume in the possession of Mr. Abel V. Shotwell, of Rahway, there is the record of a hundred years, reaching from 1686 to 1786, and including minutes of their meetings at Perth Amboy, Woodbridge, Plainfield, and Rahway.

These records also contain numerous incidents and facts of rare interest to the historian and the biographer. Should the history of the Friends in this country ever be undertaken this volume would be of great value.

It is not our purpose in this local sketch to go much further back than the beginning of their meetings in Rahway, except to mention briefly a few facts characteristic of the spirit of the Friends.

The entry made on the 10th of September, 1686, announces that the Monthly Meeting held at Perth Amboy "agreed" that "all friends should bring Minutes of ye Births and Burials since they first came into this place that they may be Recorded."

"At the Monthly Meeting held in Amboy the 13th of the 2d month, 1687, John Pearce being present, the Meeting told him that he had done wrong in sending a paper to the people of the world (desiring to be supplied with a cow, he being poor) and not coming to the Monthly Meeting of friends to lay his necessities before them. And thus left him to consider, etc., whether he would redress his fault if he feels it in himself."

On the 11th of March, 1686, it was directed that "John Reid or his wife take care that widow Mill do not want, and give Report to the Meeting." Also two Friends were appointed "to speak to widow Mitchell that shee do not talke of Peter Sonmans as it seems shee doth, Rather wish hir to come to the Meeting and if ye be difference lay it before friends according to the order of truth." At the next meeting (April 8th) the "difference" alluded to was settled by arbitration.

The first Monthly Meeting held in Woodbridge occurred at the house of Benjamin Griffith, on the 17th of August, 1689. In 1713 Friends first met in their meeting-house in Woodbridge.

Application was made to the Woodbridge Monthly Meeting in the year 1722 for leave to hold First Day meetings at the house of John Laing in Plainfield, which was agreed to. John Laing dying in 1725, bequeathed a lot of land for a meeting-house, and in 1731 request was made for building a meeting-house thereon, which was granted. The meeting-house was accordingly built, and meetings held twice a week, on First and Fourth Days.

At a Monthly Meeting held at Woodbridge on the 16th 10th month, 1742, a motion was made by divers Friends at Rahway to hold a meeting for three months at the house of Joseph Shotwell, which was agreed to be held on the first days of the week. On the 17th 9th month, 1743, it was agreed by the Monthly Meeting that a meeting should be held twice a week at said Joseph Shotwell's till the middle of the second month following on the first and fourth days of the week, which meetings were continued by appointments from year to year till a meeting-house was built on a lot of land given by said Joseph Shotwell for that purpose in the year 1757, then were removed to the said meeting-house.

It appears from an entry in the records of Jan. 1, 1757, that the Friends in Rahway had "repeatedly made application to the Monthly Meeting for leave to build a meeting-house at that place, and that the Friends in Woodbridge referred the matter to the 'consideration of the Quarterly Meeting.' The representatives brought word from that body, the substance of which was that in regard to the matter in question it was "the solid sense of that meeting that a meeting-house ought to be built at Rahway." Without further opposition the project was pushed forward. During February and March much was done towards the new enterprise. Solomon Hunt, Samuel Marsh, Abraham Shotwell, and Benjamin Shotwell were appointed to purchase a suitable lot. Francis Bloodgood, Abner Hampton, and Robert Willis were appointed to assist in selecting the ground and determining the size of the plat. It was decided that the new building should be thirty-four feet long and thirty feet wide. The building is still standing on Main Street. It was abandoned as a meeting-house in 1804, and was loaned to the First Methodist Society to hold services in before the erection of their church. In later years it was occupied by George W. Hall as a hardware-store, and is now used as a tea-store.

In the year 1766 a motion was made to the Monthly Meeting to settle meetings in the said meeting-house at Rahway in the following manner, viz.: two meetings on the first days of the week, the first to begin on the eleventh hour, and the second to begin on the third hour; and the other to be on the fourth day of the week at the eleventh hour, which meetings have continued to this time.¹

In 1751 one or more of the Quarterly Meetings, hitherto held at Shrewsbury, were removed to Woodbridge, where they continued to be held till 1769, when one was removed to Rahway and held on the third First Day of the eighth month.

The above account in relation to the settlement of meetings was prepared by a committee consisting of James Shotwell, John Webster, and Benjamin Shotwell, and was read at the Monthly Meeting held at Rahway the 21st of the 7th month, 1773, and approved of. So it is certified by Thomas Latham, clerk.

We find by the next entry in the record that the Preparative Meeting at Rahway required a certificate for Henry Shotwell to the Monthly Meeting at New York, and that Cowperthwaite Copland and Thomas Latham were appointed to inquire into his life and conversation and clearness in respect to marriage, and draw an essay of a certificate as they find things and bring to next Monthly Meeting. It appears that the certificate was approved of and signed by the clerk.

"Giving way to drowsiness" in meetings appears to have been an offense subject to discipline among the Friends, for the Yearly Meeting in 1773 requested the Quarterly Meeting to give an account at the next Yearly Meeting of "Friends' care in treating with such," and it was reported that they had "treated with some who have given occasion of complaint on that account."

On the 19th of November, 1755, in accordance with the recommendation of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, a Ministers' and Elders' Meeting was established in Rahway, to be held monthly at the house of John Vail, on the third Second Day of the month, at eleven o'clock.

The representatives appointed to attend the Quarterly Meeting in 1773 were Richard Dell, John Webster, Elijah Pound, John Vail, Sr., and Abraham Shotwell.

Cowperthwaite Copeland had charge of the meeting-house for some time after its erection.

Robert Willis was one of the most active preachers among the Friends in this section of the country. He lived in Woodbridge, but visited the Friends in many localities. On the 17th of April, 1760, he informed the Woodbridge meeting that he had been "under an Engagement of minde for sum time to Vissit the meetings of Friends in the Southern Provinces." For this purpose he received a commendatory certificate. The record says, "He being under low Circumstances, Joseph and Abraham Shotwell are appointed to provide a hors and to furnish him with necessarys of all kinds suitable for that jarney."

He returned from the South in October with pleasant testimonials of his useful ministry in and about "West River," in Maryland. In 1761 he revisited South River, made a tour as far south as Fredericksburg, Va., and visited New York and New England. In 1770 he visited the Friends in England, returning in September, 1774. He died in Rahway, and some of his descendants are still residing there.

Sarah Shotwell was well and favorably known as a speaker among the Friends of this section. She is spoken of as "a pattern of humility and faithfulness." After her death a memorial was prepared by a committee consisting of John Webster and Abner Hampton, which was adopted by the June Monthly Meeting, 1760.

The senior John Vail, at a period somewhat earlier, had considerable eminence as a public teacher of the truth, and William Morris was at one time an honored and useful preacher among the Friends at Woodbridge, Rahway, Plainfield, and throughout this portion of New Jersey.

In August, 1761, a Preparative Meeting was established at Rahway.

That the meeting at Woodbridge declined very much after the building of the house of worship at Rahway is quite evident. In the minutes of the Rahway Meeting in February, 1766, it is recommended that Rahway and Plainfield should appoint some of their members from time to time to visit the Friends at Woodbridge, and the same course is recommended to those "Friends who feel a spring of love in themselves." In 1769 the Woodbridge Preparative Meeting was removed to Rahway, and in the same year the Monthly Meeting ceased to be held at Woodbridge, from this time forward alternating between Rahway and Plainfield.

At this time the meeting-house in Rahway was enlarged at an expense of £161. Delegates met in it for the first time after in August, 1769.

In 1785 the Friends erected a school-house in Rahway upon the meeting-house lot. It fronted the road (now Main Street), and was twenty by thirty, one story high.

In 1804 the Friends in Rahway built another meeting-house on Irving Street at the head of Poplar. It is a frame building, fifty by thirty-five, two stories. In 1827 the society was divided, and the other branch have a brick meeting-house on Irving Street between Lewis and Milton Avenue, the upper story of which is occupied for a school.

John Vail was very prominent in his day. He died at Rahway Nov. 27, 1774, in his eighty-ninth year.

Agnes Elston was prominent as a speaker. Died in Rahway.

Isaac Martin (most prominent since the Revolution) died Aug. 9, 1828, aged seventy-one.

Hugh Davids (also well known), another early preacher.

First Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway.—Robert Cloud and Thomas Morrell were the first Methodist preachers appointed by the Philadelphia Conference to the Elizabethtown Circuit, in 1787. The circuit probably included Rahway. But at what time services were first held here is unknown. Revs. John McClusky, Simon Pile, John Merrick, John Cooper, Jethro Johnson, and Gamaliel Bailey were the circuit ministers from 1788 to 1792, and probably during their ministry, about 1790, the first class was formed in Rahway.

The records of the church, now in the hands of Isaac O-born, of Rahway, contain evidence of the existence of a society, with its board of trustees, as early as 1798; for in that year a lot of land was deeded to them on what was afterwards Mechanic Street, now a portion of Grand Street, in Upper Rahway. We quote a portion of the deed, as follows:

"This Indenture made this eighth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, between William Shotwell, of the County of Essex, in the State of New Jersey, of the one part, and Jonathan Oliver and Benjamin Woodruff, of Essex County, William Flatt, Jr., Abraham Storms, and John Marsh, of Middlesex County, all of the State of New Jersey aforesaid, trustees in trust for the use and purposes hereinafter mentioned, of the other part, Witnesseth that the said William Shotwell, for and in consideration of the sum of fifty Dollars to him in hand paid at and upon the sealing and delivering of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the said William Shotwell: Hath given, granted, bargained, sold, released, confirmed, and conveyed, and by these presents doth give, grant, bargain, sell, release, confirm, and convey unto them, the said Jonathan Oliver, Benjamin Woodruff, William Flatt, Jr., Abraham Storms, and John Marsh, and their successors (Trustees in trust for the use and purposes mentioned and declared by these presents) all the estate, right, title, interest, etc. . . . which he, the said William Shotwell, hath in, to, or upon all and singular a certain lot lying and being in Elizabeth Town, Rahway, adjoining the Road leading from John Tucker's, Esq., to Shotwell's Landing, being part of the Tract of Land which the aforesaid William Shotwell lately purchased of Daniel Moore, Beginning," etc.

The deed goes on to recite that the said trustees "shall erect and build or cause to be built thereon a house or place of Worship for the use of the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America; and future trust in confidence that they shall at all times forever hereafter permit such Ministers and Preachers belonging to the said church as shall from time to time be duly acknowledged by the general or yearly district Conferences of the Ministers and Preachers of the said Methodist Episcopal Church to preach and expound God's Holy Word therein, and perform such religious exercises as are agreeable to the rules and discipline of the said Church forever hereafter."

The record contains the survey of the lot of land, returned by Joseph D. Camp, Oct. 20, 1798, and also a diagram of it drawn upon the page. It was never used, however, for the purpose intended, the society subsequently selecting a lot which suited them better. This is the lot on which the present church edifice stands, on Grand Street, although it has been enlarged by additions since made to it. It was conveyed to William Flatt and others, trustees, by Moses Jaques, Jr., April 4, 1808, and was recorded as shown by the following indorsement:

"Received in the office the 25th of March, 1817, and recorded in Book C 2 of deeds for Essex County, pages 354, 355, and 356.

"S. WHITEHEAD, Clerk."

The first movement towards building a church edifice appears from the records to have been made on Nov. 26, 1806. At a meeting held on that day the trustees say that the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and others who attend their meetings "are desirous of erecting a plain building, about forty feet square, for the public worship of Almighty God and to promote the practice of piety and virtue." They add that they "are encouraged to hope for success, as one person, not of their community, has generously offered a lot of land suitable for this purpose, between the towns of Rahway and Bridgetown, on which they propose to erect the buildings."

We learn from this extract that in 1806 Rahway and Bridgetown were separate hamlets, the intervening country being an open plantation, and that the church was placed between the two villages for the accommodation of both. At this meeting William Flatt, Aaron Miller, and Enoch Moore were "appointed Managers of the proposed building," or what we would call the building committee, and the following subscribers pledged themselves to pay to them the sums set opposite their respective names. As this list will reveal the names of many of the residents of the town at that period, as well as furnish the curious reader with the amounts contributed by each for building the church, we give it in full :

Up to Sept. 3, 1807, the building appears to have progressed so far as to have been inclosed, lathed, and plastered. From the bill of items presented by William Flatt, Jr., it appears that the pine lumber was obtained in New York, the timber of Merritt & Martin, one pair of hinges from William Martin, and one pair from William Ross, wrought nails from S. Martin. Judging from the amount of white lead charged, six pounds, only the wood-work and doors were painted, perhaps a single coat. Unlike most churches at that early day, this church enjoyed the luxury of being heated, for in the bill are the items of "1 Box Stove, £9," and "Pipe for the Stove, £2 4s. 10d.," the account having been kept in pounds, shillings, and pence. Joseph Stansbury did the mason-work, and William Bell the carpenter-work. Under the head of "Vote of Trustees to pay Wm. Bell," at a meeting convened by the "advice of a Quarterly Conference held at Turkey," in the church at Rahway, the 22d of March, 1814, it was resolved that "the six trustees present for themselves severally to pay 8 dollars and 87-100. Two of the said trustees made themselves liable for the absent trustee. The whole was 60 dollars, for which one general receipt was taken in full of all demands from said Bell against said church and its trustees."

June 14, 1814, a subscription of $66.25 was raised. The paper was prefaced by the following appeal: "Whereas the Methodist Episcopal Church in the township of Rahway has been for a long time in an unfinished state, in consequence of the funds being exhausted, and the house being in debt, the trustees have individually and collectively assumed the debt against said house. They have concluded to make an effort to seat it, that the people who wish to attend there may sit with convenience, and in order that they may be enabled to effect their desire do hereby most earnestly solicit the charitable aid and assistance from the benevolent of every denomination. The trustees do hereby pledge themselves that money coming into their hands shall be faithfully applied with all possible dispatch."

To this paper was subscribed the sum of $66.25. On June 30, 1814, an additional subscription of $27.50 was raised, but these sums were not sufficient to finish the building. At a full meeting of the board, July 29, 1816, Thomas Potts, secretary, it was resolved, "on motion made and seconded, that the church building, Liberty Chapel, be finished. Carried unanimously. On motion made and seconded, that the sum of $50 be borrowed to purchase materials for finishing the aforesaid chapel. Carried unanimously." The money was authorized to be borrowed of James Barber, and Anthony Oliver and Thomas Potts were appointed to purchase the material. At that time Aaron Miller and others held accounts of long standing against the church, which were ordered "paid out of the Legacy due the Church when received."

"Moved and seconded that Milan Ross be appointed to make provisions for the preacher's horses out of the church collections. Carried." Also "that one dollar per month be paid to the sexton." Several efforts had been made to incorporate the society previous to the date of the certificate of incorporation given below, which had proved unsuccessful, or had not fully conformed to the requirements of law:

"This is to certify that Thomas Foster, Thomas Potts, Milan Ross, Peter Morgan, Bennett Bowman, Charles Jaques, and John Decker have been duly elected trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the township of Rahway, County of Essex, and State of New Jersey, agreeably to an act of the Legislature of said State passed on the 13th day of June, 1799, to incorporate religious societies, and whereas said trustees have taken and subscribed the oaths required by law with view to become an incorporate body under the name and title as above written, to be known and designated in law as such.

A burying-ground was located in the rear of the church soon after the purchase of the lot. By action of the trustees in 1820 an addition was made to it by the purchase of a piece of land from Elias Stansbury. Milan Ross was appointed to procure the deed. (Recorded in B L 3 of deeds of Essex County, pages 16-17, July 18, 1832.¹) We find in the book of records a diagram of the burying-ground made by Anthony Atwood in February, 1835. It is laid out into lots ten feet north and south, and nine feet east and west.

A new burial-ground was purchased and laid out in 1848. It lies in the rear of the church, extending back to the next street, and was also purchased of Elias Stansbury.

In 1832 the meeting-house was repaired and an addition built to it. At the same time the building was newly seated in the lower part, and a room partitioned off under the gallery next the street.

At a meeting held in 1832 it was resolved "that the females be seated in the middle of the church, and, if necessary, occupy the wing on the left of the pulpit. Carried." Also, "Resolved that the president (William Granville) get the church insured for fifteen hundred dollars."

A Sunday-school house was built on the rear of the church lot on Seminary street in 1832.

The first resolution proposing the building of a "parsonage house" was offered at a meeting of the stewards and leaders held on April 23, 1832. It was not agreed to, but in lieu of this the house of Anthony Atwood on Seminary Street was rented and used as a parsonage for several years. In 1848 a lot was purchased of William Inslee, and a new parsonage erected thereon the same year. It is still the parsonage of the society.²

The church was constructed with a gallery across the front and on the sides, and had a circular window about three feet in diameter in the end next the street. When the church was enlarged by the addition of twenty feet in the rear the windows were all made with circular tops, some of which may now be seen in the office of Mr. Isaac Osborn, who bought the old church property.

New Church.—At a meeting of the trustees, June 17, 1856, a full board being present, "it was then and there unanimously

"Resolved, That we build a new brick church fifty feet front by seventy feet deep, said church to have a gallery at the sides.³

"Resolved, That the old church be advertised and sold to the highest bidder, reserving the seats up and down stairs, with the pulpit, altar-railing, and inside doors to entrance.

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed as a building committee to superintend the building of said church, that committee to be the following persons: Isaac Osborn, William H. Platt, Francis E. Terrill."

The property of the old church and lecture-room were taken by Isaac Osborn, he agreeing to finish the new church complete, except the blinds, and to paint the outside three coats and the inside one for the sum of ten thousand dollars. On the 17th of March, 1857, this proposition was accepted by the board in the words following:

"Resolved, That we give Bro. Isaac Osborn the entire charge of finishing the church, and that he forthwith finish the same."

The church was completed and dedicated in June, 1857. The sermon was preached by Rev. Thomas Sargent, of Baltimore.

We find from Mr. Osborn's complete statement of the moneys received and expended in the erection of the building that its entire cost was eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents.

The following is a list of the ministers who have officiated in this church from the first to the present time, with the dates of services, so far as they can be ascertained:

1799. Joseph Totten.	1848. James Ayers.
Thomas Pitte.	1855-56. Charles Larue.
John Robertson.	James H. Dandy.
1821-22. Bartholomew Weed.	Sedgwick Rusling.

1844. William A. Willmer.	1874-75. Alexander Craig.
1845. Vincent Shepard.	1876-78. George Winzor.
1846-47. George Winzor.	1879-81. E. C. Ducher.

The following have been presiding elders of the circuit:

1828. Rev. Manning Force.	1857-60. Rev. James M. Tuttle.
1856. Rev. Mr. Winner.	Rev. James Ayers.
1858. Rev. Mr. Lippincott.	Rev. R. T. Arnt.
Rev. John T. Porter.	Rev. Lewis R. Duon.
1861-66. Rev. T. J. Hilyard.

This church has been the mother-church of most of the Methodist Churches in this section of New Jersey, the following having sprung from this organization about the dates named:

- Perth Amboy M. E. Church, 1804.
- Woodbridge M. E. Church, 1812.
- Plainfield M. E. Church, 1818.
- Westfield M. E. Church, 1846.
- New Dover M. E. Church, 1842.
- Rahway Second M. E. Church, 1849.

These again have branched out into the following:

- M. E. Church, Scotch Plains, 1864.
- M. E. Church, Metuchen, 1865.
- M. E. Church, London, 1867.

REV. THOMAS MORRELL.—The society in its infancy was under the greatest obligation to Rev. Thomas Morrell, who not only labored incessantly as a pioneer preacher of the gospel, but was ready with his means to aid struggling and weak churches. His name stands at the head of the subscription list to build the first Methodist Church in Rahway with a contribution of forty dollars, the largest sum given except by three other individuals,—Aaron Miller, Jonathan Oliver, and William Flatt, Jr. Mr. Morrell was at that time living at Elizabeth Town, and did more than any other man to build up the Methodist Church there. He inherited much of his devotional nature from his mother, who was one of the small company who were induced to hear Philip Embury, the carpenter, preach in his own house in New York in the year 1766, the earliest American Methodist preacher. She was converted and had the honor of being enrolled in the first Methodist class in America. In 1772, Jonathan Morrell and his wife, the father and mother of Thomas, removed from New York and settled in Elizabeth Town. The father engaged in mercantile business, and soon took in his son Thomas as partner. When the news of the battle of Lexington reached the town he was foremost in getting up a company of volunteers, of which he was chosen captain. He was in command of one of the boats which captured the "Blue Mountain Valley" off Sandy Hook, Jan. 23, 1776.

"In June, 1776, he received a captain's commission, with orders to muster a company of seventy-eight men and report to Gen. Washington, then at New York. Two companies of militia were parading in front of the Presbyterian Church. Young Morrell gave them an earnest talk, and then called for volunteers. So effective was his eloquence that in five minutes his quota was filled, many of them being of the most respectable families in the town. They were equipped and ready for service at New York six days after the declaration of independence. They were attached to the New Jersey Brigade under Gen. Heard, of Woodbridge, and in the fatal engagement at Flatbush, Aug. 27, 1776, were nearly cut to pieces. Capt. Morrell fell, severely wounded, and barely escaped with his life." He, however, recovered and served in the army till after the battle of Brandywine, with the rank of major. Failing health compelled him to resign. In telling the story of his conversion he says,—

"In the month of October, 1785, I was awakened by the preaching of the Rev. John Hagerty, and in March, 1786, received the witness of God's spirit of my acceptance. In June, 1786, I began to preach as a local preacher in Elizabeth Town and in several parts of the circuit. In March, 1787, I began to ride as a traveling preacher, and rode on Elizabeth Town Circuit (twenty months) with Robert Cloud. At the Conference in New York, in October, 1788, I was ordained deacon (nearly forty-one years old), and appointed to the Trenton Circuit with John Merrick and Jethro Johnson. At the June Conference in New York, 1789, was ordained an elder, and appointed for that city with Brother Cloud, who was with me twelve months, and Brother Merrick, four months."

CHAPTER XLII.

Second Presbyterian Church.—The following account of the organization of this church is taken from the minutes of the session of the First Presbyterian Church of this city, and was written by the pastor, Rev. Charles K. Imbrie, D.D., under whose ministry the Second Church was formed:

"The session of the church having frequently conversed together on the expediency of taking steps for the formation of a Presbyterian Church in Lower Rahway, and there being some desire manifested at present among the people to effect this object, it was agreed among the members of the session to forward the work as far as possible. Several meetings were held, in which the members of the congregation on both sides of the river were represented, to exchange views on the subject.

"After full discussion all objections were at length waived, and it was mutually agreed by those present that the plan should be tried. Accordingly, application having been made to the Presbytery of Elizabethtown by those more immediately interested in the movement at its late meeting in Morristown, the Rev. Drs. Murray and Magie, of Elizabethtown, Rev. Mr. Street, of Connecticut Farms, and the pastor of this church (ministers), and Mr. Brown, of the First Church of Elizabeth, and Mr. Amos Morse, of this church (elders), were appointed a committee of Presbytery to visit this place, and, if the way should be clear, to proceed to the organization of a Second Presbyterian Church in this town.

"The committee of the Presbytery met accordingly in the First Presbyterian Church in this place this afternoon at two o'clock, and the way being clear, they proceeded to the organization of a new Presbyterian Church, to be known as the Second Presbyterian Church of Rahway, N.J.

"The services on this occasion were as follows, viz.:

"1st. Introductory exercises by the Rev. M. Street.

"2d. Sermon by the Rev. Dr. Magie.

"3d. After sermon the new church was organized by the Rev. Mr. Imbrie, pastor of the First Church, who then delivered a parting address to the members of the newly-organized church.

"4th. The election of elders, which resulted in the choice of the four brethren who had formerly been elders in the First Church, viz.: Aaron Tucker, Frederick King, George F. Webb, and Jonathan Thompson.

"5th. Installation of the elders by the Rev. Mr. Imbrie.

"6th. Charge to the new elders and the church by Rev. Dr. Murray. "The session would here record their gratitude to God that the whole affair has been throughout conducted with the utmost harmony and fraternal feeling. Our brethren leave us with the fervent wishes and prayers of the whole church for their success and happiness. We feel their loss deeply; but we bid them God speed in the new enterprise to which the Lord has called them. As a session we pray that the blessing of the Good Shepherd may follow our beloved brethren of the elder ship, with whom we have so long taken sweet counsel without a single interruption to disturb our fellowship."

In pursuance of this object fifty-five members of the First Church, at their own request, with their duly appointed elders, were dismissed by the session, and formed the nucleus of the Second Presbyterian Church of Rahway, Nov. 9, 1849. We give a list of their names as follows:

Elders.—Aaron Tucker, Frederick King, George F. Webb, Jonathan Thompson.

Members.—Caroline E. Ayres, John A. Briant, Ira Clawson, Almison Creego, Delia M. Creego, James A. Calhoun, Ann L. Calhoun, Louisa Crowell, Nancy Davidson, Isabella Davidson, Anna P. Everosgham, Philip Eckerson, Eveline Eckerson, Alexander Edgar, Ursula M. Edgar, A. Wilhelmina Edgar, Mary C. Edgar, Phebe Catharine Edgar, William M. Edgar, George P. Edgar, Henrietta Freeman, Jane O. Freeman, Ursula F. Gage, Harriet Gage, Hannah Haydock, Nancy Hoff, Ann Eliza Henry, Cornelius Jewell, Sarah Jewell, Louisa Jaques, Abby La Rue King, Frederick La Rue King, Caroline L. King, Adeline S. Lee, Ira C. Martin, Rhoda Martin, Nancy Martin, Margaret Miller, Sarah E. Parker, Theophilus Page, Priscilla Sutton, Sarah Sharpe, Thomas H.

Shafer, Caroline E. Shafer, Bethiah Thompson, Hannah Tucker, Prudence Turner, Jonathan Woodruff, Alvira Woodruff, Sarah M. Winans, Mary B. Wooding.

Of these fifty-eight persons who entered the church in 1849, nearly one-half are still alive after the lapse of thirty-three years. The four original elders—Aaron Tucker, Frederick King, George F. Webb, and Jonathan Thompson—are all dead.

Succession of Pastors.—Rev. Lewis H. Lee, from April 17, 1850, to April, 1853; Rev. George S. Mott, from Oct. 9, 1853, to Oct. 5, 1858; Rev. V. Le Roy Lockwood, from December, 1858, to 1864; Rev. John A. Liggett, from December, 1864, present pastor, 1882.

Eldership in 1882.—Jonathan Woodruff, Cornelius Jewell, Robert C. Brewster, Samuel Ayers, Ira Laforge, Edwin M. Brown, George Bush, Edward Cro-lins, James H. Durand.

The present membership of the church is about four hundred and fifteen, while the number in the three Sunday-schools connected with it is about six hundred. Within a few years a new lecture- and Sabbath-school room has been built, costing twelve thousand dollars, and a chapel has been erected for the school in East Rahway at a cost of five thousand dollars. The church has an excellent parsonage, and its property taken altogether has cost about fifty thousand dollars. It is free from debt with the exception of a very trifling sum.

First Baptist Church.—In 1832 there were a few families of Baptists in Rahway who met regularly for prayer and praise. They were occasionally visited by Rev. D. T. Hill, then pastor at Plainfield, Rev. G. S. Webb, of New Brunswick, and Rev. L. Lathrop, of Samptown, upon whose advice, early in 1833, fourteen persons formed themselves into a church, which shortly after was publicly recognized as the First Baptist Church of Rahway, the Methodist Church lending their house for the occasion. The constituent members were William Marsh, Susan Bartow, Sarah Ross, William Ross, Ezra Frazee, Mary Frazee, Mary Cox, Mary Day, Huldah Frazee, Rhoda Laing, Sarah Mundy, Frances Moore, and Mary Osborn, of whom the one last named alone remains. A few others, among whom were Timothy Ross and Deacons Peter Spicer and W. L. Pangborn, soon joined the little band by letter; and about the same date the first baptism was administered, the candidate being Brother B. C. Morse, who was subsequently licensed to preach, and six years later, having completed his studies at Hamilton, was ordained as pastor of the Lyons Farms Baptist Church. Shortly after their organization the church took measures looking to the erection of a house of worship. Mr. E. W. Frazee, of Milton, offered to donate the ground necessary if the church would build at that point. His offer was at first accepted, and the foundations of a building forty-four by sixty-four feet were laid. Judicious brethren, however, thought it would be wiser to select a more central position for their church edifice, and the advice of neighboring pastors was sought; among them was Rev. G. S. Webb, whose judgment had a controlling influence with the church, and led them to relinquish the lots they had accepted, and purchase others centrally situated in Lower Rahway. Here a plain but commodious building of the dimensions before named was erected, which for forty years continued to be their church home. This change of location did much, under God, to determine the question of their success, as the site originally selected has since been offered to and successively occupied by churches of two other denominations, and by each in turn has been deserted, the vicinity having become a neglected suburb of the city, while that finally chosen is in its more attractive portion, so that in this, as in every after crisis of the history of this church, the guiding hand of God was visible.

The church now felt the need of a pastor, and extended a call to Rev. Mansfield Barlow, who accepted and entered on his duties July 15, 1834. Favored now with a spiritual home, and aided by the counsels and ministry of Brother Barlow, the little band moved steadily on, and if sometimes made to feel the unpopularity of their distinctive tenets they were amply recompensed by tokens of the divine approval of their work. There were frequent accessions to the church by both baptism and letter, cheered by which they were led to "thank God and take courage." Brother Barlow's pastorate included but a single year, yet at its close the membership of the church had increased from fourteen at the time of its organization to forty; there had been eighteen baptized and fourteen added by letter.

An interval of nearly a year succeeded, during the later portion of which the pulpit was supplied by Simeon J. Drake, a licentiate of the First Baptist Church of New York, to whom in the spring of 1836 the church gave a unanimous call, which he accepted, and May 6th of the same year he was ordained as their pastor, Rev. William Parkinson preaching the sermon of ordination.

The period of Brother Drake's pastorate claims a special mention, as it was its formative stage through which the church was passing, and under his wise and earnest leadership it was moulded into forms of life and action which have been transmitted to the present time. His clear and intelligent views of gospel truth enabled him to solidly lay those foundation principles on which the superstructure of church life was to be built, and each succeeding pastor has had occasion to feel that of Mr. Darke it might be said what Paul declared of himself: "According to the grace of God given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation and another buildeth thereon." To the influence of his instructions may be attributed in part the tenacity with which the church has "held fast to the form of sound words" in which the fathers formulated their faith. It was ever his aim to lay, as the sole foundation of the sinner's hope, the finished work of Christ, and he was equally careful not to build on it the "wood, hay, and stubble" of an unconverted church membership. The New Jersey State Convention had now taken the church under its fostering care, and by the timely aid it rendered greatly encouraged and assisted the pastor and his people. For nearly four years Brother Drake continued with the church, during which time it gained largely in its influence on the community, and exactly doubled in membership. In July, 1839, he resigned to accept a call to the First Baptist Church, Plainfield, to which the remaining twenty-seven years of his earnest life were devoted, when, having finished his work, he entered into rest, leaving precious memories in each of the two churches to which the whole of his ministerial life had been given. There were added during his pastorate by baptism forty-four, and by letter twenty-two; the total membership increased from forty to eighty.

For the ten following months, during which the church was seeking for a pastor, the pulpit was supplied chiefly by Rev. Walter Gillette; then pastor of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church at Piscataway, who, in April, 1840, introduced to the church his brother, D. H. Gillette, a youthful licentiate then about completing his studies at Hamilton. He came among them with the early spring flowers, and was at once welcomed by the church as one sent in answer to their prayers. The gentleness of his manners, the kindness of his disposition, and his unaffected piety secured for him the affection of the entire church, who, May 8, 1840, extended him a cordial invitation to the vacant pastorate. This call he accepted, and on the 29th of July following was ordained as pastor of the church, Rev. A. D. Gillette, of Philadelphia, preaching the sermon on that occasion. During the two years which followed the congregation was largely increased by accessions from other denominations, while the church grew by constant accessions to its membership. After his first year with them the church ceased to ask aid of the Convention, and during the remainder of his pastorate they succeeded in removing about half of the heavy debt which at his coming rested on the church property, besides expending several hundred dollars in improving the appearance and accommodations of the house. It was in the midst of this usefulness that Brother Gillette was struck down by the insidious disease which, a few years later, consigned him to an early grave. The first severe attack was in December, 1840, and prostrated him for a number of weeks, during which the pulpit was again supplied by his brother Walter. Recovering from that he resumed the duties of the pastorate, and continued to labor steadily and with gratifying results until January, 1842, when his cough became alarming, and the church gave him leave of absence for the remainder of the winter, that in a milder climate he might seek the restoration of his health. On his return in the spring he felt constrained to resign the charge of church, and after two brief pastorates, one in Charlottesville, Va., and a briefer one at Mobile, Ala., he was called to his rest on high.

The accessions to the church during the pastorate of Brother Gilette were: by baptism, thirty-four; by letter, eleven; by restoration, one. The total membership increased from eighty to one hundred.

After an interval of two months, Rev. Joseph B. Breed was called as pastor, who entered on his work in Rahway June 1, 1842. This, though with a single exception the shortest of the pastorates, is memorable in the history of the church as having been marked by a revival exceeding in power anything previously experienced in that region of country. The years 1842 and 1843 were in all this part of the State eminently years of revivals, and the Rahway Church shared largely in the general blessing. During the winter of 1842-43 the membership more than doubled, one hundred and ten being added by baptism. Thus nearly the whole period of Brother Breed's pastorate was crowded with work peculiar to such a time of ingathering, and with such abounding mercies conferred on the church and crowning its pastor's labors, it would be but rational to suppose that a sure foundation had been laid for a loving and lasting union.

Yet here it proved, as it has often elsewhere, that prosperity is at times the fire in which God tries his people. While the work was yet in progress, and it seemed as if the church with recruited ranks was entering on a higher plane of influence and usefulness, difficulties and divisions arose so serious as in the judgment of the pastor to render it expedient that he should retire from the field, and on the 29th of January he handed in his resignation. His determination was greatly regretted by the many whom he had so recently baptized, and resulted, on his subsequently leaving, in heart-burnings and alienations, by which the Spirit of God was grieved away and great injury done to the young converts thus left like sheep without a shepherd; a few withdrew from the church, and some were scattered among other denominations.

It was a period of severe trial to the older members of the church; for months they sought earnestly for a pastor on whom all could unite, but the personal antagonisms which had sprung up prevented any approach to unanimity.

In May, 1843, Brother William Rollinson, then a young licentiate of the First Baptist Church, New York, was invited to supply the pulpit for one Sabbath, the services of which day resulted in their offering to him a unanimous call to the pastorate of the church. He had just engaged himself to the Jersey City Baptist Church for the ensuing six months, and declined to ask release from that engagement, when the church, on June 4th, voted to renew their call, the same to take effect at the expiration of his prior engagement. This call he accepted, and on the 28th of November was ordained as pastor of the church. Rev. Spencer H. Cone preaching the sermon.

Their disappointment in not immediately securing the services of the new pastor was overruled for good, as in the six months which intervened the previous difficulties slowly subsided, and in the united welcome they gave the young pastor on his settling with them, all former variances were forgotten. From first to last, during a pastorate of six years, Brother Rollinson received the hearty co-operation of the church. The new material brought in during the great revival needed moulding, instructing, and cementing, together with the usual amount of sifting the chaff from the wheat. In this important work the then inexperienced pastor found efficient helpers in the older members who had been trained under such men as Parkinson, Lathrop, Webb, Dodge, and Drake. The church co-operated in all the benevolent enterprises of the denomination more fully than at any previous period, and at home it enjoyed a steady growth in influence and ability.

The debt on the church edifice was entirely cancelled, chiefly through a bequest from Sister Ann Compton. Lots were purchased opposite the meeting-house, and a chapel for the Sunday-school and purposes of social worship was erected, all services having previously been held in the main building. In the autumn of 1849, Brother Rollinson feeling his heart drawn to the great West, accepted an appointment from the American Baptist Home Mission Society to labor as their missionary in Racine, Wis., and November 1st of that year he resigned his charge of the Rahway Church.

During this pastorate twenty-three were received by baptism, thirty-five by letter, and one restored; at its close the total membership was one hundred and sixty-one.

During the winter the church remained without a pastor, but early in the spring their minds centred on Rev. William H. Wines, to whom, March 22, 1850, they gave their unanimous call. He entered on the pastorate June 1st, and continued with the church nearly three years. During that period the accessions were of a character to add largely to the social influence and spiritual power of the church, while the conscientious preparation made by Brother Wines for his pulpit duties and the high estimate everywhere entertained of his personal character still further strengthened the position of the church in the community. But, like some previous pastors, this one had to contend with inconveniences arising from an insufficient support, which though they did not affect his usefulness nor lessen his fidelity to the church, hampered him in his work, and finally led to his retirement from the field, April 1, 1853, when he resigned to take charge of the Tarrytown Church, bearing with him the respect and affection of the church he left.

During his stay at Rahway there were added to the church by baptism thirty-three, by letter twenty-five, restored one; the total membership was one hundred and fifty-four.

The following month the church unanimously called Rev. William B. Tolan, then of Morristown, who accepted and began his work at Rahway June 19, 1853. The new pastor entered on his labors with an earnestness which gave promise of great usefulness. Prompt measures were adopted to cancel a floating indebtedness which troubled the church, the register was revised, delinquents were sought out, and determined endeavors were made to bring the church up to the scriptural standard of life. Among an admirable series of resolutions adopted at that time was the following, which is given in hope of calling attention to a prevalent neglect of church discipline:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of any member changing his place of residence into the vicinity of a sister church, with the intention of remaining, to take a letter of dismission to said church; and any member so removing who shall for the space of six months thereafter neglect to call for such a letter shall be considered a proper subject for discipline, or for exclusion, at the discretion of the church."

The social qualities of Brother Tolan secured him many warm personal friends, and in his labors he was cordially sustained by a large majority of the church. Additions to the membership were frequent, and the prospects of the church were never, up to that time, so favorable as they appeared at the close of the second year of this pastorate.

Again, however, the church was called to pass through a period of trial. Divisions, the responsibility for which can be determined only by God, resulted in the resignation of the pastor, Dec. 18, 1855. After vainly seeking to harmonize among themselves the differences which had sprung up it was decided to seek advice from sister churches in the neighborhood, and May 2, 1856, a council was called from the Plainfield, Newark, Somerville, Scotch Plains, and New Brunswick Churches. This council met at Rahway on the 23d of the same month, and succeeded by their judicious and impartial advice in restoring to the church that peace which for the last thirteen years has continued unbroken.

During the pastorate of Brother Tolan there were received into the church by baptism seventy-three, by letter thirty-three; the total membership increased from one hundred and fifty-four to one hundred and ninety-two.

The same week that the above-mentioned council was called, a former pastor of the church, Rev. William Rollinson, landed in New York on his return from California, having spent the six years of his absence from them in labors at the West. The minds of the church at once turned to him, and on the day the council met the church being then assembled gave him a unanimous call to resume the pastoral relation. After a few weeks of deliberation the call was accepted, and July 1, 1856, Brother Rollinson entered on a pastorate which continued for the eight and a half years that followed. The house of worship was at once remodeled and improved at a cost of two thousand dollars, and with restored union in their ranks the church engaged with fresh ardor in the service of their Lord.

The records show the seven years which followed to have been the most prosperous period in the history of the church. Brother Thomas W. Conway, afterwards ordained as pastor of the West Baptist Church, Staten Island, was employed by the church as missionary colporteur in the destitute neighborhoods about; two Sunday-schools were maintained, one a mission school, which became the nucleus of the Bethany, now Irving Street, Baptist Church; frequent prayer and other meetings held at out-stations extended the influence and usefulness of the church, while the work at the centre was not neglected. The results were shown in the increase of the church, which during this pastorate reached its greatest numerical strength.

In the midst of their prosperity the late civil war occurred. The extensive manufactories of Rahway, nearly all of which depended on Southern trade, were prostrated. In their letter to the Association in 1862 the church wrote, "The year to us has been one of trial; the business of many of our members has been for the time destroyed." It proved to be not only "for the time," but for all time; many in the church and more in the community were financially ruined. Still God's blessing rested on the united labors of pastor and people, and for another year they struggled on together, unwilling to sunder a relation which had strengthened with each passing year; but finally, compelled by the increasing financial pressure, in November, 1863, Brother Rollinson resigned, and subsequently accepted the position of post chaplain at Fort Schuyler, where he continued till after the war had closed.

During this pastorate seventy-three were baptized, fifty-eight added by letter, and two restored; the membership increased from one hundred and ninety-two to two hundred and thirty-five.

During two years, owing chiefly to the embarrassments of that stormy period of civil strife, the church remained without a pastor, yet the pulpit was regularly supplied, and the ordinary church life kept up. Sept. 10, 1865, a unanimous call was given to Rev. E. Everett Jones, by his acceptance of which the church was again blessed with an under-shepherd in whom all hearts were united. Brother Jones preferred that his ordination should take place in the Spring Garden Baptist Church, Philadelphia, where his membership was held, and the church appointed Deacons White and Crane to represent them at the council. After the ordination Brother Jones was installed as pastor of the Railway Church with appropriate services Oct. 5, 1865.

The young pastor entered with whole-hearted energy on the work before him, and under his leadership the church relieved itself of the debt which had accumulated during the two preceding years, and at the same time extended its facilities for prosecuting the work of the gospel. It was not long before God's Spirit revisited the church, and the baptismal waters were often stirred. As during the business disasters many had removed or had gone into the army without taking their letters, a revision of the church register was ordered, and the names of all of whom no satisfactory account could be had were dropped from the record.

Nov. 18, 1866, letters of dismission were granted to seventeen members to unite in the organization of a Second Baptist Church, who, with a few from other churches, were subsequently recognized as a Baptist Church, now the Irving Street Church, Rahway, connected with the Central New Jersey Association.

Brother Jones continued with the church, enjoying many tokens of the divine favor in his ministry, till Oct. 1, 1868, when he resigned to take charge of the Bridgeport Baptist Church, Pa., from which he subsequently returned to this State, and is now the esteemed pastor of the New Market Church in this Association. During his pastorate at Rahway there were added to the church by baptism thirty-six, by letter twenty-five, and by restoration two; total membership at its close, one hundred and thirty-nine.

After an interval of sixteen months a call was extended to Rev. C. G. Gurr, then pastor of Samptown, which he accepted, and at once assumed the duties of the position. The records of the church during this pastorate are too meagre to give much information as to its condition. There appear to have been no baptisms, and several troublesome cases of discipline, arising from a departure from the faith on the part of certain members, occupy most of the recorded proceedings. April 29, 1870, Brother Gurr resigned for the purpose of visiting Great Britain. The church requested him to remain with them, but he persisting in his determination, on the 31st of July his resignation was accepted. During this pastorate fourteen were added to the church by letter; the membership at its close numbered one hundred and thirty-six.

In January of the following year the church called Rev. E. A. Wheeler, who in response to their call commenced his labors Feb. 1, 1871. Soon a revived interest in spiritual things was experienced, followed by accessions to the church through baptism; these continued at brief intervals through the year, greatly encouraging the church.

Brother Wheeler's social disposition led him to devote his time largely to purely pastoral duties; he was a frequent visitor in the homes of his people, and he gathered a return in their warm personal regard, the loss, if any, being in the lessened power of the pulpit. Still the church continued prosperous till, in the winter of 1873, the pastor's health became so impaired by a severe bronchial difficulty as to render it necessary for him to temporarily suspend his duties. The church cordially assented to his request for a leave of absence for three months, at the same time providing the means to enable him to spend the time in the milder climate of Florida.

Brother Wheeler's earnest efforts during the second year of his pastorate were given to secure a new church edifice, the original building, erected more than forty years before, having become so worn and in many respects uncomfortable that both church and pastor felt it essential to their progress that better accommodations should be provided. Money was raised, and a lot of ground in what was deemed an eligible position was purchased, on which $1300 was paid, but the great commercial crisis which shortly followed, prostrating the business of the entire country, together with the failure of their pastor's health, discouraged the church from proceeding.

In the spring of 1874 Brother Wheeler returned to Rahway with recruited health, and for a few months continued with the church, when he offered his resignation, to take effect August 1st. During his pastorate thirty-five were baptized, thirty-seven received by letter, and four restored. The membership increased from one hundred and thirty-six to one hundred and seventy.

From Aug. 1, 1874, till June 1, 1875, the church was without a pastor, though much of the time the pulpit was regularly supplied by Rev. A. C. Lyon, whose kind spirit and wise counsels did much to cheer and animate the church under the difficulties occasioned by the severe pressure of the times and the discouragements of their position. As the Irving Street Church was affected similarly by the difficulties common at that period, there was in both churches a feeling that it might be wise to consolidate the two interests in a single organization, and a proposal of that nature was made, committees of conference were appointed by the two churches, who united on a plan of union, but which finally failed between the churches owing to their inability to agree in some details of the plan proposed.

At this juncture the church once more recalled their old pastor, Rev. William Rollinson, at that time settled in Newark, pledging their earnest co-operation in all measures necessary to secure the prosperity of the church. The call was accepted, and before the pastor had entered on his work among them a subscription of $5000, which was subsequently nearly doubled, was made towards the erection of a new house of worship.

The following winter the church shared in a powerful revival of religion which extended to all the evangelical churches of the city. In the autumn of 1876 work was commenced on the new building, which by the close of the year was sufficiently advanced to allow the church to hold its services in the lecture-room, and in June following the completed house was dedicated. It is a handsome structure of brick, ninety-one by fifty-two feet in extreme outside dimensions, tastefully finished, and complete in all its appointments, and will long remain a monument of the zeal and devotion displayed by the church during the severest pressure of the trying period in which it was erected.

Of the period of this pastorate, which still continues, it is sufficient to add that the church has worked in perfect harmony with its pastor and with each other, and that they look hopefully towards a future which they regard as being bright with promise, yet leaving all, sunshine or shadow, to the control of Him whose faithfulness has never failed them. During this last pastorate there have been baptized twenty-one, added by letter thirty-eight, and by restoration one. The membership has increased from one hundred and seventy to one hundred and ninety. Since then the membership has increased to two hundred and ten.

Summary.—During the entire history of the church there have been baptized 511; received by letter, 315; restored, 12; making the total additions 830. There have been dismissed 328; died, 102; excluded, 86; making a total of 516. The number unaccounted for are those who, from unexplained absence, have been "dropped" at the different revisions of the church register.

The deacons of the church have been B. B. Moore, William S. Pangborn, S. E. Gibbs, Arbor Hoff, M. Decker, D. B. Coles, E. M. Noe, R. M. Crane, J. H. Wyckoff, E. Richardson, A. White, J. Pierson, L. Hoff, A. W. Williams, Eli Pierce, A. C. Watson, L. J. Runyon, D. F. Coles, G. Marsh, Henry Watson, Joel Osborn.

The clerks of the church have been William Ross, R. B. Moore, A. E. Brown, H. Holton, E. Noe, M. Decker, I. M. Clark, William Runyon, D. B. Coles, J. Pierson, W. W. Timmons, A. A. Rice, L. Hoff, D. F. Coles, James A. Wilson, and George White.

The following persons have been licensed to preach the gospel: B. C. Morse, J. C. Brittell, D. T. Morrell, Ferris Scott, David Haynes, and J. T. Tingley.

The first board of trustees consisted of Charles Cox, Lewis Drake, M.D., Joel Clarkson, E. W. Frazee, William Marsh, and Thomas Ball. The present board is composed of J. L. Brown, William Mershon, Joel Osborn, D. F. Coles, T. Thorn, J. A. Wilson, and A. P. Barber.

Second Methodist Episcopal Church.—In the spring of 1849 thirty-two members were dismissed from the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Rahway for the purpose of forming a second church in the lower part of the city. The new organization took the corporate name of "The Second M. E. Church of Rahway, N. J." The society enjoyed the gratuitous services of a number of ministers, local and itinerant, until the presiding elder, Rev. Mr. Winner, appointed as a regular supply Rev. Frank Bottome, who had a short time previously arrived from England, and who has since attained distinction as a member of the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Services were regularly held by the new society in the old Athenian Hall, since burned down, which stood on Main Street near the site of the Second Presbyterian Church. About seventy persons were added to the church during the first year under the labors of the young pastor, and such was the interest manifested that a subscription was started for the erection of a church building by William M. Esler (still living and a member of the church), Henry Miller, and Daniel Wood, trustees.

At the session of the New Jersey Conference of 1850, Rev. A. L. Brice was appointed to the charge and remained two years. During his first year the church edifice was built upon the corner of Milton and Railroad Avenues and Broad Street. It is of brick and cost about six thousand dollars, a sum which at that day meant no small sacrifice and faith on the part of the congregation. During Mr. Brice's second year the church was visited by an earnest revival.

In 1852, Rev. Fletcher Lummis was appointed pastor. He remained but one year. Although a Southerner by birth, he was a pronounced anti-slavery man and an uncompromising advocate of temperance. Rev. Henry M. Brown was appointed as his successor in 1853 and remained two years, his pastorate being memorable for one of the greatest revivals in the history of the church. He was succeeded by Rev. William E. Perry in 1855, and in 1856 Rev. R. S. Arndt became the pastor. During his second year (1857) the New Jersey Conference was divided into the New Jersey and Newark Conferences, the former embracing all that portion of the State south of the Raritan River, and bounded on the northwest by Lambertville on the Delaware River, and the latter all the northern part of New Jersey, with small portions of Pennsylvania and New York States.

In 1858–59, Rev. John Scarlett was pastor of the church, and during his ministry the parsonage adjoining the church on Broad Street was built at a cost of about three thousand dollars. In 1860–61, Rev. Thomas Walters was appointed to the charge. He was succeeded in 1862–63 by Rev. B. O. Parvin, during the last year of whose ministry much religious interest was manifested. Mr. Parvin is still a resident of Rahway. He was succeeded in the pastorate in 1864 by Rev. S. H. Opdyke. J. Wesley Young became pastor in 1865, and remained two years. Much religious interest was felt both in the church and Sunday-school, and special efforts were made in behalf of missions.

Rev. John S. Porter, D.D., was the pastor in 1867, '68, and '69, the pastoral term having been extended to three years as its maximum. During Mr. Porter's pastorate the entrance to the church was changed.

Originally the entrance was made from what is now the basement, which is now several feet below the sidewalk, but was then several feet above it. But the improvements by the railroad company from year to year, and the great improvements in grading, etc., by the corporation necessitated the change of entrance. The present slightly front was constructed, the interior was remodeled and frescoed, and the lecture-room beautified. At the reopening Bishop James presided in the morning, and Rev. William Corbitt in the evening.

In 1870, Rev. B. O. Parvin entered upon his second pastorate of the church. Unusual religious interest was manifested during a portion of his third year (1872). During several months of this year also the pastor was not able to conduct religious services, and was assisted by George W. Smith, then of the Drew Theological Seminary, but now a member of the Newark Conference.

Under Rev. R. B. Lockwood, pastor in 1873, an extensive revival prevailed and many were added to the church. During the three years, 1874, '75, and '76, of Rev. T. H. Landon's pastorate "the interest of the church was well sustained and meetings profitable." In 1877, Rev. J. W. Seran was appointed pastor; he remained two years, and was succeeded by Rev. D. Halleron, 1879, '80, and '81. During these years an effort has been made to discharge the debt upon the church, and considerable progress has been made in that direction, although it has not been entirely liquidated. One of the methods adopted has been a course of public lectures, which has yielded a fair profit to the society.

St. Paul's Episcopal Church.—This parish was organized in the year 1843, and the beautiful brick edifice erected on corner of Irving and Elm Streets. They have also a commodious chapel and rectory belonging to the church. The valuation of the property is estimated about $30,000; sittings, 600; membership, 160. The following have been the rectors: Revs. A. E. Ford, 1843; F. Ogilbey, 1844; Dr. Edmund W. Peet, 1844-55; Horace Hills, 1857; J. E. Homans, 1861-61; R. M. Abercrombie, 1863-74; R. G. Bueler, a few months; William H. Van Antwerp, 1874-81; Levi W. Norton, A.M., 1882. Senior Warden, Lewis Drake, M.D.; Junior Warden, John M. Tuffs.¹

Church of the Holy Comforter.—This Episcopal parish was organized in the year 1873. A few members residing in the upper part of Rahway, desiring to have services regularly, built a neat edifice, naming it the Church of the Holy Comforter, on the corner of St. George's Avenue and Seminary Street. The parish is large, including Clark township, and the prospect in a few years of a large congregation. Communicants, thirty; sittings, two hundred and fifty. Their first pastor was Rev. Mr. Broadwell, who remained a few months. The present pastor, Rev. Evelyn Bartow, 1882.

Christ's Reformed Episcopal Church.—This church was incorporated in 1875 by a few of the members withdrawing from St. Paul's Church. They have a neat edifice valued at $3500, with a membership of 50. The wardens are George W. Savage and Jonathan E. Hill. The following have been their pastors: Revs. Mason Gallagher, 1875; Edward Wilson, 1876; George Howel, 1877; J. S. Harrison, 1880.

St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church was organized in 1858. They first worshiped in a hall until their frame edifice was erected. It cost some $7000, with 175 pews, capable of holding 600 persons. It is situated in the centre of the city, upon Central Avenue and Campbell Street. The following have been the pastors: Revs. Father McCarthy, 1858-60; Father Quin; Father Smith, D.D., 1873; and the present priest, Rev. Father McCosker, 1880.

Bethel Methodist Church, situated on Central Avenue, was built by colored Methodists in 1862. Their society is small, with a membership of about fifty. Revs. Joseph Palard, J. J. Tinman, — Howe, John Kamish, — Mills, and others, have been the pastors.

Zion Methodist Church was built for the colored people in 1871. They have a membership of twenty. Their edifice, which is neat, is located on Main Street. The Rev. Thomas Kelsey and Samuel J. Berry have been the ministers. There is a prospect of the two churches being united as one society.

Free Methodist Church.—This church was established about the year 1874. The Rev. Mr. Roberts, John T. Hanland, and others have supplied this church with occasional preaching. The membership is small. The church, which is of brick, was formerly used by the Universalist society, which has become extinct; sittings, two hundred and fifty; value of building, three thousand five hundred dollars.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Cemeteries.—The oldest memorial stone in Rahway is that in the cemetery of the Presbyterian Church on St. George's Avenue, which bears the following inscription:

"IN THE YEAR 1724

DEPARTED THIS LIFE, BEING FORTY-NINE."

A large number of memorial stones of early date show that the remains of many members of the Frazee family have been interred here. It is known that the Frazee family were among the original proprietors of land on the Rahway River in this vicinity. It is probable that they followed the example of many of the early settlers in this community in burying their dead on their own estate. As the interment of the remains of John Frazee occurred eighteen years before the building of the church in 1742, the presumption is that this was the Frazee family burying-ground before it became the principal burying-place of the neighborhood. The Frazee family, in its several branches, may have donated the same and adjoining space to the Presbyterian society when about to build, or the land was purchased from the family by the society for church and burial purposes.

There have been at least nine different purchases of land by the church added to the original plot, making an area, according to the city records, of thirteen and one-tenth acres. The names of persons making deeds to the trustees for these additions, with dates of indenture and record, are as follows:

Oct. 9, 1824. John Y. Vantuyll made a deed to the trustees of the church for one acre of land he had purchased of Dr. David S. Craig and Joseph Shotwell, executors of the estate of John Anderson, deceased, for $200. Deed recorded Jan. 11, 1832, in Book I. 3 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 495-96.

July 17, 1844. Samuel Oliver and wife made a deed for two acres and forty-four one-hundredths for $366.50. Deed recorded May 2, 1845, in Book H. 6 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 24-25.

July 14, 1847. Samuel Oliver and wife made a deed for one acre and sixty-five hundredths for $300. Deed recorded July 23, 1847, in Book Q. 6 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 529-30.

Feb. 26, 1848. Archer Miller and wife made a deed for lots Nos. 27 and 28, as described on map made for John High, Jr., and George H. Webb, each 25 feet front by 120 feet deep, for $170. Deed recorded Feb. 26, 1848, in Book U. 6 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 39-40.

June 2, 1853. Washington B. Oliver, executor for the estate of Samuel Oliver, deceased, made a deed to the trustees for three acres for $600. Deed recorded Oct. 6, 1853, in Book R. 8 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 344-45.

March 31, 1854. Randolph De Camp and wife for lot No. 245, 25 by 120 feet, on High and Webb map, for $50. Deed recorded April 18, 1854, in Book X. 8 of Deeds, pages 406-8.

Sept. 15, 1855. Moses T. Crane and wife made a deed for lot No. 80, 25 by 150 feet, on High and Webb map, for $89. Deed recorded Sept. 5, 1855, in Book 213 of Deeds for Essex County, pages 481-83.

Sept. 1, 1862. Archer Miller and wife made a deed for lots Nos. 249 and 251 on High and Webb map, for $800. Deed recorded in clerk's office of Union County, N. J., Sept. 23, 1862, in Book 10 of Deeds, pages 414-15.

The land on which the present church and parsonage are built, together with land continuing north to the Rahway River, making in all seventeen acres, was purchased Nov. 18, 1830, from John Morris by Samuel Oliver and Job Squier for $1800, and by them sold to the trustees of the church for the same they gave for it. Deed made by John Morris, recorded Dec. 3, 1830, in Book E. 3 of Deeds for the county of Essex, pages 460-61.

It seems to have been a question of the past as to whether this place of burial could not be more efficiently managed by private individuals or corporate company than by the trustees of the church. In 1836 certain parties purchased several acres of land contiguous to the church burial-ground on the west, and offered lots in the same for sale. This enterprise was not successful, and the land reverted to Samuel Oliver, from whom it had been purchased. This tract with the several lots that had been sold in it was subsequently purchased by the trustees. At a special parish meeting held April 25, 1860, "the trustees were authorized to dispose of all their rights in the cemetery belonging to the church to any company who will purchase the same and continue to use it as a cemetery, and bind themselves to expend in beautifying and improving it all the profits derived from the sales of lots for interment." This overture for negotiations, after having been open for four years, was rescinded at a parish meeting April 13, 1864.

During the year 1876 a neat cottage, constructed of material taken from the side galleries removed from the church, was erected in the cemetery, containing an office and waiting-room, also a room for storing all the implements of the sexton. In April, 1866, it was resolved to build the receiving-vault located on the new ground, facing the entrance from High Street.

THE ABRAHAM CLARK MONUMENT.—This cemetery has a national sanctity in that it contains the mortal remains of Abraham Clark, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Passing into the cemetery through the entrance from St. George's Avenue, about forty yards from the gate, then thirty feet to the left, there is an upright brown sandstone, with the following inscription:

"A. C.
In memory of ABRAHAM CLARK, Esq. who died
Sept. 15th, 1794.
In the 69 year of his age.
Firm and decided as a patriot, zealous and faithful as a servant of the public;
he loved his country and adhered to her in the darkest hour of her struggles against oppression."

In a southwesterly direction from the grave designated by this memorial stone, where the remains of Abraham Clark still repose, is the monument erected to his memory by the citizens of Rahway in 1848. It is a plain obelisk twenty-two feet high. The shaft on its east side near the top, encircled with a wreath of olive and oak, bears the simple word "Clark." Commencing with the east face of the base supporting the shaft, thence passing around to the north, we have the following inscriptions:

"ABRAHAM CLARK, born at Rahway
15th Feb, 1726. died
15th Sept. 1794.
In private life a Christian, exemplary, consistent, zealous.

In public life
a Statesman and patriot.
In 1775 a member of the First Provincial Congress.
In 1776 one of the Committee of Public Safety.
A delegate to the Continental Congress, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence.
Erected by the citizens of Rahway,
4th July, 1848."

The dedication of this monument to its memorial purpose on July 4, 1848, was characterized by a spontaneous outpouring of the people of Rahway and neighboring towns. Social, beneficiary, and military organizations of Rahway, New Brunswick, Elizabeth, and Newark with bands of music made a stirring and animated scene for Rahway as they marched under the direction of the officers of the day from the depot to the First Presbyterian Church, where the formal exercises were held. The capacity of the church was too limited for this occasion. When the audience-room was filled the services were formally commenced by Rev. J. J. Janeway, D.D., of New Brunswick, pronouncing the invocation. Rev. Mr. Ayres, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, read the Declaration of Independence. Hon. William B. Reed, of Philadelphia, was the orator of the day. This discourse is spoken of as possessing rare beauty and pertinence, clothed in a style of singular purity and strength. The leading thought of the orator was "The contrast between European revolutions and the American Revolution." Speaking particularly of Abraham Clark, he in substance said,—

"The peculiarity of his career—and it is one well worthy of meditation—is that he was a member of the old Congress from first to last, from the day that it asserted a substantive existence as the representative of an independent nation till it relinquished its trust on the formation of the Federal Constitution. Of the fifty-one members of the Congress of 1776 he alone survived in office in 1783, and rarely, so far as can be ascertained from the printed journal, was he absent from his post."¹

At the close of the oration the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Lewis Bond, of Plainfield, when the procession was reformed and proceeded to the cemetery, where the dedicatory address was made by the Rev. Charles K. Imbrie. The words of dedication and the inspiration of the day were pointedly and beautifully expressed in the following words:

"In the name of the citizens of the republic, in your name, who have erected this structure (the citizens of this township), I dedicate this monument to the memory of Abraham Clark. I need not identify him. The signatures of the enduring record stand alone egraved in one consecrated tablet in the heart of every American freeman. Let that simple name, encircled by its wreath of olive and oak, designate the man, record his virtues, and proclaim the glory of the monument which is consecrated to his memory."

"Let this monument inspire you and your children with patriotism. Let it fire our hearts with a warmer devotion to our country and of gratitude to our God."

Among the quaint and admonitory inscriptions found upon some of the memorial stones we have the following specimen:

"MR. JOHN LAWRENCE,
"Who November 6th, first drew his breath,
And October 16th, 1766, yielded to death.
From London truly famed I came;
Was born in Stains, a place near by;
In Rahway at old age did die,
And here entombed in earth must lie
Till Christ ye dead call from on high."

HAZELWOOD CEMETERY is situated just west of the limits of the city of Rahway, partly in Union and partly in Middlesex County. It comprises an area of about forty acres, very tastefully laid out by the original designer, William Saunders.

The Hazelwood Cemetery Association was incorporated in 1859, under the general act for the incorporation of rural cemeteries, Thomas H. Shafer, Jonathan Woodruff, Dr. S. Abernethy, Eden Haydock, A. C. Watson, A. E. Brown, Dr. Lewis Drake, Jacob R. Shotwell, George W. Hall, A. Stoats Bounney, and others being the incorporators. The articles of association were filed Oct. 1, 1859, and upon the organization of the association the following officers were chosen: Dr. L. Drake, president; Joseph T. Crowell, vice-president; Joel Wilson, secretary and treasurer; Dr. L. Drake, Thomas H. Shafer, John H. Lufberry, George Hartshorne, Joseph Gatchell, Joseph S. Smith, Joseph T. Crowell, H. H. Bowne, J. R. Shotwell, A. C. Watson, George W. Savage, Isaac Osborn, trustees; Patrick Clark, surveyor; William Kneiley, superintendent.

Dr. Drake still holds the office of president (1882). Joseph T. Crowell remained vice-president until 1880, when he was succeeded by Hon. Benjamin A. Vail. Mr. Woodruff, who was first elected secretary and treasurer, resigned at the next meeting, and his place was filled by George F. Webb, who served until 1861. Since then the secretaries and treasurers have been as follows: Joel Wilson, elected Dec. 30, 1860, and served from 1861 to 1875; John Bowne, elected Nov. 30, 1875, and served till Nov. 23, 1876, when the present secretary and treasurer, Ross Vanderhoven, was elected. The present surveyor is Patrick Clark. Kyren Tierney, superintendent.

The first interment was made in Hazelwood Cemetery Jan. 18, 1860. Up to Oct. 31, 1881, the number of burials had been eleven hundred and fifteen. The grounds contain some very fine and costly monuments, several of which have been erected quite recently.

We append the following summary of facts regarding the purchase of lots, condensed from the act of incorporation :

That purchasers of lots acquire not merely the privilege of burial, but also the fee simple of the ground which they purchase ;

That they are the sole proprietors of the cemetery ;

That by their vote in the election of trustees they control the government of the institution ;

That, as all the receipts of the institution must be expended in the purchase, improvement, and preservation of the grounds, no speculative interest can conflict with the wishes of lot-owners respecting its management ;

That, as all the resources will be thus appropriated, either immediately or in the ultimate formation of a fund, the interest of which shall be annually appropriated as required, ample provision is made for the perpetual embellishment and preservation of the grounds ;

That, as the ground is exempt from public taxes and from liability for debt, and is sold in lots which are not subject to assessment or annual charge, the proprietors can never be forcibly deprived of their ground.

Purchasers may choose from all unselected ground not reserved for public monuments or other special uses. Mounds and hills, and places requiring peculiar improvements, will be sold, however, only in the forms and dimensions suggested by the agents of the institution.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN R. AYERS.

His grandfather, David Ayers, with two brothers, emigrated from Scotland about the middle of the eighteenth century, and settled at Scotch Plains, now Union County, N. J. All three served in the Revolutionary war. One of the three subsequently settled at Metuchen, but David went over the mountain and settled at Liberty Corners, Somerset Co., where he followed farming the rest of his life. He became influential in that county, was elected judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and was on his way to court when, at about the age of eighty-five, in 1815, he was accidentally killed by the upsetting of his carriage.

William, son of Judge David Ayers, was a farmer during his active business life at Basking Ridge, in the same county, and there died in 1864, aged eighty-seven. His wife was Elsey Burgey, who died in 1857, aged eighty, and who bore him the following children who grew to maturity: Catherine, wife of Pierson Collyer; Eliza, died at eighteen years of age; John R., subject of this sketch; Thomas was a master-mason, and lived and died in Rahway; David lived and died in Newark, where he kept a hotel; Samuel is an artesian well-driver and resides in Newark; and Abner Pierson, a carpenter and builder, resides in Rahway.

John R. Ayers started a business life at the age of seventeen as an apprentice under Moses Dodd, of Newark, to learn the carpenter's trade. Becoming master of his trade upon reaching his majority, he came to Rahway, and superintended for his first contract the building of the First Presbyterian Church edifice of that place, which he completed in 1832, and which subsequently he rebuilt, donating his time to the church. In 1833 he formed a partnership with Samuel Williams as contractors and builders, which continued for thirteen years, when the firm bought out the interest of Joseph O. Lufbery in the saw-mill and lumber business established by him in 1827, and formed a partnership with his brother, John H. Lufbery, in the same business, under the firm-name of Ayers, Williams & Lufbery. Mr. Ayers has been connected with this interest since, and the firm for several years has been Ayers & Lufbery.

Mr. Ayers began to take quite an active part in politics during the election of Andrew Jackson for President, and for him cast his first vote. In the fall of 1857 Mr. Ayers was elected to the State Senate from Union County, being the first State senator from the county after its erection, and served for the years 1858, 1859, and 1860.

During his public life he was an intimate friend of ex-Governor Haines, Judge Campbell, and other influential men of the State, and as a member of the committee on corporations reported the bill favoring the construction of the New Jersey Railroad from Elizabeth across Newark Bay to Communipaw.

His wife, Eveline, who died April 15, 1879, was a daughter of Isaac Stansbury, Esq., who for many years was a justice of the peace in Rahway. His children are William, Isaac, John, Albert (inventor of a patent sash-holder), and Ira.

WILLIAM H. FLATT.

James Flatt, the grandfather of William H. Flatt, emigrated from Scotland in his youth, and was known as "Captain" Flatt, because of his occupation, which he followed for many years. He was proprietor of a line of vessels plying on the Raritan River between New Brunswick and New York.

After the introduction of vessels propelled by steam, Capt. Flatt retired from the transportation business, bought farming lands at Metuchen, N. J., and tilled the same during the remainder of his life. He was a man of commanding presence and sterling integrity.

Phineas, son of Capt. Flatt, married a Miss Mundy, of Metuchen. Phineas was a wheelwright by trade, lived in Rahway many years, and died at Westfield, N. J., in 1879. His first wife died, leaving a family of six children, all of whom died young except William H. Flatt, the subject of this sketch, who was born at New Durham, N. J., Aug. 25, 1822. He had but limited opportunities for obtaining an education, but he improved the time allowed him during his residence with his grandfather at Metuchen, and was also able to attend school for a while in Rahway. The school-house which he attended was on the ground where he afterwards erected a large carriage manufactory. Thus early in his youth, with a fair common-school education, he commenced the conflict of life. He had nothing but his own willing hands and resolute heart in which to trust, but, like many other American boys, he determined to dare and to do.

In the carriage-factory of Milan Ross, of Rahway, he learned the trade of body-making, and continued with Mr. Ross until he was able to make and sell carriage-bodies on his own account.

In 1846, Mr. Flatt established a factory for making carriages, which proved successful, and resulted in his erecting the large building now occupied by Taylor & Bloodgood in 1882, and also the large and commodious brick buildings now (1882) used by D. B. Dunham. These two buildings, the first used as a factory and the second as a repository, enabled Mr. Flatt to do an extensive business, and he ranked among the largest carriage manufacturers in the State. By the establishment of repositories in the South and in New York City his name became generally known throughout the Southern States. He employed about three hundred workmen during many years and up to the breaking out of the war with the South, when, like all other Southern dealers, he lost heavily, and his business was naturally reduced. In 1870 he leased his factory to Miller Bros., and his repository to D. B. Dunham, but during this time he had erected several buildings, among them the large brick structure on the corner of Irving and Cherry Streets.

Mr. Flatt contributed liberally to the public improvements of Rahway, and was always ready to help those who were trying to do for themselves. Although of a retiring disposition, he was esteemed and beloved. He was noted for maintaining an honest, sterling, Christian character, and from early manhood was a consistent member of the church; and at the time of his decease, Oct. 11, 1878, he was a member of the Second Presbyterian Church of Rahway.

Mr. Flatt married, Oct. 14, 1846, Caroline, daughter of Vincent and Thomazine (Lancefield) Keeler, of Canterbury, County Kent, England, whose parents came to America with a family of eight children, and settled in Woodbridge, N. J.

Mr. and Mrs. Flatt had four children, three daughters and one son.

HON. JOSEPH W. SAVAGE.

The Savage family has an illustrious ancestry on both the paternal and maternal side. The following is copied from Burke's Peerage, viz.:

J. W. Savoy

"The family of Savage is very ancient. Sir John Savage was engaged (with Edward I., king of England) at the memorable siege of Carlaverock, in Scotland, and there for his signal service was, with his brother Thomas, created knight baronet.

"Sir John Savage (ancestor of the Earl of Rivers) commanded the left wing of the Earl of Richmond's army at Bosworth Field, and was afterwards made Knight of the Garter by Henry VII., king of England.

"Thomas Savage, one of the descendants, went, in the year 1635 A.D. (with Sir Henry Vane and several persons of rank and family), to New England, where he became Speaker of the House of Representatives, representing Boston for eight years, being major of artillery, and in the earlier part of Philip's war was commander-in-chief of the forces."

Samuel Phillips Savage, one of his sons, was a native of Boston, presided at the meeting held in Boston, 1773, which decided that the tea should not be landed; he held various public offices, and was judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and died at a good old age about 1790.

Maj. Joseph Savage, of the Revolutionary army, was one of his sons, while Samuel A. Savage, father of the subject of this sketch, was a son of Maj. Savage.

"The Savages of Cheshire, in England, are mentioned by Wingfield Yorks Herald among the few distinguished houses that are by prescription right entitled to use supporters to their coat of arms. The supporters of this family are a falcon billed and a unicorn arg, as they now appear on the monument of Sir John Savage, of Rock Savage, in the same chapel, at the side of the old church at Macclesfield, County Chester. This Sir John Savage was grandfather of Thomas Lord Viscount Savage, and great-grandfather of John Savage, first Earl of Rivers.

"The Savage chapel at Macclesfield was erected by Thomas Savage, Bishop of Rochester in 1492, Bishop of London in 1497, and Archbishop of York in 1501, brother of John Savage, K.G., and nephew of Thomas Stanley, first Earl of Derby, and it was for many years the burial-place of the Savage family."—2d vol. Burke's Landed Gentry, Corrigenda, page 424.

His grandfather, Maj. Joseph Savage, resided in Berwick, Me., was an officer in the heavy artillery during the Revolutionary war, was stationed for a while at West Point, thence ordered to Savannah, Ga., to build a block fort, and commanded one portion of the heavy artillery at the battle of Yorktown. He was a man of fine physique, commanding appearance, and well fitted for an officer in the army, and an intimate friend of Gen. Washington. His sons were all seafaring men and commanded their vessels. Samuel A. Savage, father of our subject, born at West Point, Oct. 29, 1789, was a merchant at Highland Falls, near West Point, and in New York City during most of his active business life, and died in 1830. His mother, Latitia, daughter of Philip Webber, of New York, whose ancestors were among its original Dutch settlers from Amsterdam. Wolford Webber, born in Holland in 1604, came to New York in 1649. She was born Feb. 11, 1787, and died in March, 1879. Their children are Joseph W., subject of this sketch; Susan Maria, now Mrs. Freeman, of Rahway, N. J.; and George W., a resident of Rahway, who was president for some time of the Board of Fire Underwriters of New York, president of the International Insurance Company of New York, and one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas for Union County, N. J.

Joseph W. Savage was born in the city of New York, Aug. 5, 1812, and received a good English and classical education in the best private schools of the city. Naturally active and energetic, before reaching his majority he was a clerk for a ship-broker in Wall Street, and also a clerk in different dry-goods houses there. He had early in life taken an active part in local public matters, and while yet under age was a candidate on a general ticket for the Assembly, and defeated by only twelve votes. In 1833 he obtained from the State Legislature a charter for the National Fire Insurance Company, and for several years served as secretary and subsequently as its president. While connected with this company he was the first man to send out agents to establish branch offices and examine into the risks taken by the different agencies.

He was also president of the Eagle Life and Health Insurance Company of New Jersey for several years. Mr. Savage was elected one of the alms commissioners of New York about 1853, and in 1854 he was elected from the Twelfth Ward, on the Whig ticket, to the State Legislature, where his opposition to the use of the public school moneys for sectarian schools was felt by the advocates of that measure, and when, upon his own resolution, "Resolved, That our representatives in Congress be requested to vote for the purchase of Mount Vernon," he made the following speech in the House, that gave the influence of the New York Legislature to that measure before Congress:

"Mr. Savage, of New York, called up his resolution and said, He earnestly hoped that this resolution would be adopted by the House without a dissenting voice. The subject is one of deep interest to every man who first drew his breath on American soil. Sir, it was beautifully said of Washington that 'God made him childless that the nation might call him father.' Mount Vernon was his home, it is now his grave. How fitting then it is that we his children should be the owners of the homestead, and of our father's sepulchre. No stranger's money should buy it, and no stranger's hand should drive the plowshare over ashes sacred to every American. No mere individual is worthy to be the owner of a spot enriched with such hallowed memories. The mortal remains of the nation's idol should not be subject to the whim, caprice, or enmity of any man. These memorials are national and to the nation they should belong, and it is the duty of every citizen to guard them from violence and dishonor. Sir, no monument has ever been erected over the grave of Washington. He needs none but that which rises in majestic grandeur before the gaze of the world in the existence of this great republic, with its millions of people rejoicing in the light and liberty of a free government. While the stars and stripes, waving above every capital, shall symbolize our National Union, will any ask where is the monument to Washington? I believe, sir, that his name will prove more lasting than marble or brass. When every structure which fills love and gratitude may erect shall have crumbled to dust, the fame of our patriot father will still remain the theme of study and admiration.

"There has been but one Washington, and God is His goodness gave him to us. Let us cherish his dust and revere his memory. Let us together own his venerated mansion and tomb. Let the youth of our nation make pilgrimages to the sacred spot and slake the thirst of unhalloved ambition at the well where Washington was wont to draw, and when patriotism declines let the vestals of liberty rekindle the flame at the fireside of the nation's sire. Thus, sir, may we do much to keep alive through successive generations that patriotic fire which burns in the heart of every true American. Sir, no man can read the life of Washington without rising up from the task a better man; nor can a freeman step within the sacred precincts of Mount Vernon and not feel the power of those associations which environ him. The troubled sea of passion in his soul subsides, and he seems to hear a voice whispering to his spirit, 'Peace, be still, for Washington lies here.' Who could visit the farm of Washington and not experience a new thrill of patriotism, or who, without a new incentive to love his country, could ramble through that garden, stand in the hall where heroes of the Revolution were welcomed and refreshed, sit down in the library where Washington studied and meditated, and behold the chamber in which he slept and died?

"Sir, I am no prophet. But when from such sacred memories as these I turn to view the opposite picture the veil of futurity seems to be lifted. I will suppose that this opportunity is unimproved. That cherished inheritance which with characteristic patriotism the family of Washington now offer to their country is forfeited to parsimony. That family pass away and with it the last hope of securing this peculiar treasure. The heritage enshrined in the hearts of millions is the subject of speculation. Mammon, the earth-ruling demon, flaps his dark wings over the consecrated spot, and dooms it to his most accursed uses. It becomes the resort of the idle, a den of gamblers and inebriates. But, sir, I forbear; I can pursue this picture no further. If such desecration is to befall the home and the grave of Washington, then let the curtain fall which hides the future from my view; that day of shame I pray not to see.

"It needs no prophet's eye to scan along the line of time the majestic outline of our nation's destiny, when the fruits of our free government shall be more and more developed until this vast continent shall be peopled with freedom from sea to sea, when the fame of the nation shall reach the farthest islands and shores, when our star of empire, radiant with the beams of liberty, shall have grown to such magnitude as to attract the eyes and guide the steps of all nations, and when some Queen of Sheba shall come over seas and continents to behold our greatness and see the happy results of the wisdom of Washington, then, sir, will Mount Vernon be sought, and thousands now unborn will wish to kiss the earth which cradled and which now covers the Father of his Country. How will we appear in that millennial day of our nation's destiny, when, if it shall be truly recorded, that the most sacred spot which God committed to our custody was thrown away a sacrifice to parsimony, or some fashionable fine-spin theories with which true patriotism has no fellowship? Will not every American blush with shame, and wish that he could cover from the gaze of nations so dark a blot on the page of our history?

"Sir, shall no spot be held sacred by Americans? Have we no reverence for the symbols of departed greatness? True, there are monuments at Bunker Hill and Baltimore; we have here and there national mementos. The curious can yet trace the crumbling ramparts and the remains of hasty breastworks, behind which the stout hearts of our forefathers beat with patriotic zeal, and over which they dealt dismay and death to our enemies. But, sir, as we have been reminded by our Governor, these memorials like ourselves are fleet passing away. Let us then secure this honored patriarchy. Let Mount Vernon be the perpetual memento of our country's great deliverance, and let the reverence with which it is regarded be the token of our gratitude. And when in ages hence the banks of the silvery Potomac shall resound as now with the hull of the passing vessel, uttering its tribute to the memory of Washington, and the flag at the masthead shall humbly droop, and the mariner stand uncovered in honor of the sacred spot, let future generations learn the lesson of gratitude and patriotism which these tokens shall daily recite at Mount Vernon."

Returning to New York he was made president of the Knickerbocker Bank, and vice-president of the Knickerbocker Life Insurance Company and St. Nicholas Fire Insurance Company.

In 1854 he was Whig candidate in the Syracuse Convention for Governor, but was defeated by Myron H. Clark by only some two or three votes, who was nominated in the interest of making W. H. Seward

United States senator. He was then tendered the nomination for Lieutenant-Governor, which, however, he declined. He was appointed one of the commission by the controller of the State of New York, and acted as chairman, to examine into all of the assets, etc., of all insurance companies in New York City. In 1855, Mr. Savage settled in Rahway, N. J., and organized the State Fire Insurance Company, of which he was president for several years, until ill health compelled him to resign. Upon the occasion of the acceptance of his resignation of the presidency he was presented with a handsome silver plate as a token of appreciation for his efficient services while the incumbent of that office.

In 1860 he purchased sixty-five acres of land within the present city limits of Rahway, built his present substantial residence, and laid out the surrounding grounds with such taste as to make the location one of the most desirable for a residence. Here he has lived ever since, his time being largely spent in the care of his property.

Since the organization of Rahway as a city he has served several years in its Common Council, was its third mayor, and was also elected and served in 1880 and 1881.

While a member of its Common Council he strongly opposed the lavish expenditure of money by the city in extending its boundaries and in laying out and improving streets, which has placed so large a debt upon its taxable property.

Mr. Savage is a man of keen perception, broad ideas, and great earnestness in his advocacy of any measure which he undertakes to carry forward to a successful issue, and his ability in the discussion and presentation of topics of importance have on many occasions received favorable comments from the press of the country. In his nomination of Gen. Scott in the New York Convention in 1861 for the Presidency of the United States, and upon invitation his lecture on the "Resources of New Jersey," delivered in Jersey City, and also in the assembly-room of the Capitol at Trenton, evidence is given of a clear mind, and one well stored with useful knowledge.

His first wife, Caroline, daughter of Francis Child, a lawyer in New York, bore him the following children: Josephine, deceased, and Francis. His second wife, Sarah F. Pike, of New York, bore him seven children,—Joseph W., Jr., Walter P., Charlotte E., Lavinia, Latitia W., John M., and Sarah F. His present wife is Frances C. Parcells, a native of New York City.

WILLIAM MERSHON.

The Mershon family are of Norman origin, and were among the early settlers in the vicinity of Trenton. Deeds and other papers are in the possession of Samuel D. Mershon, the father of William, the subject of this sketch, showing conveyances of land in

Wm. Meston

William L. Gurne,

1708 to Henry Mershon in the township of Maidenhead (now Lawrence), Hunterdon County, and Henry to Benjamin Mershon in 1761 in the same vicinity. This Benjamin Mershon was the great-grandfather of William, and resided on the present homestead in the township of Lawrence, Mercer County. At the age of eighteen William Mershon went to Philadelphia, and for three years was a clerk in a wholesale dry-goods house there, leaving it in June, 1848, for a situation with a firm in the same city dealing in coal. In July, 1852, he accepted a situation offered him by Messrs. A. Pardee & Co. in their New York office, a firm which for nearly half a century has been very extensively engaged in the mining of anthracite coal and manufacturing of pig-iron; was made their general agent at New York Jan. 1, 1856, and still fills the position, having held it for a period now over twenty-six years.

Mr. Mershon has been married three times, moved to Rahway in 1862, and continues to reside there.

WILLIAM CRANE SQUIER.

Ellis Squier resided in Suffolk County, Long Island, where he reared a family of fifteen children. The place of his residence is still called Squiertown. In 1687 his son, Ellis Squier, came to New Jersey, and resided in the borough of Elizabethtown, and his son Benjamin was one of the founders of the old Westfield neighborhood, and resided there in 1699. Thomas Squier, son of Benjamin, resided in Westfield, and owned some four hundred acres of land, which was divided among his sons at his death. One son, John, grandfather of our subject, born Dec. 10, 1730, succeeded to a part of the homestead, where he resided during his life, and where he died during the Revolutionary war. His wife, Hannah Clark, born May 19, 1735, was a cousin of Abraham Clark, the New Jersey signer of the Declaration of Independence, survived her husband, and was twice married afterward, dying in Rahway. The children of John Squier were Daniel, born Oct. 19, 1755, was in the Revolutionary war, and took a prize from the British; Abraham, born Jan. 26, 1758, a privateer on the high seas during the same war, was captured by a British cruiser and confined in the Old Sugar-House Prison in New York City, where he died. While in confinement there he sent his Bible to his sister Letitia, and the book is in 1882 in the possession of the subject of this sketch. John, born July 22, 1860, succeeded to the homestead, which remained in the family until 1880; Rebecca, born Oct. 6, 1763; Jonathan, born May 15, 1766; Letitia, born Sept. 28, 1768; Reconciliation, born Feb. 24, 1771; and Hannah, born Aug. 6, 1774. The father of these children was captured by the British at his own house during the war, together with his sons, who were released, and he was taken to Elizabethtown, where he was very soon afterward also released and allowed to return home.

Jonathan, fourth son of John Squier, owned and resided on a farm of one hundred acres, now comprising the western part of the city of Rahway. He established the manufacture of hats and clothing in Rahway about 1800, and did a large business in the Southern States, as well as at home, having branch houses in New Orleans, Mobile, Columbia, S. C., and Augusta, Ga. His wife, Hannah Crane, born May 31, 1771, was a great-great-granddaughter of Stephen Crane, who came over on the "Caledonia" from England, and was a niece of Gen. William Crane, of Elizabeth, who was a distinguished officer in the Revolutionary war. Their children are John, born Aug. 31, 1794; Job, born Oct. 20, 1796, succeeded to his father's business in New Orleans and Columbia, where he was a merchant for many years; Eliza, born Sept. 21, 1799; David, born April 14, 1805, was a farmer in Rahway; Nancy, born Nov. 18, 1806, died at the age of eighteen; Jane, born Jan. 14, 1809, became the wife of Jacob G. Crane, of Elizabeth; and William C., born Jan. 8, 1812.

William C., youngest son of Jonathan and Hannah Squier, attended school in Rahway during his boyhood, was prepared for college at Princeton, and entered the University of New York City. In 1834 he determined to discontinue his studies and lead a business life. He therefore set out for New Orleans, which he reached by stage-coach after a tedious journey of fifteen days and nights, and at once became a partner with his brother Job in the wholesale clothing business, where he remained until 1846, and returned to Rahway. In 1852, Mr. Squier formed a partnership in the city of New York with Richard H. Manning, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the firm of "Manning & Squier" were sales agents for the New Jersey Zinc Company until 1854, when they organized the "Pas-saic Zinc Company," and began the manufacture of zinc in Jersey City. Mr. Squier acted as president of this company from its organization until 1875, when he resigned the duties of the office, and Mr. Manning has served as secretary and treasurer until the present time (1882).

Messrs. Squier & Manning control the majority of the stock of the company, which owes part of the red oxide of zinc mines at Ogdensburg, Sussex Co., N. J., and the carbonate of zinc mines in Union County, Tenn. The business of this company has rapidly increased, which from a small beginning now manufactures ten tons of metallic zinc and nine tons of oxide of zinc per day, employing some two hundred and fifty men at the manufactory in Jersey City and seventy-five men at the mines.

The Stirling Hill Mine at Ogdensburg, and the Mine Hill Mine, two miles northeast of Stirling Hill, are the only red oxide of zinc mines known in the world, and both were owned by Lord Stirling before the Revolutionary war. He sunk several shafts upon the veins, but never utilized any of the ores.

Mr. Squier has taken an active interest in the local enterprises where he has resided, and while a resident of New Orleans was a director of the Commercial Bank and of the Exchange Bank of that city, of the Western Marine Insurance Company and of the State Insurance Company. He was a director of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Rahway for many years, president of the savings-bank since its organization, one of the incorporators of the Rahway Public Library, one of the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, and a life-member of the State Historical Society. The Squier family were formerly identified with the old Whig party, and later generations are Republicans.

He has kept aloof from public place, never solicited political office, and never held any, but has spent an active life devoted to business pursuits. His wife, Catherine, whom he married Nov. 8, 1841, is a daughter of the late Dr. David Stewart Craig, for many years a prominent physician in Rahway, and a great-great-granddaughter of Dr. David Stewart, who came from Scotland on the "Caledonia," and was the first practicing physician in Woodbridge, N. J., where he died.

Mr. Squier has five sons,—Stewart C., in business with his father, William C., Jr., Charles B., Edwin M., and Frederick. The last three are also engaged in the zinc industry with their father.

Relating to the "Caledonia," sometimes called the "Mayflower" of New Jersey, Thomas O. Crane, a former resident of Rahway, given to antiquarian research, who died at an advanced age, has left the following written narrative:

"I had this morning, April 28, 1818, from James Crane, who had it from Alderman William Miller, a pious man, a millstone-cutter, who lived to a great age, and was well acquainted with Stephen Crane, one of the first of the name who came to this town (Elizabeth Town), and related it to said Miller.

"In the reign of —, when the Protestants were persecuted by the Papists, a number in the west of England and Wales resolved, if they could, to escape to the wilds of America. The wreck of the ship 'Caledonia' lay sunk at the shore. Some of the proprietors and others concerted a plan and agreed to raise her and fit her for the voyage. With the help of two pumps and several hundred buckets they freed her of water and stopped the leak, and fitted her out in the night-time; and one hundred and thirteen went on board and set sail in the night-time for fear of detection, and in the morning Providence so ordered it that a thick fog arose between her and the land so that they escaped. They had fair winds and weather all the passage till they arrived on the shoals of Anboy, when she leaked so that the pumps would not free her, and she sank, but all escaped safe to land and dispersed among the Indians. Stephen Crane with others settled at Elizabeth Town. He was a man of note and one of the first Associates. He married a Danish woman with red hair, by whom he had several children."

JOHN C. DENMAN, the progenitor of the Denman family, from whom the subject of this sketch was descended, settled on Long Island, from England, in 1667. His son, John Denman, came from Southampton, L. I., and settled back "west in the fields," now called Westfield, and was one of the Elizabethtown Association in 1699, and was among the early Episcopalians of the borough of Elizabethtown. John Denman, Jr., settled on one hundred acres of land in Westfield, now the township of Cranford, in 1723, and this property has been successively owned by his descendants in direct line to the present time (1882). He died in March, 1776, leaving children,—John, Joseph, Daniel, Christopher, Mary, and Jennie, of whom Christopher succeeded to the homestead; was born March 5, 1741, and died Oct. 21, 1808. His wife, Abigail Hendricks, bore him the following children: Susanna, Anna, Abigail, John, Huldah, and Mary. Of these children, John succeeded to the homestead, where he was born Feb. 28, 1782, and died Sept. 25, 1849. He was a farmer and a representative business man, being widely known throughout the State. A sketch of his life will be found on another page of this work. His wife, Lockett, died July 30, 1875. The Denman family were members and attendants of the Episcopal Church at Elizabethtown until the Revolutionary war, when that church was closed, and afterwards of the West Presbyterian Church at Westfield, N. J.

Jonathan Woodruff

John Christopher, son of John and Lockey Denman, was born on the homestead Nov. 17, 1815. His early education was received at the school in his native place at the Rahway Athenian Academy. At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to learn carriage-making with Charles Hedenberg, a large manufacturer in Newark, N. J., in whose service he became conversant with the manufacture of all kinds of carriages, and there laid the foundation for his subsequent remarkable and successful career as a manufacturer and dealer in carriages and vehicles of all descriptions. Soon after he reached his majority he commenced working at the shop of his uncle, Rolph Marsh, of Rahway, and while there made the first paneled coach-body ever gotten up at Rahway. He continued there one year, but the disasters of 1837 having overtaken all branches of trade and commerce, he was induced to start in search of more remunerative employment. He finally reached Columbus, Ga., where he took charge of a large carriage-shop for Mr. George W. Way, remaining one year. He then proceeded to New Orleans, but not succeeding in his expectations went to Mobile, where he remained one year. About 1840 he formed a partnership in New Orleans with John E. Matthews, under the firm-name of Matthews & Denman, as dealers and manufacturers of carriages. There they had a large repository, being supplied partly by large purchases in Northern markets and partly by their own manufacture. They became large contractors during the Mexican war, furnishing supplies of wagons, mules, horse-shoes, etc., for the army. In the spring of 1852 he retired from business, feeling that he had accumulated a reasonable competency, but in a short time found that inactivity was "unconstitutional," and that it was preferable to wear than to rust out.

At the close of 1852 he connected himself with his brother, I. Marsh Denman, under the firm-name of I. Marsh Denman & Co., at New Orleans, and Denman & Co., at Rahway, he taking charge of the business at the North, and his brother of that at New Orleans. In 1856 he purchased the interest of his brother, I. Marsh Denman, in both the New Orleans and Rahway establishments, and associated with him at New Orleans a younger brother, under the firm-name of Rolph M. Denman & Co., and at Rahway with John L. Freeman, under the name of Denman & Freeman. The latter remained his partner until the decease of Mr. Denman, Feb. 4, 1864. At the opening of the war the business in New Orleans was closed, and he connected himself with Fisher, Richards & Co., of Australia, shipping them large consignments of carriages.

John C. Denman was a man of remarkable energy, sagacity, and enterprise, and during his active business life his name was known in business circles throughout this country and quite extensively in foreign lands. He was a man of quick perception, fixed purposes, frank and outspoken, and his great kindness of heart, marked liberality for any enterprise he conceived to be right, and especially his sympathy and help to those in need have made his name remembered in many households, where, in an unostentatious way, he gave of his means, commensurate with his spirit of liberality. Politically, Mr. Denman wielded a large influence, and he was prominent in the councils of the Democratic party. He was a member of the Legislature from Essex County in 1858, and successfully advocated the bill to make a new county, to which he gave the name of "Union," and the removal of the mill-dams at Rahway. After one turn of service at Trenton as a legislator he took up his residence in Newark, N. J., where he was elected and served in the board of chosen freeholders, and where he resided until his decease by heart-disease, Feb. 4, 1864. His wife, who survives him, is Eliza H., a daughter of Aaron V. and Eliza Buckalew Hendricks, of Middlesex County. His children are George Hendricks, Lillie Orlean, and Rolph Marsh Denman.

JONATHAN WOODRUFF.

The Woodruff family have been one of prominence in this section of the State for more than two centuries. They were among the early settlers of Elizabethtown, and John Woodruff appears as one of the prominent citizens of that place as early as 1673.

John, Jonathan, and Samuel Woodruff are mentioned also by Rev. Edwin F. Hatfield in his history of Union County as among the founders of the Westfield families who settled there as early as 1699.

Jonathan Woodruff, the grandfather of our subject, owned a large farm on the four corners of the cross-roads, one mile north from the Westfield Church, and there resided in 1750. He left five sons,—Jonathan, Aaron, Noah, Joseph, and William,—who all lived to be old men except William (who died at the age of forty-six years of bilious fever). Jonathan lived to the advanced age of ninety-four years.

William Woodruff, father of our subject, was born in Westfield March 6, 1781, and resided there until the spring of 1816, when he purchased and settled upon a farm of ninety acres near Rahway, on the old King George road between Elizabeth and Rahway, where he resided until his death, Sept. 7, 1826, leaving a family of ten children. He had always enjoyed excellent health, and was a thoroughgoing business man, dealt largely in timber, and built many bridges in this section of New Jersey. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church of Westfield, and upon his removal to Rahway united with the First Presbyterian Church of that place. His wife, Phebe, born Oct. 3, 1786, daughter of Jacob Ludlow, of Westfield, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, survived him, and died June 4, 1856.

After the death of her husband she remained on the farm for many years, and reared her family of ten children with the greatest care, instilling into their minds those principles which have made her children what they are, and which make her memory dear to their minds as a devoted Christian mother.

There were eight sons and two daughters,—Jacob L., born Oct. 19, 1803, residing in Rahway; Sarah, wife of John C. Meeker, born Sept. 25, 1805, residing in Newark, N. J.; Joseph, born Jan. 1, 1808, residing in Rahway, a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church; John, born May 9, 1810, a resident of Boston, Mass.; William, born Jan. 24, 1813, died in Elizabethtown, April 12, 1837; Jonathan, born Sept. 1, 1815; Aaron Augustus, born Feb. 8, 1818, died in Rahway, Dec. 6, 1836; Amos, born April 4, 1818, a resident of Memphis, Tenn., since 1845; is an active and influential citizen of that place; president of the State National Bank and president of the Cotton-Press Association there. Erastus Washington, born March 6, 1822, a carriage-manufacturer in Rahway; and Margaret Pool, born June 13, 1824, widow of John F. Disbrow, now residing at Roselle, N. J. No death has occurred in this large family of children during the past forty-five years, the youngest being now nearly sixty, and the eldest nearly eighty years of age. They all advocate temperance; not one of them ever uses tobacco in any form.

Jonathan, the subject of this sketch, received his education in the district school. At the age of seventeen he went with Mr. Harned, in Rahway, to learn the carriage-making business, and remained with him until he was twenty-one years of age. In the spring of 1837 he was offered and accepted the superintendency of the New York office of Thomas Hale, proprietor of the Rahway Silk and Print Works, which position he held for three years. Resolving to go into business for himself, and wishing to obtain some knowledge of the dry-goods trade, he accepted a position, and spent one year as salesman in the jobbing-house of Ely & Freeland, of New York, and in the spring of 1842, with his brother Amos as partner, under the firm-name of J. & A. Woodruff, started a general merchandise store in Rahway.

By their industry, energy, and close application their business rapidly increased, and their names became widely known throughout this section of New Jersey as substantial business men.

Mr. Woodruff's knowledge of carriages led the firm to deal in them, as well as in carriage supplies, and finding that the carriages could not be sold here to advantage, Mr. Woodruff went South in the winter of 1845, and located at Memphis, Tenn., where he opened and established a carriage repository. In the spring his brother Amos took charge of the business in the South, and he returned to Rahway and took charge of the business North, carrying on a large business in dry-goods and carriage supplies, manufacturing and buying carriages and shipping them from Rahway and the Eastern markets to Memphis.

In 1857, J. & A. Woodruff sold out the mercantile part of their business to their brother John and David B. Dunham, and gave their undivided attention to the carriage business.

Upon the breaking out of the civil war Mr. Woodruff and his brother Amos deemed it advisable to dissolve their partnership.

In 1865 the Union National Bank was organized. Mr. Woodruff was elected its first president, and has since continued to be president of the association.

In all matters of a local nature Mr. Woodruff has been one of the foremost citizens to contribute of his time and means in support of every enterprise which had for its object the welfare, growth, and prosperity of his native place. He is a large property-owner, and, in addition to several dwelling-houses of architectural beauty, he has erected several substantial buildings, which have added much to the appearance of the city. In 1854 he erected the large brick store on Main Street, and in 1872 he purchased the mansion house property adjoining the Pennsylvania Railroad depot, and at a large expenditure of money remodeled it into what is now known as the Exchange Building.

In 1849 he, with a number of the members of the First Presbyterian Church, met at his residence, and there resolved to organize the Second Presbyterian Church of Rahway. Mr. Woodruff took a very active part in the enterprise. The church was organized, Mr. Woodruff being one of the building committee, and was for many years one of the trustees of the church.

Mr. Woodruff has always been active and earnest in Sunday-school work. He has been for sixty years in the Sabbath-school, as scholar, teacher, and superintendent, believing that the influence of the Sunday-school is only for good, to the scholars, teachers, parents, and to the entire community.

In 1852 he established and was superintendent of a Sunday-school three miles out in the country at Uniontown, and for fifteen years was most regular in attendance. In 1867 the Second Presbyterian Church started a mission Sunday-school in East Rahway. Mr. Woodruff took a deep interest in the enterprise, and in 1869 he, with other friends of the Sunday-school, contributed freely, purchased a lot, and built for the use of the school and for a place of worship what is known as the Grand Street Chapel.

In 1855, Mr. Woodruff, in connection with two other gentlemen, Messrs. William Edgar and A. C. Watson, realizing the need of a school in the place where an education could be obtained higher than the public school afforded, purchased a lot, and erected a suitable building on Milton Avenue, and furnished it free to a suitable teacher.

Mr. Woodruff has never sought political preferment, but his opinions on the great questions of the day are decided. Originally a Whig, when the Republican party was formed he was a decided Republican, strongly opposed to the extension of slavery. He believes in the faith of the Presbyterian branch of the Christian Church, of which he has been a member since he was nineteen years of age, and for the last twenty-five years a ruling elder in the Second Presbyterian Church in Rahway. He has been repeatedly sent by the Presbytery of Elizabeth Town as commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.

His wife, whom he married in August, 1842, is Alvira, daughter of William and Sarah Crowell Martin, who was born May 9, 1816.

Their children are Lizzie, Amos, Edward, educated under the private instruction of Rev. Dr. Pierson, of Elizabeth, and at Princeton College, graduated at the Columbia College Law School, in New York, 1874, and is now practicing his profession in that city; Laura J., wife of David Jones, of Rahway; and Carrie, wife of R. M. Hunting, of Sag Harbor, L. I.

ISAAC OSBORN

is one of the oldest business men of Rahway, and has led an active business life here since 1822, a period of fifty-nine years. The family were among the early settlers at Scotch Plains, Union Co., N. J., where his great-grandfather, John, resided, and where his grandfather, John B. Osborn, was born, spent his life as a farmer, and died in 1848 at the age of ninety-six years. The first homestead of John B. Osborn consisted of forty acres of timbered land, upon which he erected his log cabin, and which he cleared of its original forest. To this he added until he was the possessor of some four hundred acres, which he acquired solely by his own industry. He was known as "Deacon Osborn," and for seventy years officially served as deacon of the Baptist Church at Scotch Plains. Born in the middle of the last century, he lived during the Revolutionary war, and served in that memorable struggle for the independence of the colonies. His wife was Mary, a sister of Hon. Ezra Darby, an early member of Congress; she lived to be ninety-two years of age, and died in the house where she had spent her married life only a few weeks before her husband. The children of this venerable couple were Patience, Joel, William, Charles, John, Jonathan, and Mary, of whom Joel was father of our subject, and inherited the homestead of forty acres, where he was born, and where he died in 1853, aged seventy-five years and seven months. Joel Osborn was a carpenter by trade, and resided respectively at Scotch Plains, New York, Rahway, and Westfield, where he worked at his trade. His wife was Nancy, daughter of Joseph Halsey, of Newark, who died in 1861 aged seventy-eight years. Their children were Isaac; Susan, wife of Isaac Moore of Rahway; William, a carriage-maker of Rahway, who died in 1865, aged sixty; Joel, a carriage-maker of Rahway;

Ferdinand was in the same business, and died in 1860 in Rahway; Mary; and Albert, who is a tinsman near Bound Brook, N. J.

Isaac, eldest of these children, born July 8, 1803, went with his parents to live in New York in 1809, and remembers that city when there were only two houses on Canal Street between Broadway and Hudson Street, and of crossing Broadway at Canal Street on a wooden bridge. He came with his parents to Rahway in 1815, where his father had been engaged at work in building the Taurino Factory, superintended by William Shotwell. Here he received three years' schooling, and for four years he was an apprentice to the trade of harness-making and carriage-trimming.

In 1822, as before stated, Mr. Osborn established himself in the business of carriage-making in a small way, which he gradually increased and carried on until 1830 on Mechanic Street, now Grand. In that year he opened a general store for the sale of dry-goods and groceries at 91 Main Street, which he successfully carried on until 1855, when he retired from the trade, and has since given his attention to the care and improvement of his property. The Rahway Mutual Fire Insurance Company was founded in 1833. Mr. Osborn succeeded Mr. Crowell as president of this concern in 1859, and his official relations with the company have given it increased strength and confidence. He was president of the Rahway Fire Association for twenty years prior to its being a city, was a director and stockholder of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Rahway from 1850 to 1864, was one of the incorporators of the savings-bank and gas company, and since 1838 he has been a member of the Methodist Church at Rahway, and since 1845 a trustee and president of its official board. Mr. Osborn remembers that in 1815 there were only twenty-nine houses in upper Rahway, and no streets except St. George's Avenue and Mechanic Street.

His life has been one of industry, care, and honesty of purpose, and he may be safely classed among the representative business men of a generation nearly gone.

His wife, Emily McDonald, died Jan. 11, 1879, aged seventy-seven years. Of his children, Uzal, eldest son, survives. Eliza Augusta died at the age of twenty-two, and Emily Caroline died Feb. 16, 1879.

JOHN H. LUFBERY.

His father, Abraham Lufbery, died in Rahway, Aug. 5, 1825, aged about seventy-one years. He came to Rahway soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, and for several years worked at his trade as a ship-builder. Subsequently he engaged in the bakery business, which he carried on during the remainder of his active business life. He was a non-commissioned officer in the Revolutionary war, and upon the occasion of Gen. Lafayette's visit to Rahway in 1824 he was made chairman of the committee for the reception of that distinguished son of France. His wife, Jenet Conger, survived him, and drew a pension during the remainder of her life, dying March 15, 1861, at the age of seventy-two years, and leaving the following children: Sarah, wife of Brittin Haines, of Rahway, died July, 1874, aged fifty-eight years; John H., subject of this sketch; Margaret and Isaac having died young.

By a former marriage to Charity Oliver on March 20, 1785, he had the following children: Joseph O., a prominent business man of Rahway, who established the saw-mill and lumber interest in 1827 now carried on by Ayers & Lufbery, was president of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Rahway, was a merchant for many years, and also carried on a nail manufactory (the nails being made by hand), and who was born Jan. 29, 1786, and died Dec. 25, 1865; Lydia H., born Oct. 26, 1789; Edward and Mordecai, born May 15, 1790; Phebe, born April 12, 1794; Daniel and Oliver, born April 2, 1796; Nancy, born Feb. 3, 1798; Mary, born Jan. 7, 1800; and Ann, born in 1802.

John H. Lufbery, born Sept. 2, 1818, had only the educational opportunities of the schools of his native place during his boyhood, and at the age of sixteen began as an apprentice to learn the carpenter's trade. After four years he went to work for his brother, Joseph O. Lufbery, in his saw-mill, where he remained until 1846, when his brother retiring from the business, in partnership with others, the firm of Ayers, Williams & Lufbery continued the business, which in 1882 is carried on by Ayers & Lufbery. A planing-mill was erected in connection with the lumber interest by them in 1846, and since June 28, 1855, they have done all their sawing and planing by steam-power.

Prior to the transfer of a part of Woodbridge to Union County, Mr. Lufbery took an active interest in local matters relating to the township and county, and for some four years served on the board of chosen freeholders of Middlesex County. He has served in the same capacity for several years in Union County, was the second mayor of Rahway after its incorporation as a city, and has served for some thirteen years in its Common Council, being for three years its president. In the fall of 1870 he was elected on the Republican ticket from Union County to the lower branch of the New Jersey Legislature, and for two years (1871, 1872) honorably discharged the duties as assemblyman.

Although of Quaker parentage on the paternal side, he has adhered more particularly to the views of the Baptist denomination. His wife, whom he married April 6, 1845, is Henrietta C., daughter of Frederick and Ann (Burnett) Freeman, of Woodbridge. Her father was a tanner and currier and farmer there, and his ancestors were among the early settlers of that part of Middlesex County. She was born May 8, 1823, and their surviving children are Margaret, wife of William Chamberlain, John H., Anna, wife of Samuel Williams, Abraham Frederick, Joseph O., Jr., and William R. Lufbery.

JOEL AND IRA LAFORGE are among the enterprising and active business men of Rahway, N. J., in 1882. Their grandfather, John Laforge, settled in Woodbridge township from Staten Island during the latter part of last century, and there carried on farming and tanning until his death. His children were Cornelius, a ship-carpenter; Betsey, wife of Ephraim Compton; John, father of our subjects, followed the sea during his early life, was a farmer in Woodbridge, and died in 1848, aged fifty-one years; Mary, wife of David Bloomfield; Ann, wife of Martin Compton; Charlotte, wife of William Acken; Charles, a carpenter and farmer in Woodbridge; William, a farmer; Asa, died in New Orleans, and was a ship-carpenter by trade; and Martha, wife of Albert Edgar, of Newark. The wife of John Laforge was Mary, daughter of Matthias Freeman, who died in 1864, aged sixty years, and whose mother was Mary Dally, of Woodbridge. The children of John and Mary (Freeman) Laforge are Joel; Isabella, wife of Elijah Hutchinson, of Trenton; Ira; Mary Ann, wife of George W. Wooley, of Rahway; Asa, deceased; John Edmund, resides in Staten Island; and Ellis, deceased. By a former marriage to Joanna Tappan John Laforge had two daughters,—Harriet, deceased, and Joanna, wife of Jerome B. Ross, of Woodbridge.

Joel Laforge was born in Woodbridge, Nov. 5, 1825, and from eighteen to twenty-one years of age was apprenticed to learn the blacksmith's trade with David L. Dupue, of Rahway. After the death of his father, he was a partner of Benjamin Conaway in a grist-mill in Piscataway for two years, was in New York for a time as carman, and in 1853 came to Rahway, and until 1861 worked for his brother Ira in his sash-and-blind manufactory. For four years following he was engaged in making bayonets for Joseph Gatchel in Rahway, to be used in the late civil war. Since 1865 he has been the partner of his brother in the spoke, wheel, and spring manufacturing business, under the firm-name of I. & J. Laforge.

He married in 1850, Susan, daughter of Reuben and Sarah Potter, of Woodbridge, and their children are John Lester; George William, died young; and De Witt Edson.

Ira Laforge was born in Woodbridge, Feb. 24, 1830, and from eighteen to twenty-two years of age learned the carpenter's trade, first with Daniel N. Gardner, then with Jonathan B. Nichols, of Newark. In 1852 he established a sash-and-blind factory in Leesville, near the Pennsylvania Railroad depot, Rahway, which he carried on successfully, first by hand and afterwards by machinery, until 1861, shipping his goods mostly to Mobile and Georgia. From 1863 until 1867 he was engaged in the coal and lumber business in Rahway, but in 1865 he established a spoke and wheel manufactory on the site of his former manufactory, where he carried on business in partnership with his brother (I. & J. Laforge) until 1870, when they purchased their present brick manufactory, which is seventy by fifty-six feet, and four stories in height, placed in it a fifty horse-power engine, and began the manufacture of spokes and wheels on a more extensive scale. In 1874 they made large additions to their building, and added to their business the manufacture of carriage-springs. Their manufactured goods are sold in New York, Baltimore, Wilmington, and in Eastern and Southern markets, and are among the best manufactures of the kind. Ira Laforge married, in September, 1851, Helen C., daughter of Caleb W. and Mary Woodruff, of Newark. Of his four children, Theodore W., Mary A., Emma C., and Frederick F., only Mary A. Laforge survives.

Ira Laforge built the first residence on Milton Avenue in 1865, and a second one in 1860.

The Laforbes started out in life without pecuniary assistance, and, like many of our best business men, in early life met the obstacles incident to obtaining much education from books, but learned the lessons of economy and prudence, which with well-directed energy form the basis of practical and successful business men. Neither of them have ever sought official place, but devoted their whole time to business pursuits.

DANIEL K. RYNO.

Pack Ryno, who was supposed to be of French extraction, was grandfather of Daniel K., and resided in Woodbridge township, Middlesex Co., N. J., where he died of typhoid fever at the age of forty-eight years, leaving a large family of children. One son, Lafayette, settled in California about 1850. Clayton, father of our subject, born in 1800, was a carpenter by trade, resided in Woodbridge township, now Piscataway, during his life, and there died in 1849. Wilson lived and died at Plainfield, N. J. John died in New York City. William, retired, resides at West Henrietta, near Rochester, N. Y. Sarah is the widow of the late Joseph Dunham, of Cranford, and Rachel was the wife of Lewis Dunham, and resided near Plainfield. The mother of Daniel K. Ryno was Mary, daughter of Daniel Kelly and Huldah Drake, whose uncle was familiarly known as "Priest Drake," a Presbyterian clergyman of Plainfield, N. J. She died in 1867, and by a former marriage to David Lane had two daughters,—Rachel, wife of Barzilla Randolph, of Piscataway, and Catharine, wife of Drake Randolph, of the same place. By her marriage to Clayton Ryno she had children,—Caroline, wife of Randolph Pack; David, of Rahway; Daniel Kelly, subject of this sketch; William, of Rahway; and Howard.

Daniel K. Ryno was born in Piscataway township, then Woodbridge, Middlesex Co., Sept. 21, 1830. He lived with his half-sister, Mrs. Randolph, from seven until he was thirteen years of age, and for three years following worked on a farm, attending school a few months in winter. For one year at the age of seventeen he resided with Jonathan Randolph, and for his services received twenty dollars and his board and clothes. Thus he spent his boyhood, meeting the obstacles incident to limited advantages for both education and place. With only eighty-seven and a half cents in money, at the age of eighteen he came to Rahway in the spring of 1847, and became an apprentice to learn the cabinet, furniture, and undertaking business with John A. Briant, then in business here, with whom he served for four years, and became conversant with all departments of the trade. He had a particular liking for the undertaking part of the business, which Mr. Briant gave him the supervision of, and in 1849, during the cholera epidemic in Rahway, he was the only one who remained in his line of business and buried those who died with that terrible disease. After completing his term of service, and working a year and a half as journeyman at Plainfield and Rahway, he in the spring of 1855 bought out Mr. Briant's stock of goods and established business on his own account. In 1848, Mr. Ryno purchased the property of Mr. Briant, on the corner of Irving and Hamilton Streets, in Rahway, the old stand when the business had been carried on, and there he has continued the undertaking business since.

The same year, 1855, he established the furniture business on Main Street, Rahway, which he continues in 1882, and about 1865 he established a branch undertaking business at Elizabeth, which he sold out the next year to a partner, George C. Ford.

Mr. Ryno's business life has been one of constant activity, and his devotion to it, his naturally social disposition, frank manners, correct habits, and integrity in all his business relations have made his name widely known throughout Union and Middlesex Counties. He is an advocate of temperance reform, and a member of and officially connected with the Second Methodist Church in Rahway.

In 1855 he served as township clerk of Rahway, and in the spring election of 1875 he was chosen on the Democratic ticket, as an advocate of retrenchment in city expenditures, mayor of Rahway.

His wife, whom he married Nov. 8, 1855, is Rebecca V., daughter of Rev. Sedgwick Rusling and Electa Cummings. Her father was a Methodist clergyman at Rahway for two years, and labored as a minister of the gospel for thirty-six years, preaching in New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania, and died in 1876, aged seventy-six years. Her mother died in Rahway in 1865, leaving children,—Mary, Rebecca, Joseph F., Mrs. Col. Woodruff, Sedgwick C., Sarah E. (Mrs. Ayres), and Thomas.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Ryno are Sedgwick Rusling, Harry P., Charles, Stella, and Walter (deceased).

CHAPTER XLIV.

TOWNSHIP OF PLAINFIELD.¹

THE township of Plainfield was erected by act of the Legislature approved March 4, 1847.

Natural Features.—The most striking natural feature of this township is its plain surface, from which the name Plainfield is derived. Throughout it is moderately undulating, but there are no abrupt declivities or elevations, the highest rise of land being the Short Hills, on the southeasterly border, which centre in Fanwood and Raritan townships. The soil is chiefly composed of clay, gravel, and sandy loam, and is regarded as one of the most fertile farming sections of Union County. The township has an extreme width of about four miles, and is some seven or eight miles in length. On the east is the beautiful village of Scotch Plains, settled in 1667, and on the westerly border of the township is the village of Dunellen.

It is some eight miles from Rahway on the south. The township is bounded by Green Brook on the north-westerly border, giving it ample water privileges for manufacturing, while Cedar Brook lies upon the south-easterly border. Artesian or tube wells are largely used by the inhabitants for procuring water for domestic purposes. Excellent pure water can be obtained at a distance in the gravel of from fourteen to thirty feet, and it is never failing.

A short distance across the border in North Plainfield township, on the range known as the First Mountain, stands "Washington's Rock," from which it is said that that immortal patriot and soldier surveyed with paternal solicitude the movements of the British forces about Amboy and New Brunswick. The rock is an immense trap boulder, and stands out so boldly in the southern face of the mountain as to command a view for many miles.

Early Settlement.—In 1684, Thomas Gordon, John Forbes, John Barclay, Thomas and Robert Fullerton settled some two miles south of Plainfield, at the place now called New Brooklyn, sometimes "Tow Town," or near there on the borders of this township. In a letter written by Robert Fullerton to his relatives in Scotland very soon after their arrival he remarks, "We have the honor of being the first of planters in this inland part of America." The first frame building was erected in 1735, at which period there were a few log huts and Indian wigwams belonging to the Delaware Indians.

The first grist-mill was built in the year 1760, on the banks of the upper mill-pond, but about the year 1790 was removed to where it now stands on Somerset Street, and the place was then, and subsequently for a long time, known as "Mill Town." Here all the grain for a long distance round was brought to be converted into flour. The first store was kept by Thomas Nesbit, and after he left it John Fitz Randolph kept a miscellaneous store, selling "dry-goods, groceries, boots and shoes, etc.," and taking in exchange "skines, furs, tallow, wax, and honny." This primitive store was on the corner of Front and Somerset Streets. The first hat manufactory was built in 1808, by John Wilson, and in 1812 there were twelve hat factories, supplying some sixty thousand dollars' worth of hats to New York market and other places. Plainfield was a small country village in 1800, containing two hundred and fifteen inhabitants, and had a regular line of stages, connecting New York with Philadelphia, passing each way three times a week, called the "Swiftsure."

For many years after the first settlement the people had no place of worship. In 1788 the Society of Friends erected their meeting-house. There had been a small building erected in 1736 near the line of this township, in Raritan, on the Laing property, near what was then called "Tow Town." In 1818 the First Baptist Church was built, the congregation being from "Sampdown." In 1825 the First Presbyterian Church was organized, and the corner-stone of the edifice was then laid. In 1830 the Society of Friends, on account of their tenets, was divided, and one portion thereof built a meeting-house. In 1832 the Methodist Episcopal Church was reared. In 1838 the Seventh-Day Baptists, who had long worshipped in their church at Piscataway, found the distance too great, and so built themselves a small church. In 1842 the Second Baptist Church was organized, and in 1844 the Second Presbyterian Church was built on Front Street. It is within a few years that the other churches have been organized, proper mention of which is made under head of "Churches."

In 1726, Coddington, White, and Vanneste each purchased and "had surveyed to him 877 acres of Land; John Barclay, 700 acres; Peter Sonmans, 2500 acres; Robert Fullerton, 300 acres; James Coles, 125 acres; Andrew Gullena, 350 acres; and William Gerard, 350 acres." These are probably the first who owned land in this township and cultivated the soil at this early date. From 1731 "many came up and took land," among whom were the Ackens, Bacons, Browns, Curtis, Dunham, Fitz Randolph, Force, Frazee, French, Geddis, Harriott, Hendricks, Hoogland, Hsleys, Jackson, Kelly, Kent, Lacey (Lacy), Lawrie, Marsh, Meeker, Mores (Moore), Osborn, Pangborn, Pearce (Pierce and Parse), Perkins, Jennings (Gennings), Lane (Laing), Price, Shotwells, Ross, Shippy, Marcellias, Smith, Pound, Stelle, Strangman, Hatfields, Connett, Sutton, Toppen (Tappen), Thorp, Thorn, Tingley, Vail, Vermuele, Wall, Maning (Manning), Webster. And at a much later date, or after the year 1785, the following residents owned lands here: Halsey, Dunn, Titsworth, Pope, Rolfe, Morgan, Wilson, Freeman, Deare (O'Dera), Boyce (Boice), Compton, Melick, Stillman, Bond, Leonard, Harris, Bryant (Briant), Allen, Hands, Jones, Lees, Miller, King, Lawrence, Smock, Lithgow, Livingston, Lyons, Merrill, Terry, Terrill, Ford, Drake, Darby, Chandler, Pruden, Stewart, Cory (Corey), Conover, Potter, Craig, Crane, Gilmon, Harriman, Hart, Ogden, Pack, Mulford, Melyen, Pinhorne, Berny, and some others who came and stayed but for a few years.

Civil List.—The following is a list of the principal officers of the township since its organization in 1847:

CHAPTER XLV.

TOWNSHIP AND CITY OF PLAINFIELD.

PLAINFIELD was incorporated as a city in 1869. It is divided into four wards, and is governed by a mayor elected for two years and a Common Council. The assessed valuation of personal property and real estate within the limits (including North Plainfield) is about $6,000,000, which is not fully up to the true value. There are nearly 2000 legal voters in the corporate limits, and about 600 in the North Plainfield District mentioned. The population is about 12,000, including both sides of Green Brook. Of this number less than 2000 are foreigners. The city covers an area of some seven square miles, and about 4500 acres, as embraced in the territory inclosed by Terrill Avenue on the northeast, the city limits on the southwest, and extending from Mountain Avenue on the northwest to the eastern limits of the city and township line. It is about twenty-four miles southwesterly from New York City, and on the new through line to Philadelphia about ninety minutes' ride therefrom, and pleasantly located on a gently sloping plain about one hundred feet above tide-water. Evonia on the westerly and Netherwood on the easterly sides of the city proper are thriving hamlets.

We insert here the following list of city officials, with the years in which they held their respective offices:

Census Report.—The population of the city proper is 8126,—males, 2669; females, 3457,—showing an increase from 1875 to the present time,—1875, 7216; 1880, 8126; increase, 1110.

The city of Plainfield is now (1882) divided in four wards.

Schools.—The early settlers after building themselves rude habitations also built the "log school-house." Among the early settlers in this township was James Fullerton, whose parents, Thomas Fullerton, his wife, and ten servants, and Robert Fullerton, with nine servants, arrived in October, 1684. They settled on Cedar Brook, just near the city of Plainfield. At this late date it cannot be determined whether James Fullerton was a son of Thomas or not, but it is now known that he was a schoolmaster, as he and Master Robert Coles, of Westfield, taught school in the township. As early as the year 1689 the few settlers, the Gordons, Ormstons, Forbes, Mashs, Farrers, Jacksons, and many others, had settled within short distances of each other, and James Fullerton is spoken of as the schoolmaster. There are a number of teachers spoken of after the year 1701 to 1800, as a Mr. John Boacker (Baker), and one John Conger, a Mr. Brown, also a Mr. McNulthy.

The following is a description of one of the early Plainfield schools: It was situated on the forks of three roads, surrounded by maple and live-oak trees, and in the centre of the school district, convenient for the children. "School took in from 8 A.M. till 4 P.M.," a much longer session than is the custom at the present time. Boards were nailed for desks against the side of the wall; long benches made of oak slabs from the saw-mill near by, with holes for the rude legs; a few smaller and lower ones for the little scholars; they were without backs. Bible-reading was a custom; the few school-books that could be obtained were not very satisfactory, and so many times we selected letters and words from the Bible."

Joseph Fitz Randolph, about 1809 and also 1812, taught the school, which stood near Mr. James Leanard's residence; William Marsh was also the teacher for five years from 1816 in the same building. Miss Sallie Page kept a Quaker school in 1805-7, and perhaps longer; it was situated on the corner of Peace and Front Streets. Mr. William Davis and Thomas Wallace (and one other in the basement of the Presbyterian Church) taught from 1835 to 1838. Mr. Frazee Coles, about 1805 to 1809, taught the school in the village of Plainfield and in the Jackson school-house, on or near the Terrill road, for a number of terms. He is spoken of as a "successful tutor." He has just died (Nov. 12, 1881), at the advanced age of ninety-six. A building called the academy was built in the year 1812. Rev. Buckley Morse, a Baptist clergyman, taught for some time, also a Mr. Randolph.

"We had a number of teachers and many Yankee schoolmarms and masters," says an old resident. It was burnt down in the year 1834. Mr. Joseph Randall taught in the "village" in 1811 and 1816. Another account of these early schools says that the inhabitants desired their children educated, and built a school in 1760, on the corner of what is known as Peace and Front Streets, and this and the one that was built near "Tow Town" were the first. A little later a school-house was built on the corner of Somerset and Front Streets, where Messrs. Pope Brothers' store now stands, and James Fitz Randolph (who was a Quaker) taught there as well as at the Quaker school.

There was a private school-house built where the late residence of Cornelius Boice, Esq., stood, and before his house was built. Here Ezra Fairchild kept a select school from 1837-40.

About the same time there was a school-house, which afterwards was changed into a dwelling, opposite the First Baptist Church. The teachers who taught here were Amos Lyon, from near Scotch Plains, 1835; Mr. Whitney, 1833-34, and again in 1840; Jacob Wood was the next teacher, who taught in 1841-43, and after his term expired it was sold to Mr. Abraham Runyon for a dwelling. Mr. E. Dean Dow is mentioned as a teacher in the seminary, and afterwards editor of the Central New Jersey Times at Plainfield.

The Plainfield Seminary was a frame building, forty by thirty-six feet, which was built on the land afterwards owned by Mr. Cornelius Boice, on the southwest and adjoining the First Presbyterian Church.

The Plainfield Classical Institute, a rival educational interest, was organized in 1834, and was also in a frame building, sixty by thirty-five feet. It stood opposite the First Baptist Church, and both buildings are still standing, having been converted into private dwellings.

In connection with the history of the schools in this city should be mentioned the name of Charles H. Stillman, M.D., who died so suddenly at his residence on Front Street early on Sunday, Nov. —, 1881. The cause of education seemed to belong to his life-work. We refer to his labors in founding the public school system in Plainfield, and to his disinterested and unbroken services of thirty-four years in developing that system as a trustee and president of the board of education. The story of the early struggle to lay the foundations of our public schools show what persistent and enthusiastic labor was necessary to achieve that result. On the occasion of presenting the oil portrait of Dr. Stillman to the Board of Education, some three years ago, to be placed upon the walls of the High School Chapel, a sketch of the doctor's life-work was given in an address by the editor of the New Jersey Times, — Leonard, Esq. This was the first free school founded in New Jersey. There was not even a law on the statute books of the State to provide for raising money to found and carry on such a school as this. Dr. Stillman took the first step to accomplish this result in securing proper legislation, and he encountered not only the difficulties which always meet one in attempting the passage of important laws, but the prejudice of those who opposed the free school as an innovation. A law was at length passed appropriating one hundred dollars to carry on the school for a year, together with the three hundred dollars which the State had appropriated in years gone by for the use of poor children. This was also secured through the agency of Dr. Stillman for the free school of Plainfield, and thus the sum of four hundred dollars was obtained with which to start the work, and the public school was founded Aug. 16, 1847.

But when this point was reached he looked around for a suitable building, and there was none to be found. Finally it was decided to select two buildings, one at the lower end of the town and one at the upper end, the latter being the upper story of a deserted cabinet-shop, and the other at the west end a deserted and dilapidated hatter's shop. But after a short time they were found to be entirely inadequate to the purpose, and through the persistency of Dr. Stillman another law was passed by the Legislature appropriating two thousand dollars for the purpose of building a school-house and defraying other expenses of the school. Thus it is seen that this important work was accomplished. Dr. Charles H. Stillman, M.D., was for thirty-four years the trustee, and also in 1847 as township superintendent of schools, and held the last position for twenty years, or until the office of superintendent was abolished. He was then re-elected under the new law as a school trustee, and for fourteen years more or until his death was president of the board. The success of his work as seen in our public school system is his best eulogy.

The following statistical report relates to the city schools of District No. 12: Amount of apportionment from the State, including the two-mill tax and the $100,000, $6772.72; amount of district school tax voted for payment of teachers' salaries, $13,146.24; amount voted for building purposes, $5389.40; amount ordered to be raised, $18,535.64; total amount received from all sources for public schools, $25,308.37; present value of the school property, $56,000; number of children in the district between five and eighteen years of age, 2019; number enrolled, 1258; male teachers, 1; female teachers, 23.

Board of Education.—President, Jacob Kirkner; Secretary, John W. Murray; Mason W. Tyler, Nathan Harper.

There are under the care of the board four schools, viz., one high school, one grammar school, and two primary schools. These are all under the direction of Miss J. E. Bulkley, principal. The High School is on Union, corner of Fifth Street. Teachers: Misses J. E. Bulkley, C. E. Niles, Anna Stevens, and A. H. Morton. Grammar school, on the corner of Fifth and Union Streets, Miss C. R. Runyon, Mrs. E. R. Hallock, Misses Mariana Shreve, E. L. Gavett, A. M. Day, Cornelia Anderson, P. R. Fisher, teachers. Primary school, on Fifth Street; teachers: Misses M. E. Humpston, A. B. Miller, A. W. Booream, S. L. Wood, A. E. Wilson. Special: Miss E. J. Utter, teacher of vocal music. Primary school, on Fourth Street; teachers: Misses Josephine Shreve, F. A. Willets, S. G. Kenny, E. U. Force, J. J. Ketcham, and E. A. Holmes.

The average attendance in all the schools for the last school year has been 937, and teachers' salaries average: in the primary grade, $300 to $550; in the grammar grade, $500 to $600; in the high school grade, $600 to $1200.

The following is the list of teachers from 1866 to 1882: Miss Julia E. Bulkley, September, 1872; principal, October, 1881–82. Mr. T. J. Miller, High School, October, 1881. Miss Mary A. Gleim, 1881. Miss Ellen E. Niles, September, 1869. Miss Mary E. Lavender, November, 1880. Grammar department: Miss Carrie B. Runyon, September, 1866. Annie M. Day, September, 1881. Mariana Shreve, August, 1875. The Friends' select school was established in 1878 in the new brick Orthodox Meeting-House on Front Street. It is upon a basis of moral as well as intellectual training. The school has a large number of pupils. Elizabeth Burton, principal; Annie Gillies, assistant principal.

The Quakers.—Quakers first settled in the southeasterly parts of this township and in Raritan in 1728, and about the year 1735 many settled on the line of Green Brook, just under the "Blue Hills," as that portion of the First Mountain was often called. The following names are among those of the early settlers:

Nathan Vail, Isaac Vail, Amos Vail, Edward Vail, Joel Vail, Ralph Shotwell, Daniel Shotwell, John Shotwell, Elijah Shotwell, Isaac Webster, Joseph Shotwell, Samuel Shotwell, Smith Shotwell, Zachariah Shotwell, Ephraim Vail, James Vail, John A. Vail, Abram Vail, Jonah Vail, Webster Thorne, Hugh Thorne, John Thorne, Hugh Townsend, Jothan Townsend, and Elijah Pound. These are the names of the first families, and many descendants of most of them are still living, some in the immediate vicinity, and some scattered widely over the country.

A Weekly Meeting was held at the house of John Laing, near "Tow Town," about the year 1723, and Oct. 16, 1725, they applied to the Friends at Woodbridge Meeting for the privilege of holding their meetings nearer their homes on account of distance and bad roads, as it was a long distance to ride every First Day. Their request was granted, but on the 21st of September, 1728, the day of the Plainfield Meeting was changed from the first to the fourth day of the week, in order not to affect the attendance at the Woodbridge Meeting, which was held on the first day, and the residence of the Laings was still the place appointed for service, although John, the promoter of it, was dead. He bequeathed to the Friends a plot of ground on which to build a meeting-house, and on the 27th of March, 1731, the Woodbridge Monthly Meeting gave them permission for its construction, directing that it should not exceed in its dimensions twenty-four feet square and fourteen feet "between joyns." It was completed and all accounts settled by the latter part of the year 1736. In 1744 a "hors stable" was built adjoining the new meeting-house, towards which, as well as towards the building of the meeting-house itself, the Woodbridge Friends liberally subscribed. Here in their burial-ground the first of these families were buried "near the meeting-house," and here their meetings were held for many years.

At their Quarterly Meeting held in 1786 the question was agitated as to the propriety of removing the meeting-house "at John Laing's, deceased, to the settlement at the plains," and for some months the matter was spoken of, until, in 1788, a decided step was taken, and a plot of land was purchased near the depot in the city of Plainfield, and the present building (which is "shingled on the sides") was built. It is still kept in excellent condition, and the surrounding grounds "well fenced and free from brambles." The old meeting-house was removed to this site, and for a time used. They have built substantial horse-sheds, and in the rear of them is their place of interment. As usual but few stones or inscriptions can be found in the yard here. Here rest the dead of one hundred years ago.

The rise and progress of the Society of Friends here has been slow, many having moved to different States and formed colonies, and many of their descendants are still found faithful to the principles of their belief.

Within a few years the second meeting-house has been built of brick. It is neat in appearance, and the upper part is used for a Friends' school. This building is pleasantly situated on the main street.

The following items of interest are found in connection with the early meetings of the Friends:

From the minutes of the Monthly Meeting assembled on the 17th of July, 1755, we learn that legacies had been bequeathed at different times to this meeting, and one item is recorded of the half-acre given by John Laing for building the meeting-house at Plainfield.

In the same meeting the question "respecting a man's marrying his wife's first cousin" was considered, and it was decided that it was a difficult matter to determine. Nevertheless the prohibition of such marriages heretofore existing among the Friends was reaffirmed as the wisest and safest plan to be adopted.

At this time (1758) George Parker had the charge of the meeting-house, and Robert Willis was one of the most active ministers of the Quakers in this part of the country.

In 1760 a proposition was made in the month of August "to remove the Plainfield meeting-house from John Laing's to its present site," which was done twenty-five years after, in 1786. In 1761 a "Preparative Meeting" was established at John Laing's meeting, preceding the Monthly Meeting; one at Woodbridge, etc.

During 1762 the question of holding several Monthly Meetings at Plainfield instead of confining them to Woodbridge was mooted. Afterwards it was altered to include Rahway, and was held there and at Plainfield alternately. For several years the question of holding negroes in bondage had agitated the society. "A report to the Monthly Meeting at Plainfield in August, 1774, shows that at this time only one negro 'fit for freedom' within the jurisdiction of the society remained a slave."¹

"This [Plainfield] meeting is informed that Benjamin Harris has signed a paper for independency, and has suffered his apprentice to go in the army, and has received his wages. Several Friends tried to show Benjamin the error of his ways, but he refused to give them any satisfaction for his misconduct. He was therefore cut off from their communion."

The Quaker meeting-house here was occupied during a part of 1776 by soldiers. Robert Willis, who was a Quaker preacher, had some idea of visiting the South in 1778, but "great commotion" (in Plainfield, where his letter is dated), "occasioned by the war," prevented his contemplated journey. He was loath to leave his friends in the midst of so much distress. A committee for the relief of sufferers was formed this year, consisting of Abraham Shotwell, William Smith, Hugh Webster, John Vail, William Thorne, and Elijah Pound. Subsequently Thorne resigned, and Edward Moore was chosen in his place. Thorne said in the November meeting at Rahway that he was compelled to affirm his allegiance to the Continental Congress several months before, having no choice except to do that or be thrown into prison. Elijah Pound did the same thing, and was therefore relieved of his position on the committee just mentioned, being allowed to resign. Under similar circumstances and at the same time, probably, another Quaker living in this section got into difficulty. He says, "Whereas, I, Marmaduke Hunt, was coming home, was taken by a party of light-horse and carried to Morris Town Goal, where I was confined in a noxious room to the injury of my health and deprived of the necessities of life to that degree that I could procure no more for my support but one meal for seven days. In this distress liberty was offered me on condition of my taking the affirmation of fidelity to the States, which through unwatchfulness I submitted to." John Laing tells the same story. He also was taken to Morristown and locked up for several days in what he describes as a "very loathsome goal," being liberated only on making affirmation of allegiance. Much of the personal property of the Friends was confiscated for taxes and fines at the time when the spirit of resistance to British aggression was overpowering in the colonies.

Their proposition for removal of the meeting-house from John Laing's to the new site in Plainfield dates on the 15th of November, 1789. The dimensions of the new building were to be thirty-four by forty-eight feet. It is now substantially the same as when it was erected about ninety years ago. A recent fire injured the southern part of it, but it was repaired in a style similar to the unburnt portion. May it long remain as a memento of that time long past of which all our dreams are poetic, but which, alas! was a time to many of bitter griefs and scalding tears.

Acts were passed in 1870 and 1874 in relation to school funds, authorizing the trustees of Friends' schools at Plainfield, N. J., to appropriate portions of the general school funds for educational purposes.

CHAPTER XLVI.

First Baptist Church.—The history of this church in Plainfield dates from the year 1818. When it was organized it was in a thinly-settled part of Westfield township, said to contain less than 300 inhabitants. The only places of evangelical worship in the vicinity were the Piscataway Church, established in 1689; the Scotch Plains Church, in 1747; and the Samptown Church, in 1792. Many of the Baptist families in this locality, when not worshiping with either of these churches, used to meet in private dwellings till 1812, when the academy was built. Here a general meeting was called in January, 1818, to consider the feasibility of starting a new church. About seventy-five persons were present, mostly of the Baptist persuasion, and by them it was deemed expedient to attempt the movement. The amount of $2500 was raised for the erecting of a house of worship. A plot of ground was secured on the main street, the site of the present beautiful stone edifice. During the summer of 1818 ground was broken and a frame building erected 42 by 48 feet, covered and inclosed with cedar shingles, at a cost of $3500. The building committee reported the completion of the house in the fall, when the Rev. Jacob Fitz Randolph and a number of members from the Samptown and Piscataway Churches, Nov. 7, 1818, with other members, met and unanimously adopted the articles of faith, and this church was organized with Rev. Jacob Fitz Randolph as pastor, Daniel Fitz Randolph and John Manning, deacons, and Drake Dunn, church clerk. This church was fully organized with thirty-four members, Nov. 25, 1818, and Dec. 14, 1818, the first board of trustees was elected. The Rev. Jacob Fitz Randolph, the first pastor, was born in Middlesex County, N. J., 1756; at an early age united, June 10, 1786, with the Scotch Plains Baptist Church. He served as a pastor with the Mount Bethel Church, where he was ordained in 1791, where he served for two years, and left to take charge of the new church organized in the year 1792 at Samptown, where he served for nearly twenty-five years, and with a number left and became the pastor of the new organization in Plainfield. During his pastorate here until his death, Jan. 18, 1828, he was beloved by the congregation, and a large number were added to the church through his labors.

Rev. Dacioi T. Hill became the next pastor, and during his stay here extensive revivals blessed the church with a largely increased membership; some two hundred and eighty-five were added to the church. In the year 1837 the church was enlarged. He resigned in the year 1839.

The Rev. Simeon J. Drake accepted a call in July of the same year. During his pastorate (1849) the trustees purchased and beautified a suitable plot of ground for a cemetery. Extensive revivals during Mr. Drake's pastorate added many to the church. The church was repaired at an expense of some $2350, which materially improved its appearance and accommodations. When his labors ceased on the earth, Sunday morning, April 13, 1862, the church was called to part with a wise counselor, a sympathizing friend, a zealous pastor, and a devout Christian. With united hearts all cherish the memory of his devoted life and peaceful death as a valuable legacy to the church.

After Mr. Drake's death there was an interval of little more than a year when there was no pastor.

But for several successive months immediately following his death the church enjoyed the gospel preaching of the venerable "Father Webb." Never will this people forget his kind words of comfort and consolation in that time of bereavement, and his prayers of faith and counsels of love from a heart rich with a long life of sweet intimacy with his Master.

Rev. David J. Yerkes accepted a call to this church in 1863. His previous fields of labor had been, first, with the church at Hollidaysburg, Pa., in 1849, next with the First Church of Pittsburgh, in 1856, and just before coming to Plainfield, his charge for three years was the First Church of Brooklyn. Shortly after Mr. Yerkes' settlement the old church building, around which clustered so many hallowed memories, became no longer suitable in size or convenience for the increasing demands of an enlarged membership and the accommodation of a growing community. The old frame meeting-house, still needed for worship until the new edifice was erected, was moved aside far enough to give room for the heavy foundation walls of a large stone structure, the corner-stone of which was laid Oct. 8, 1867. This edifice, 60 by 100 feet, built in the modern Romanesque style, was completed and furnished at a cost of about $75,000 on the 25th day of November, 1869, when the dedication services were held and an appropriate discourse delivered by Rev. George B. Ide, D.D., of Massachusetts. During the pastorate and up to this time nearly one thousand persons have been received into this church, and since the organization of this church, 1818, there have been added nearly seventeen hundred persons.

The church is now almost threescore years old, and has had but four pastors, making the average length of each pastorate about sixteen years.

Deacons who have served the church are Daniel Fitz Randolph, John Manning, Thomas Stead, Drake Dunn, William Supardus, Benjamin Stelle, Manning Stelle, James T. Dunn, Elston Marsh, Oliver Runyon, Manning Verneule, Daniel Fitz Randolph, Insley Boice, Peter Balen, Stephen H. Burr, and John S. Baldwin.

Church clerks have been Drake Dunn, Benjamin Stelle, Jefferson R. Dunn, John Wilson, James C. Ayres, Elston Marsh, and Oliver B. Leonard.

Sunday-school superintendents have been Jefferson R. Dunn, Benjamin Stelle, Jacob A. Wood, James C. Ayres, David Lenox, Oliver Runyon, Levi Hatfield, Elston M. Dunn, O. B. Leonard, William White, W. M. Gray, S. H. Burr, and Charles W. McCutchen.

Trustees, William White, Jeremiah Manning, L. W. Serrell, Nelson W. Gardner, David F. Boice, Alexander Gilbert, and George A. Chapman.

Treasurer, Nelson W. Gardner.

Sittings, 1200; membership, 779.

Presbyterian Church.—It was not until the 10th of July, 1825, that this the First Presbyterian Church of Plainfield was organized. Yet it is well understood that there were a few families of this faith settled in and about this section of Westfield township, and that they had connected themselves with the Presbyterian Churches at Bound Brook and Westfield, and they felt no little inconvenience from the distance that they had to go to attend church, therefore occasionally came the respective pastors of these churches and held services in the neighboring school-house, or in their private dwellings.

For a long time they had consulted together upon the subject of building a suitable building for the regular worship on the Sabbath, and after due consideration they appointed certain of their members to solicit help from the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, and their wish was granted them to have certain members of that body to preach to them occasionally; and at the date mentioned in 1825 this church was duly organized with eighteen members by a committee of the Presbytery, and the Lord's Supper was first administered to this little flock under the shade of some large trees by the Rev. Dr. John McDowell.

In 1827 the edifice was finished and dedicated to the worship of God. The Rev. Lewis Bond became their pastor in 1825 and remained until April, 1857, a period of thirty-two years. He is still living at his residence a few doors from the church, and is able to enter and worship with the sons and daughters of his former parishioners. During his active ministry nearly five hundred were gathered as members. Of these over two hundred were received on certificate from other churches and nearly three hundred on examination. During that time over two hundred were dismissed to other churches, of whom eighty-six united in forming the Second Presbyterian Church of Plainfield, under the care of the Presbytery of Newark. When Rev. Mr. Bond relinquished the pastorate in 1857 there were but two members whose names were enrolled among the founders of this church, and in his quarter-century sermon preached in 1851 he says, "The memory of our kindred, the low whisper of our departed people, invite us to cast one more lingering look at the silent mansions of the dead. There lie entombed nearly two hundred of our flock. Age, Activity, Youth, and Infancy lie slumbering together. Others shall be added to their number, and the sigh of the mourner mingle with the clods of the valley, but these shall still sleep sweetly. In another quarter-century how many of us shall have departed? Who then shall occupy our places? Who shall then stand in this sacred desk, and to whom shall 'he hold forth the word of life?'"

For a few months the church had supplies from abroad, and in the year 1861 a unanimous call was made to Rev. Joseph B. Myers, D.D., which he accepted, and remained for two years, or until the summer of 1861. It being his desire to establish a college in the State of Florida, he immediately went thither. He was an excellent preacher, and highly esteemed by the congregation and the community.

In the fall of 1861 the church invited the Rev. Samuel M. Studdiford as their pastor, and he was installed in November of that year. During his pastorate of two years a number were received into the church. He is now the pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Trenton, N. J.

The Rev. Daniel V. McClean, D.D., came in 1864, and remained but a few months, and was followed by the Rev. Benjamin Cory, who came from Perth Amboy in 1865, and remained for five or six years, when he resigned; during his term many were added to the membership, the church property improved, and the church was in a prosperous condition.

During the fall of 1870, Rev. Henry L. Teller, a young, eloquent preacher, became the pastor of this church. He resigned to go to Amsterdam, N. Y., after a few months' labor here. The present pastor, Rev. Kneeland P. Ketcham, received a unanimous call to this church in 1871. He came from Allentown, Monmouth Co., N. J. Since his pastorate here the church has increased in membership. He has the love and esteem of this community, and a neat church and excellent congregation.

The following are the names of the elders from the organization: Robert Anderson, 1825; John Layton, 1825; Jarvis B. Ayres, 1833; Lucas B. Hoagland, 1841; Ephraim Coriell, 1847; Job Squire, 1847; Andrew A. Cadmus, Tunnison T. Soper, David Gorden, Peter Hoagland, E. Dean Dow, Ellis Potter, Samuel Milliken, Jr., and Isaac L. Miller, 1881. Communicants, 220; sittings, 450.

Second Baptist Church.—The Second Baptist Church was constituted in the meeting-house of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church, Sept. 1, 1842. The following were the constituent members: John Runyon, Esther Runyon, Ansel Denison, Sarah H. Denison, David Thickston, Mary Thickston, William Sutton, Charlotte Sutton, Samuel Webster, Jr., Mary Webster, William Estel, Mary T. Estel, Asa T. Waters, Mylo Waters, James W. Vail, Olive M. Vail, Isaac S. Manning, Mary Manning, Sarah Ann Manning, Eliza Kinsey, Jephtha Clawson, Thomas H. Force, William Terry, Firman Walker, Caleb Garret, Sarah A. Garret, Elizabeth Shreve, Margaret Ann Compton, Catherine Compton, Reune Runyon, Nathaniel F. R. Compton, Esther Shreve, Rebecca Lyon, Eliza Lyon, Christian Lyon, Eliza Borden, Nancy Holton, Clarinda Putnam, Catherine F. R. Compton, Samuel Webster, Martha Webster, Hannah Webster, Susan T. Parker, Martha Estel, Jannet Martin, Abby Martin, Jerome Pack, Samuel E. Pangborn, Jane Maria Randolph, Eliza F. Randolph, John C. Boice, Abraham Runyon, Jr., Sarah Flatt, Martha Randolph, Sarah A. Boice, Abraham Parker, Jacob Drake, Peter Runyon, Joseph Perine, Sarah Perine, Ezra D. Prudden, Rachel Prudden, John Chandler, Peter Moore, James C. Ayres, Bersheba Manning.

Many of the above had been members of the First Church who withdrew to form this the Second Church.

Rev. William Wood, Rev. J. Wyvell supplied the pulpit for a few Sabbaths. John Runyon was the first church clerk; David Thickston was made deacon.

The Rev. Daniel T. Hill received a call to the church, which he accepted, being their first regular pastor, and remained for about eleven years. Rev. Calvin C. Williams came in 1854, and after a useful service was dismissed in 1857. The church then extended a call to Rev. Horace J. Mason, who accepted and remained until the fall of 1859, when he resigned. For some months the church remained without a regular pastor, desiring to sell the edifice on the corner of Central Avenue and Second Street, which being accomplished they erected the building now occupied by Trinity Reformed Church at a cost of about nine thousand dollars. It is capable of seating about eight hundred persons. Rev. John Dace was invited to become their pastor in 1862; he accepted and remained for nearly six years; many were added to the church during his pastorate, and he left with the great regret of all his congregation. Rev. Charles E. Young became the pastor in 1869, remaining until the last Sabbath in December, 1870. In March, 1871, a unanimous call was made to Rev. S. R. Howlett, who accepted and assumed the pastoral charge on the second Sabbath in April, 1871. He remained until the fall of 1876, when this church dissolved its relations to the East New Jersey Baptist Association and became extinct. During its continuance for the space of thirty-four years there had been seven pastors and nearly eight hundred members. At the present time a number of the members of this church are connected with the Park Avenue Baptist Church.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—The history of this church properly begins with the year 1820. In this year there lived in Plainfield a Methodist lady by the name of Martin and also a family by the name of Spiby, who had been Methodists in England. In this latter family in the same year the Rev. Father Hancock, in passing through the place from Madison, N. J., led the evening devotions. This is believed to have been the first services of this denomination. The first regular Methodist meeting was at the house of Mr. Guion, who had recently moved from Long Island, and lived opposite Laing's Hotel in Front Street. John Briant led the meeting; there were six persons present. Rev. Mr. Gearhart, from New Providence, preached in 1822, and until 1825 Plainfield was made part of the very large circuit. Rev. Messrs. Wiggins and Best also preached during this time, using Mr. Guion's dwelling as their church. At the end of that year they had gathered about twenty members. During the year 1825 a lot was bought on Second Street, then called Barn Street, because the only building on the whole street was a barn. For a while the movement seemed promising, but as they were about ready to commence the erection of a house of worship a financial crisis came on, and for a while the work was abandoned.

RESIDENCE OF SEYMOUR HAIL,
PLAINFIELD, N. J.

About the year 1830-31, Mr. John Briant established prayer-meetings in his house, a three-story house, nearly opposite Laing's Hall. In this house for about a year occasional sermons were preached. Rev. Father Bartine, Revs. Genung and Day, Charles Pitman and others assisted, giving the young church occasional services. In the year 1832 efforts were put forth for a church 30 by 40, with an end gallery. The building committee were John Briant, David Codrington, John W. Morrison, Daniel Osman, and Wesley Roll, and in the following summer it was completed. In the spring of 1853 it was made a station with seventeen members. Rev. John H. McFarland became the first regular pastor. The following have since officiated: Rev. Edwin L. Jones, 1834; Rev. George S. Wharton, 1835; Rev. Benjamin Benson, 1836; Rev. Edward Sanders, 1837; Rev. Vincent Shepard, 1838-39; Rev. George F. Brown, 1840; Rev. Alexander Gilmore, 1841; Rev. Benjamin Kelley, 1842-43;¹ Rev. R. B. Westbrook, 1844; Rev. L. R. Dunn, 1845-46; Rev. James O. Rogers, 1847-48;² Rev. W. E. Perry came in 1849-50; Rev. Thomas H. McCarroll, 1851; Rev. Robert Given, 1852-53; Rev. John O. Winne, 1854-55; Rev. S. W. Hilliard, 1856-57; Rev. George Winsor, 1858-59; Rev. John Atkinson, 1860-61; Rev. S. Armstrong served the church for about nine months, when he was removed by death, and the Rev. Mr. Coyle was sent to fill the year; Rev. E. O. Day, 1863; Rev. A. M. Palmer, a revival that brought to the church over two hundred members, 1864-65; Rev. G. H. Whitney, 1866-67; Rev. William Day, 1867-68; Rev. J. R. Bryn, 1870-73; Rev. I. L. Hurlburt, 1875-77; Rev. William Day, 1878-80; Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, 1881-82; Rev. J. M. Meeker, 1881. Value of church property, $50,000. Sittings, twelve hundred; membership, six hundred and seven.

Seventh-Day Baptist Church.—This church, whose members had long and unitedly worshiped at New Market, some four miles from Plainfield, met and organized in the latter village in the year 1838. They built a neat frame building, at that time large enough to contain all that would attend. But as the membership increased with the growing village, avenues and streets were laid out, and it became an incorporated city of some thousands of inhabitants, the line of the Central Railroad coming near the church property, they immediately took steps to build a more commodious edifice, which was accomplished in 1868, thirty years from the date of organization. The pastors have been Revs. Lucius Crandell, Samuel Davison, James H. Cochran, James Bailey, A. R. Cornwall, Thomas R. Williams, Darwin E. Maxson. Present pastor, Rev. A. H. Lewis, D.D.; Deacons, Randolph Dunham, Isaac D. Titsworth, A. D. Titsworth, Isaac S. Dunn, Randolph Dunn, Clark Rogers; present deacons, Daniel B. Rogers, B. D. Randolph, Thomas H. Tomlinson, Thomas T. Randolph, J. D. Spicer; Clerks, Thomas S. Alberti (twenty-nine years); present clerk, J. D. Spicer (fifteen years to 1882). Number of sittings, four hundred; members, one hundred and ninety; value of property, five thousand dollars.

Mount Olive Baptist Church.—This organization of the colored residents of Plainfield was for some months in agitation while they were holding services in different places, and in 1870 they took the name of Mount Olive Baptist Church. The Rev. John Cary was called to assist them in their endeavor to establish a church, and he became their regular pastor in that year. Very soon lots were secured, not only for a church but also for the parsonage, which since then has been completed, on the corner of Liberty and Third Avenue. The church is of good size, with a tower, and capable of holding over two hundred. Rev. John D. Bagwell was called to assist Mr. Cary in raising the necessary funds and to help in the services, which he did acceptably until he was succeeded by Rev. William Burch in the spring of 1875. The latter remained until 1877, witnessing a large number of additions to the church. In 1877, Rev. Robert Newton Fairfax was called and accepted the pastoral charge, which he still retains. The present membership is one hundred and fifteen; value of church and parsonage, five thousand dollars.

The Second Presbyterian Church.—In 1844 the Second Presbyterian Church, Plainfield, was organized, and the year following their house of worship was completed and dedicated. The Rev. William Whittaker was called to this new organization, and in a short time accepted the pastorate, and received by certificate from the First Church some eighty-six members, who had withdrawn for the purpose of forming this new church, under the care of the Presbytery of Newark. Mr. Whittaker remained here until the year 1855, having during the eleven years of his ministry received a large number into the church. He left with much regret on the part of the church, and for a time they were without a pastor. Rev. Theodore S. Brown became the pastor in the fall of 1855; he served the church in this capacity about eight years. The present pastor, Rev. John Collins Bliss, D.D., was settled in the pastorate in November, 1867. For a number of years the church was situated on Front Street, rather out of the growing part of the city. In the year 1870 more eligible lots were secured on the corner of Crescent Avenue and Broadway, and the present beautiful edifice was erected. It is of Ohio stone, with a fine spire, and is capable of holding over one thousand persons. It was completed and the grounds surrounding the church graded and made neat and planted with shade-trees, at a cost of one hundred and four thousand dollars. It was dedicated in September, 1872, free from incumbrance. The beautiful parsonage on Front Street cost some twelve thousand dollars. The membership of this church is four hundred and seventy-five; the Sabbath-school contains nearly five hundred members. The ruling elders are as follows: William M. Conell, William B. Ostrom, Theodore Perry, Edmund V. Shotwell, Peter J. Smith, Israel C. Pierson, Henry C. Squires, William H. Sampson, and John R. Van Arsdale; Deacons, S. R. Struthers, Henry O. Newman, and Philip Swain. The present trustees are E. L. Brown, I. T. Closson, E. H. Bouton, O. B. Matthews, Charles Place, Lawrence Myers, and E. L. Wale. This church is now known as "The Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church of Plainfield."

Grace Church.—In the minute-book of the vestry of this parish it is recorded that the first services of the church were celebrated in the village school-house (Plainfield) on the 11th of January, 1852. This building is still standing, and is now a private dwelling-house on Church near the corner of Second Street. The Rev. Philemon E. Coe, of Westfield, N. J., officiated. There were about thirty persons present. Rev. Mr. Coe continued his services without any salary for six years, coming every Sabbath some six miles irrespective of inclement weather, and also loaned them money when they were ready to build a church, and afterwards canceled most of the indebtedness in behalf of the parish.

After Feb. 8, 1852, services were regularly held every Sunday morning. On Easter-day, 1852, the holy communion was celebrated, and nine persons communed. On June 9th a public meeting was held to consider the propriety of organizing a parish. Mr. Coe presided; Mr. Richard Brantingham was appointed secretary. The organization was effected by the election of James Oliver and Jasper Cadmus as wardens; Hugh Pattison, Elias Lynch, Dr. William H. Shodgate, Jacob Wiggins, Richard Brantingham, and George Windle, vestrymen.

On Sept. 21, 1852, the vestry resolved to accept the plot of ground offered by Mahlon Vail and David Rockwell, and on the 12th of July, 1854, the cornerstone was laid by Bishop Doane. The church edifice erected at this time was a neat Gothic structure. It appears from the record that the late rector, Mr. Coe, tendered his resignation Dec. 13, 1858, and resolutions are recorded about that time expressive of the regret of the vestry at his leaving, and speaking in terms of high commendation of his untiring efforts to organize and establish Grace Church, and his disinterested and self-sacrificing labors in its behalf.

Rev. W. W. Sever came for a time in 1859, then Rev. J. Legrand Finney was elected rector, but after a short service of a few months, endeavoring to build up a parish school, he became quite feeble, and for months he was not able to take an active part, and resigned after a short and successful ministry in this parish. Rev. Mr. Dougherty was next called to the rectorship of the parish, which he accepted, but remained only a few weeks, and Rev. R. G. Quennell was elected rector June 28, 1863. In the records not long after there is a vote of thanks to Miss Lloyd for the munificent Easter gift of a silver communion set in April, 1864. July, 1865, the Rev. Dr. Thrall became rector, and continued to officiate until April, 1868.

About this time, and during the early part of the rectorship of Rev. Dr. Fox, who was instituted June 1, 1868, an effort was made to secure a larger and more commodious edifice in a more central location. The building was erected, and consecrated by Bishop Odenheimer March 21, 1870.

After the resignation of Dr. Fox the Rev. W. W. Holly was called to the parish, but declined, when the present rector, Rev. E. M. Rodman, was chosen, and entered upon his duties Nov. 1, 1870. From April to July, 1872, the better to accommodate the increasing congregation, services were held in the hall at Laing's Hotel. After this the church on the old site was occupied till it was taken down and removed in 1876. In September, 1872, the vestry gave consent to the putting up of a memorial window to the memory of the late pastor, Dr. Fox, and also to Miss Taylor to put in one in memory of her parents, the Rev. Thomas H. Taylor, D.D., and his wife. On the 4th of October, 1875, a decision was reached to purchase lots ninety-five by three hundred feet on Sycamore Street between Fifth and Sixth, on which the church now stands, and the corner-stone was laid July 12, 1876. The building was removed and rebuilt here, and on the 15th of October following it was once more opened for worship. Since then the congregation has nearly doubled in size. There are nearly a hundred families identified with the parish. The valuation of property is $15,000. Wardens, John B. Dumont and William E. Lowe; Vestrymen, Thomas H. Pillis, Charles Tweedy, Gilford Mayer, E. L. Finch, O. T. Waring, E. N. Erickson, and William R. Cock.

The Central Reformed Dutch Church was organized in 1863. The Rev. John Simmonson, of Somerville, became their pastor in 1864-69, and Rev. N. E. Smith, 1869-71. This church after a few years was dissolved.

Trinity Reformed Church was organized in the year 1880 with a few members. They purchased the church on Second Street, which has been put in thorough order, repairs and all paid for by the Ladies' Aid Society, which was organized at the commencement of the year. This young and vigorous branch of Christ Church in Plainfield felt that there was room for them in this city, and their work has been put forward under the care of the Newark Classis.

The Rev. Andrew Van Vranken Raymond (son of the late Rev. Henry A. Raymond, who died at Cohoes, N. Y., July 18, 1877, in his seventy-third year) was invited to the pastorate of the infant church in the fall of 1880, he being then pastor of the Reformed Church at Paterson, N. J. He accepted and entered upon his duties Jan. 1, 1881. During the past year the church membership has grown from seventy-nine to one hundred and fifty-six, of whom sixteen united on confession of faith. They have paid all current expenses, amounting to over $4500, including $500 of arrears, have made extensive repairs, and have just completed the payment of a debt of $2500 before it was due.

Official members: Elders, Henry Lindsley, 1880-81; George L. Van Emburgh, 1880-83; Philip P. Van Arsdale, 1881-83; Daniel G. Van Winkle, 1881-82; R. Titsworth, 1882-83; William D. W. Miller, 1882-83.

Deacons, D. O. Kilbourn, 1880-83; Joseph Meier, 1881-83; Daniel Van Winkle, 1881-83; J. Renwick Glen, 1882-83.

Congregational Church.—This church was organized Sept. 30, 1879. For a few months previous the congregation had assembled for religious worship, and part of the time had occupied the Reformed (Dutch) Church on Second Street. They are encouraged by a liberal donation of land on the corner of Madison Avenue and Seventh Street, where they contemplate building a suitable church edifice at no very distant day. Rev. William Manchec is the present pastor. Deacons, A. J. Clarkson, J. S. Powelson, J. S. Lamson, J. R. France. Trustees, S. G. Roney, Jacob Kirknex, G. W. Rockfellow, P. M. Demarest. Executive Committee, E. Curtis, A. Willett, J. N. Randolph. B. W. Force, church clerk. Sunday-school superintendent, G. W. Rockfellow. Number of communicants, one hundred and twelve.

Park Avenue Baptist Church was organized March 18, 1876, with one hundred and twenty members. The movement was intended to meet the wants of a new and growing portion of the city. The Seventh-Day Church edifice was hired for Sunday services. Robert Lowry, D.D., who had been professor of belles-lettres in Lewisburg University, Pennsylvania, for six years, and who was sojourning in Plainfield for rest, was induced to assume the pastoral charge. A Sunday-school was organized under the leadership of the pastor.

An eligible lot, two hundred and fifty feet front by two hundred and fifty feet deep, on the corner of Prospect and Park Avenues, was given by James Martine, Esq., and on this commanding site the present church edifice was erected at a cost of forty thousand dollars.

In external appearance and internal arrangement this church edifice is a departure from the usual forms of ecclesiastical architecture. Of no defined type, it impresses the eye with its novelty. The material is pressed brick, terra-cotta trimmings and slate roof. The spire rises to the height of one hundred and forty feet, and is conspicuous in every direction. A Meneley bell hangs in the tower. The windows are of stained glass. The main entrance is in the tower, and there are three others, making ample and easy egress for a large audience.

The arrangements within are unique. The different parts of the audience-rooms are so related to each other that the entire floor space of church and chapel may be thrown into one grand audience-room, seating one thousand persons. The main audience-room measures sixty-five by fifty-eight feet. The floor inclines from three sides towards the pulpit. There are no pews in the church, but five hundred opera-chairs are arranged in concentrically curved lines, each one provided with a book-rack, hat-safe, and foot-rest. The extreme height of the ceiling is forty-five feet. The floor is laid in hard wood. The organ-loft is on one side of the pulpit. In the rear is the entrance to the pastor's study, choir-gallery, dressing-rooms, etc.

The chapel is built in right angles with the church, and consists of two stories. The lower floor measures seventy by thirty-eight feet. It is divided for Sunday-school purposes into three apartments, separated by glass doors. The ceiling is twenty-eight feet high. When all the glass doors are removed there is an available floor space of one hundred and three by seventy feet.

The upper story of the chapel is reached by the tower entrance and the chapel vestibule. It is divided into a church parlor, ladies' parlor, kitchen, pantry, china closet, store-room, and committee rooms. The walls on both floors are covered with fine engravings and Scripture mottoes. Everything needed for religious or social purposes is provided. The ground plan covers one hundred and fifty-three feet by seventy feet. The entire building is heated by steam. Charles H. Smith is the architect.

ROBERT LOWRY, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, March 12, 1826. After receiving a common school education he engaged in secular business in his native city. In 1848 he entered the university in Lewisburg, Pa., as a ministerial student, and was graduated in 1854, receiving valedictory honors. In the same year he was ordained and accepted a call to the First Baptist Church, West Chester, Pa. Here he remained four years, during which time a new church edifice was built. In 1858 he assumed the pastorate of the Bloomingdale Baptist Church, New York City. In 1861 he was called to the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he labored over eight years. During this pastorate about four hundred members were added to the church. In 1869 he was induced to accept the professorship of belles-lettres in the university at Lewisburg and the pastorate of the Baptist Church. After performing this double work for six years he retired with the honorary title of D.D. to Plainfield, N. J. He was subsequently elected chancellor of the university. Shortly after reaching Plainfield a new church was organized, which called him to its pastorate. This movement led to the erection of the Park Avenue Church, at a cost of forty thousand dollars. Multitudes know him as a composer of sacred song rather than as a preacher. His melodies are sung in every English-speaking land. Some of his hymns have been translated into foreign tongues. Music and hymnology are favorite studies with him. His library consists largely of literary works. In 1880 he spent four months in Europe, and participated in the Robert Raikes centennial in London. His oldest son is a pastor in Colorado.

St. Mary's (Catholic) Church.—In the year 1849 a few Catholic families living in this part of the county of Union and having no church nearer than Stony Hill or New Brunswick importuned the Rev. Archbishop Hughes, then living in New York, to come and give them occasional services. In 1853, the Rev. James S. McDonough was sent as their regular pastor. Services were held in a room of a private house, still standing on Somerset Street. This little flock increased, and soon it was found necessary to procure a place much larger than where they were, and a building that had been used as a barn was neatly fitted up. The doors opened into a little green orchard, and in this lonely spot, in the stillness of a calm American summer's morning, the great sacrifice of Calvary was repeated for the salvation of man.

After a few months a private school-room was rented, then a hall where all could attend. It had now been thought best that an attempt should be made to raise funds for building a neat church. In 1854, Rev. William McDonough was removed, and a young priest, Rev. Daniel J. Fisher, appointed pastor. He remained pastor until 1856, when he was appointed president of Seton Hall College, then located at Madison, N. J.

In the summer of 1856 the Rev. Terrence Kieran became the third pastor, and remained as such up to his sudden death in November, 1869, when the Rev. John J. Connolly was appointed to succeed him. This young gentleman's health was very poor when he came to this city, and remained but a few months before he died, in 1870, much lamented by his parishioners.

The present pastor, Rev. J. P. Morris, came a few weeks prior to Father Connolly's death in 1870, and is still the esteemed and zealous pastor.

They have built a substantial brick church on the corner of Sixth Street and Liberty Street, at an expense of about thirty-five thousand dollars. They have a large number of families in the parish.

The German Reformed Church was organized in the year 1873. They have secured eligible lots on the corner of Washington and Fifth Streets, where they have built a neat chapel. There are a large number of German citizens in this city who attend the regular services. They intend soon to build a substantial church edifice. The Rev. F. E. Schlieder is pastor.

The Church of the Heavenly Rest was organized in 1879 as a mission in Evona, the pastors of the Protestant Episcopal Churches of Plainfield having occasionally assisted in the services. They are about finishing a neat chapel at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars, with sittings to accommodate some two hundred and fifty persons. The following gentlemen have given material aid to this enterprise: Charles S. Lewis, John O. Stevins, George Brown, and Frederick Chamberlin.

The Business of Plainfield.—The following is a list of the principal business interests of this city: Groceries, 18; meat-shops, 14; dry-goods stores, 7; flour, feed, and grain dealers, 7; lumber dealers, 4; bakers and confectioners, 7; confectioners, 6; baled hay, 4; national banks, 2; savings-bank, 1; barber-shops, 11; billiard-saloons, 5; blacksmiths, 9; book-sellers and stationers, 3; boot and shoe dealers, 10; brick manufactories, 3; cabinet-makers, 3; carpet-weavers, 3; carpenters and builders, 14; masons and builders, 7; builders, 4; carriage manufactories, 5; stair-builders, 2; ready-made clothing, 5; merchant tailors, 5; clothing manufactory, 1; coal and wood dealers, 7; crockery- and glassware-stores, 2; drug-stores, 5; millinery- and fancy-goods stores, 11; expresses, 6; fish and oyster dealers, 5; florists, 8; furniture dealers, 4; hardware, cutlery, farming implements, and builders' supply stores, 3; harness-oil and boot-blackening manufactory, 1; hat manufactories, 2; harness-shops, 4; hats, caps, furs, trunks, etc., 2; stores, hotels, 8; ice dealers, 3; insurance agencies, 8; iron- and brass-foundry, 1; steam-laundry, 1; livery-stables, 7; looking-glass, pictures, frames, and artists' materials, 2; stores, machine-shops, 3; oil-cloth factory, 1; marble-works, 1; dealers in masons' materials, 6; newsdealers, 2; job-printers, 2, and several amateurs; weekly newspapers, 3; daily, 1; paint-shops, 5; photograph-rooms, 3; dealers in pianos and organs, 3; planing- and moulding-mills, 2; printing-press works, 1; saloons and bar-rooms, 14; schools, 7; sewing-machine-dealers, 3; bluestone yards, 2; dealers in stoves and tinware, 6; cigar dealers, 10; upholsterers, 6; undertakers, 3; watch and jewelry dealers, 7; plumbing and gas-fitting shops, 3; real estate agents, 13; beer-bottlers, 2; mineral water manufactory, 1; flour-mills, 4; saw-mills, 2; wood-turning shop, 1; dealers in hides and sheep-pelts, 1; soap manufactory, 1; intelligence offices, 2; sulphur baths, 1; kindling-wood factories, 3; gas-works, 1.

The accompanying list gives the number in the learned professions, trades, and callings represented in the city:

Clergymen, 10; physicians, 19; lawyers, 18; artists, 3; architects, 4; dentists, 7; mining engineer, 1; civil engineers, 2; carpenters, 109; cigar-makers, 11; carriage-makers, 8; cattle-brokers, 3; coachmen, 24; compositors, 17; confectioners, 9; cabinet-makers, 6; clerks, 107; contractors, 3; cutters, 8; barbers, 16; brick-makers, 9; blacksmiths, 21; butchers, 29; bakers, 20; dyers, 2; dress-makers, 27; hatters, 45; harness-makers, 9; hotel-keepers, 8; laboring men, 180; machinists, 5; masons, 40; millers, 9; milliners, 5; painters, 56; plumbers and gas-fitters, 11; shoe-makers, 24; tailors, 43; teachers, 27. Besides these we have a sprinkling of auctioneers, chemists, correspondents, editors, reporters, students, packers, chairmakers, drivers, surveyors, book-keepers, white-washers, taxidermists, scroll-sawyers, stone-cutters, spike-makers, rustic-workers, shirt-makers, well-drivers and diggers, gunsmiths, deliverers, expressmen, watch-makers, engravers, carpet-weavers, sash-makers, tinsmiths, musicians, marble-cutters, building-movers, veterinary surgeons, telegraph-operators, slaters, trimmers, lathers, sextons, boarding-house-keepers, tanners, wheelwrights, boiler-cleaners, die-sinkers, mining engineers, organist, and milkmen, hucksters, missionaries, gentlemen of leisure, generals, colonels, majors, captains, and so on ad libitum.

As early as the closing years of the last century there were one or two hat-factories established here on a small scale, which were managed by Theodore Pound and Piatt Williamson, and in a few years after John Wilson appears carrying on quite an extensive business. His place was where the clothing-house of Messrs. Schepflin, Baldwin, & Tweedy is located, and here he did (for those days) a large business. He was succeeded by his son, Joel Wilson, and hat manufacturing became a leading industry, with which many names well known to the city were identified. Among these we may mention Joseph Shotwell, James Leonard, James I. Compton, Martin Runyon, Elisha Runyon, Ira Randolph, Randolph Runyon, John H. Coward, James C. Ayers, Peter Brokaw, Daniel C. Shotwell, Jonah Vail, John Simpson, Manning Vermeule, and William McD. Coriell. There may have been some others not now remembered. It is impossible to ascertain the extent of the business at any stage in the development of this manufacturing interest. But it is discovered that large numbers of workmen were kept employed, that a ready market was found for the products in New York and Philadelphia, and that there was great activity and large returns.¹ It is worthy of note in this connection that there were no railroad facilities, but goods were transported largely by wagons both to and from New York and Philadelphia, though the distance by this method of transportation was shortened by shipping stock to and from Elizabeth and Trenton.

The introduction of silk hats was the first cause, so far as can be ascertained, of the decline of this industry, which was so long the life of the town. Then it became customary for the large city dealers to make contracts and furnish the manufacturer with his material, which greatly limited the profits of the latter. These reasons, together with the application of machinery to the making of hat bodies, are accounted the principal ones for the almost total extinction of this industry where it once had a chief place.

Up to within a few years the manufacture of clothes flourished to quite a large extent. At one time there were several firms engaged in this business, such as Webster & Marsh, Titsworth & Dunn, Henry Cory, and J. S. Dunham. These were well-known firms, and did a large business; they gave employment to multitudes in the town and vicinity, and were in so far the means of developing the industrial and commercial life of the place. While a marked change has taken place in the character of the business, there is, probably, a larger sum represented in the business now than formerly, on account of the presence here of the large house of Schepflin & Co., whose sales, as far as we are able to ascertain, crowd closely upon a million of dollars annually. A few others who manufacture in a small way complete the list of those engaged in the clothing business.

We have now mentioned the two chief manufacturing interests which have flourished in Plainfield. In addition to these are several of minor importance in comparison. At the head of these is the flour interests. Beyond the time to which the memory of any now living extends there have been flouring-mills at different points, but they were only used as grist-mills to grind the grain consumed in the immediate vicinity. Two of these original mills have an unbroken history to the present day. The one now for many years conducted by Phineas Fitz Randolph was owned by his father before him, by George Wells, also by Nathaniel Drake, the brother of Daniel Drake, and also by his father, which carries the proprietorship back nearly to the days of the colonies and the beginning of our existence as a nation. The other mill is that now owned by Phineas M. French, which was originally located near the dam of the pond that feeds it. From an ordinary grist-mill this has for many years been manufacturing flour and other products, until it now does a business much larger than all the mills in this vicinity combined, amounting to about $100,000 per annum. Mr. French's two sons carry on the business at the present time.

Next to this may be mentioned the manufacture of bread and cake, which, however, is entirely limited to home consumption. Six of these bakeries are organized to supply the wants of this city. Formerly this business had a wider range under the enterprising management of Mr. Jackson Pound, who made a reputation throughout the State by some of his products. He competed with Newark, New Brunswick, and Trenton, sending out his wagons loaded with material in every direction. But that glory has departed, and Plainfield must look to something besides crackers to make her famous. The manufacture of candy is carried on to some extent in the city. Mr. Compton has been the sole wholesale manufacturer until recently, when other firms have commenced its manufacture. There is something done in the harness-making and also in carriage-making. The Potter Press Works, which have but lately been established near Erona, and also the oil-cloth works of Newhall & Wright, of New York, which within a few months have been at work, are important industries; also the sash- and blind-factory. The putting up of canned fruits has been tried here with some success, and may be a growing enterprise. Formerly the manufacture of boots and shoes would have deserved mention in this connection, but now but little is done in that line. The manufacture of inks and blacking is now carried on by two firms quite extensively, and is having a large sale. An effort should be made to encourage manufacturers to locate here, for there are certain patent reasons why this would be a benefit both to the manufacturers and to the city. The latter is supplied with abundant water-power, plenty of coal brought to the door from the mines, and also a large gas-house for lighting buildings for factory purposes where light is needed. In short, there is every possible advantage to be gained by encouraging the growth of manufactures in this city and vicinity.

There are three weekly newspapers and one daily,—the Central New Jersey Times, the Constitutionalist, and Daily and Weekly Bulletin. There are three public halls,—Van Deventer Hall, with a seating capacity of seven hundred, Assembly Hall, seating five hundred, and Laing's Hall, which seats some three hundred. There are two national banks, one savings-bank, and three fire insurance companies. The fire department is under control of a board of managers in the city, and is well equipped with men and steam fire-engines. The hotels and boarding-houses are first class, affording excellent accommodations. The educational advantages of this city are of an excellent order, and furnish first-class instruction to both sexes. This city is not deficient in its religious and charitable institutions, having four Baptist, two Presbyterian, two Episcopal, one Methodist Episcopal, one Congregational, one Reformed (Dutch) Church, two Friends' Meetings, and one Roman Catholic Church. Some of the church edifices may claim considerable architectural pretension. Two of the largest buildings are of stone, having a seating capacity of one thousand each, are costly in their construction, and provided with every convenience.

The Young Men's Christian Association was organized in 1867. They have a fine reading-room and a library of some two thousand volumes. The Relief Association is thoroughly organized for the benefit of the needy, and furnishes help through an employment bureau to those who are able to work; it also dispenses clothing, food, medicine, etc., through a scrutinizing executive board of self-denying ladies,—Mrs. G. W. Ferry, president; Mrs. C. E. Ryder, vice-president. The Children's Home is organized for the care and support of little ones,—orphans, half-orphans, or those whose parents are incompetent to provide for their necessary wants. The Holly Tree Inn is a place where the youth of the city can find a welcome, an abundance of reading matter, and a simple lunch without any evil temptation. And last we may gratefully mention the Muhlenberg Hos- pital. The building has been lately completed, and is now in operation. It was incorporated in the spring of 1877, and is located on an eligible lot, the gift of the late mayor, Job Male, Esq., of this city. The corner-stone was laid in May, 1881, and the building was completed in the autumn.

Post-Offices.—The first post-office in this city was in the year 1806. It was then part of the township of Westfield. Mr. Sannel Manning was appointed postmaster, he being not only the inn-keeper, but also proprietor of a general country store. The letters were kept in one corner of the bar-room, and here the mail was made up about twice a week. A stage from Amboy passed through this village and stopped at "Manning's Inn" for dinner, carrying a package of letters tied up "and placed in the general bag of all the district for miles around." In the year 1813 a regular route was established from Easton to Elizabeth Town Point. It was called the "Swiftsure," and "Gummins Line," which had its headquarters in the hamlet of Lyons Farms, near Newark, N. J. There Mr. Gummins lived and changed his horses at the same time that the "Newark and York" letters were being assorted. In 1830 this route was abandoned, and Jacob Manning, the son of the inn-keeper (who had died Sept. 20, 1817, in his forty-second year), carried the mail in a bag upon a horse or in a sulky, and for many years carried the mail for a large scope of country, as well as verbal messages including the news of the day. He is now living on Front Street in this city, nearly ninety years of age, and tells us that he was always a welcome visitor, for he carried the news of one neighborhood to the next, being intrusted with many confidential communications, and among the proud recollections of that period is the consciousness that he never broke his "troths" with any one.

In the year 1838, Mr. Jacob Manning gave up the business of carrying and assorting the mails, and the late Dr. John Craig took charge of it, and had the office in his drug-store on the corner of Park Avenue and Front Street, where he had a corner fitted up for the mail-bag and conveniences for correspondence; "many coming from a distance would answer these letters in the drug-store before returning home." The next postmaster was Elias Kirkpatrick, from 1850 to 1857; he was also and still is a magistrate. Elston Dunn was appointed in 1860, and held the office seven years, when Wallace Vail received the appointment, and held the office fifteen years. Elias R. Pope received the appointment Feb. 23, 1882. He was born at Dunellen, March 8, 1836. His ancestor was a Revolutionary soldier, and did good service in the war. His father, John Pope, owned lands in Piscataway township which are still in the family. Mr. Pope removed to this city in 1849, and was clerk for seventeen years with Isaac S. Dunham. He has been since 1866 a dry-goods merchant, latterly of the firm of Pope Brothers.

Banks.—"The Plainfield Bank," the first institution of the kind in the village, obtained a charter in 1837, and did business for some time. Its charter was repealed in 1847 by act of the Legislature.

N. Brass was the cashier, but the name of the president does not appear on the single bill in the possession of the writer.

In 1859 a charter was granted for the "Union County Bank." This institution was more successful than its predecessor, and remained in operation until superseded by the First National Bank of Plainfield.

First National Bank.—This institution was first organized in 1868. It has a capital of two hundred thousand dollars, with a surplus of fifty thousand dollars. President, J. R. Van Deventer; Vice-President, E. W. Runyon; Cashier, Carmen Parse; Board of Directors, J. R. Van Deventer, E. W. Runyon, John Simpson, Manning Stelle, A. Berry, I. D. Titsworth, L. Craig, M. D. Williams, McD. Coriell, P. M. French.

JEREMIAH R. VAN DEVENTER.—The Van Deventer family is of Holland origin, and the progenitor of the family in New Jersey is supposed to have been among the early settlers here from that country about the middle of the seventeenth century.

Jacob Van Deventer, grandfather of our subject, resided near Bound Brook, in Middlesex County, N. J., on the New Brunswick road; was a farmer by occupation, and reared a large family of children, who became farmers and mechanics, and settled in different parts of the State. One son, Jacob, born Oct. 7, 1774, settled at Bound Brook. He died July 17, 1870. His wife, Mary Garretson, of Bound Brook, whom he married April 2, 1803, was born Feb. 4, 1767, and died March 6, 1846, leaving four children.—Mary Ann, who was twice married, and died in August, 1860; Jeremiah R., subject of this sketch; Jacob G., a clothing merchant of St. Louis, who was killed May 6, 1853, by a railroad accident in New England; and Sarah Margaret, wife of John Smith, of Weston, N. J. Jacob Van Deventer was a mechanic by trade, but followed agricultural pursuits during the latter part of his life in Franklin township, Somerset County, dying at the residence of his daughter, Sarah Margaret, at Weston, at the advanced age of ninety-six years and ten months.

Jeremiah R., son of Jacob and Mary Van Deventer, was born at Bound Brook Nov. 25, 1805. He remained at home during his minority, and obtained his early education in the common school of his native place. After reaching his majority he learned cabinet-making, and worked at it for three years. In 1829 he turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and purchased a farm in the township of Warren, now North Plainfield, Somerset County, upon which he has resided since. At the time of his settlement on this farm the village of Plainfield, in Union County, numbered only a few hundred inhabitants, and its business interests were mostly confined to the village and surrounding country, whereas during the past twenty years its population has rapidly increased, its business has developed, and it has become one of the most desirable locations for a residence, containing, as it does, very many of the finest-designed and beautiful residences anywhere to be found in the State. The contiguity of Mr. Van Deventer's residence to Plainfield and the rapid growth of the place led him many years ago to take an active interest in its business affairs.

He was one of the directors of the old Union County Bank, was one of the founders of the First National Bank of Plainfield in 1865, which superseded the other, and has officiated as its president, with the exception of three years. He has been one of the principal owners of the gas-works of the city since 1870, and served the company as president; succeeded Mr. Elston Marsh as president of the Washington Fire Insurance Company of Plainfield, and has served as one of the trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church of the place for many years. Among other enterprises Mr. Van Deventer and his nephew, Augustus Van Deventer, erected, in 1877, "Van Deventer Hall," on Front Street, in Plainfield, a brick structure of three stories, the finest-designed business block in the city.

His connection with the First National Bank from its organization has given that institution a substantial financial standing among business men, who regard his quick perception of matters, his thorough-going business capacity and integrity as safeguards for the judicious managements of its funds. As a citizen he is frank and outspoken, sociable, earnest, and unostentatious. His life has been almost wholly devoted to business pursuits, and he has never sought official place or the emoluments of office, except several years ago to serve for a time on the board of chosen freeholders of Somerset County, in which his residence is located.

By his wife, Cornelia, daughter of Beekman Stryker, of Somerset County, whom he married in 1830, he has one child, Carolue, wife of Peter Bronson, of New Brunswick, N. J.

Time Savings Institution.—Organized in the year 1868. Motto: "A penny saved is equal to two earned." President, E. W. Runyon; Vice-Presidents, Stephen O. Horton, Isaac R. Brown; Secretary and Treasurer, Elias R. Pope; Assistant Treasurer, James C. Pope; Board of Investment, Stephen O. Horton, Enos W. Runyon, Joseph B. Coward, William White; Managers, E. W. Runyon, R. M. Titsworth, Levi Hetfield, Jr., Lewis E. Clark; Auditing Committee, Carmen Parse and Nathan Harper.

City National Bank.—Organized April, 1875. Capital, $150,000. President, Charles Hyde; Vice-President, E. R. Pope; Cashier, Joseph M. Myers; Directors, E. R. Pope, J. B. Coward, R. MacDonald, C. H. Stillman, Charles Hyde, C. Schepflin, I. F. Hubbard, I. T. Clossin, Lawrence Myers.

The Mutual Assurance Fire Company.—At a meeting of the inhabitants of the village of Plainfield and vicinity, convened pursuant to public notice at Abraham Laing's on Jan. 13, 1832, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of devising a plan to insure property that is perishable from loss or damage by fire, Randolph Dunham was called to the chair and Cornelius Boice appointed secretary. The object of the meeting being stated by Zachariah Webster and others, it was "Ordered, That it is expedient for this meeting to form an association for the purpose of insuring property that is perishable from loss or damage by fire upon the plan of a Mutual Assurance Fire Company." The following-named persons attached their signatures to the plan March 12, 1832:

Edmund Webster, Elias Runyon, Daniel Vail, Isaac Titsworth, Dennis Coles, Jacob Manning, James Leonard, Randolph M. Stelle, John Wilson, Piatt Drake, Theophilus Pierson, Enoch M. Randolph, Smith Webster, Joseph Webster, Jacob Thorn, George Thorn, Elisha Runyon, Nathan Vail, William M. Clark, Daniel Carle, Samuel Pound, Caleb Freeman, Francis Runyon, Jobs & Runyon, Ira F. Randolph, Martin Runyon, John T. Cook, Randolph Marsh, Richard Hartshorn, Samuel Webster, Laing Webster, Zachariah Webster, Daniel Shotwell, Alex. Wilson, Randolph Marsh, Nathan Laing, William Hendrickson, Trustum Manning, Daniel Allen, E. S. V. Fitz Webster, Lucas V. Hoagland, John Layton, William Vail, Peter Coriell, Abijah Titus, Jonah Vail, John H. Coward, F. Cole, Eli Pound, David Dunn, William S. Webster, Randolph Dunham, W. P. Williamson, Jon. M. Kinsey, Job Meeker, John x (his mark) Laing, Reuben Dunn, Siles Williams, Peter Wooden, Thomas Stead, A. D. Titsworth, Noah Drake, Lewis Bond, William Tunison, Joseph Fitz Randolph, Joel Wilson, Joel Wilson & Co., James Laing, Edward Vail, David Allen, Robert Anderson, Steven Cooper, John Runyon, Joseph D. Shotwell, Jarvis B. Ayres, John Randolph, John S. Shotwell.

The following officers were then elected: Jacob Manning, president; Randolph Dunham, vice-president; Cornelius Boice, secretary.

The present officers are Alfred Berry, president; Isaac H. Dunn, vice-president; Walter L. Hetfield, secretary and treasurer.

Directors, Alfred Berry, David L. Randolph, Calvin Drake, George Drake, Isaac H. Dunn, William C. Ayres, Oliver R. Stelle, Phineas M. French, Eugene Runyon, Corra O. Meeker, Daniel F. Randolph, Walter L. Hetfield, John Ross, Joseph B. Coward, John Simpson.

Washington Fire Insurance Company of Plainfield was organized in 1875, Elias R. Pope, secretary and treasurer, 1875-82.

CHAPTER XLVII.

Inn-Keepers.—The first public-house in Plainfield was built by Samuel Manning. "He kept a Country Store and Inn" in 1806, near where Lebbeus Compton's bakery and confectionery store is situated on Front Street. In this building was the first post-office. This was the only house of entertainment, and was called "Manning's Inn" and the "Post Store," the spot

"Where gray-beard mirth and smiling toil retired,
And village statesmen talked with look profound."

At the death of Mr. Samuel Manning (20th September, 1817) his son, Jacob Manning, continued the same store and kept the office. It is said that the Quaker influence was against inns, and this community was nearly half of this faith. They were opposed "to revelry and feasting." After Mr. Jacob Manning quit keeping tavern Abram Laing opened a house of "entertainment for man and beast" in 1828. The place soon took the name of "Lane's Tavern." Travel from "up country" was lively in those days. Wagons loaded with beef, hogs, grain, tallow, and honey for the near market of "Amboy Perth" or "Perth City," and the "perriogers" running to New York were constantly passing or stopping at the hotel. Mr. Manning kept the tavern about twelve years. Jacob Thorn opened another in 1837 or 1838; William Craig kept here about two years. After Mr. Laing gave up his original hotel he built the present house on Front Street in 1840, and he remained here until his death, in 1856. It has been long known as "Laing's Hotel." After the death of the senior Laing his son carried on the place until quite recently, being the well-known and popular landlord of the establishment. Mr. George Miller opened the house in 1880, but in a few months he died, and his son, J. B. Miller, is now occupying the stand. The hotel is popular not only as a summer resort for boarders, but for transient customers.

Mr. Jacob Thorn built the present "Mansion House." In 1858 it was called the "City Hotel." Mr. Forman had charge of it for one year, 1856; after he left it Mr. Thorn opened the house in 1858, and Mr. Sanders, "the stage-driver," as he has generally been called, came and leased the Mansion House from 1859 to 1861. He removed, and John T. Lee carried on the business from 1861 to 1863, and Jacob Thorn took it again in 1864; E. P. Thorn, 1866-71; George Miller, 1872-75; William Hughson, 1876; Christopher Vannarsdale, 1877; Mr. De Revere, 1877-79. Mr. Jacob Thorn died May, 1874, in his seventy-third year. His son now keeps the hotel, and has a fair share of the public patronage. There was for a few years, about 1827 and subsequently, an inn kept by John Ayres on the corner of Cherry and Front Streets, where Berry & Thorn's hardware-store is situated.

Force's Hotel, on Front Street, is still kept open, and has become somewhat popular with the traveling public. James H. Force, proprietor.

Park House, a temperance boarding-house, is a family hotel with accommodations for one hundred and twenty-five guests, open all the year. It was first opened by the owner, Evan Jones, in 1873. George B. De Revere, formerly of the Mansion House, took possession of it as landlord in 1879, and up to this time the house has been popular with families desiring a healthy country home.

There are a large number of first-class houses which are adapted for a few private families, and convenient for the daily trains to and from the city of Plainfield.

Burial-Grounds.—Among the earliest burial-places were family plots situated mostly on the farms of the first settlers, and some of the lands having changed ownership, the graves have been removed or leveled in the process of tilling the soil. Many have but rough stones with initials of the name and date, and many are without any inscription. The burial-plot of the Lenox, Coriells, and Coverts, situated on the George Smock farm, near Dunellen, in this township, is of an ancient date, and a large number are here buried. The following epitaph is found on one of the stones:

"In Memory of
LUKE COVERT,
Who died
Jan. 22, 1828,
In the 94th year of his age.
Come look upon my grave,
All you that pass by;
Where one doth live to such an age
Thou-and do younger die."

On the line of the New Jersey Central Railroad was the family burial-plot of the Marsellies families. It is just south of Evona Station. A few years ago the stones were removed by the family.

The Coles burial-ground, near the line of Fanwood township, is still used by the family, and kept in excellent order. Here are the first of this family buried, and the gravestones are erected to designate the spot.

BAPTIST BURIAL-GROUND.—It was found necessary that some action should be taken in relation to a proper locality for the burial of the dead in the year 1849, and the trustees of the First Baptist Church took the initiative in purchasing and beautifying a suitable plot of ground for a cemetery, "whither full oft, with saddened heart and solemn step, many have made their pilgrimage to lay beneath the shadow of its evergreen trees the forms of their loved ones."

In the cemetery of the Presbyterian Church a large number are buried. The Quaker burying-ground, near the station, dates back to 1788, when the meeting-house was built. They had previously buried their dead in the old Quaker ground in Raritan township, of which no distinct trace now remains. But their records show that it was first used in 1731.

Here are interred the Shotwells, Thorns, Marshs, Vails, Pounds, Laings, Bonners, Fitz Randolphs, Kinseys, Wilsons, Griffiths, Hartshornes, Hamptons, Parkers, Rogers, and many of those whose names have become unknown in this township. The ground in Plainfield is still used for burials, but with very few stones placed to identify them.

The Methodist burial-ground is but recently established. In 1864 plots were secured and many of its members are there buried. It is near the Baptist cemetery, and kept in good order, the grounds having abundance of evergreens, and neat paths dividing the lots.

The Catholic burial-ground is also of recent date. It is situated north on the line of the railroad going to Scotch Plains. The ground is kept in excellent order, and has some fine monuments, as well as beautifully-carved gravestones.

The Union Cemetery Company was incorporated in the year 1871, and in 1874 the Plainfield Cemetery act of the Legislature was revived, which law can be found recorded on page 984 of New Jersey Laws, which give them power to own lands for the purpose of interments within the limits of Plainfield.

Evergreen Cemetery is the name given the present place of interment in Plainfield, and where most of the residents own family plots.

Seventh-Day Cemetery, situated on Park Avenue and Ninth Street, is kept with considerable neatness and respect for those there buried.

Roads and Avenues.¹—The distinctive characteristic of Plainfield is not its manufacturing nor commercial interests, but rather its elegant residence property and the interesting drives on level, shaded streets and avenues, generally straight and macadamized, under continuous archways of maples and elms, made delightful by the well-kept, tasteful lawns and many neat terraced banks. The many avenues that might be mentioned are the fine wide Park Avenue, Crescent Avenue, the avenue leading to Fanwood, the wide avenues to Evona, and others, as well as many leading in different directions outside of the city limits. The Johnson drive, as it is popularly called, is a macadamized road leading along the brow of the Blue Ridge range, extending from the notch through which Somerset Street passes to the picturesque gap in the mountains. Some of the highest points on the drive are three hundred to three hundred and fifty feet above the adjacent plain. And also a drive on Netherwood Heights affords a charming pleasure trip of endless variety over serpentine roadways on an undulating surface covered with a natural growth of oaks and chestnuts, passing an unusually attractive class of dwellings and beautiful grounds. And lastly the ride to Washington Rock is another attractive pleasure drive, and well repays any one to visit that upper region of invigorating mountain air and expansive panoramic landscape. These circumstances, in connection with the local improvements and unsurpassed railroad facilities, have attracted a larger percentage of New York business men than any other suburban city along the eighteen or twenty lines of travel from the great metropolis.

Fire Department.—For many years previous to 1827 the inhabitants of this then small village depended in a sudden emergency when the cry of fire was sounded upon each neighbor bringing his bucket and axe, and it was understood that such or such a neighbor owned a ladder. But, unfortunately, it was sometimes lent out and had not been returned. The necessity of some organization was deeply felt, and in the above-mentioned year some thirty of the townsmen, through Mr. Robert Anderson, the prime mover in the enterprise, secured by subscription of ten dollars each a hand-lever engine for extinguishing fires from New Brunswick called the "Harmony." This was the first fire-engine brought to the village of Plainfield, and a house for its reception was built on a lot belonging to Jacob Manning, where Mr. Green's furniture store now stands. The engine-house remained here for a time until it was removed to near the corner of Cherry Street and the lane to the Quaker meeting-house, now the corner of Park and North Avenue, where The Constitutionalist is published. The following composed the volunteer company of 1827: Dr. John Craig, Jacob Manning, Zachariah Webster, Caleb Freeman, Jarvis B. Ayres, James Leonard, Randolph M. Stelle, Eli Pound, Ira Fitz Randolph, Laing Webster, Abraham Parker, Simeon Fitz Randolph, Randolph Dunham, Cornelius Boice, Joel Wilson, Benjamin M. Stelle, Edmond Webster, Jacob Thorn, Lewis Force, Nathan Vail, John Briant, Robert Anderson (he was foreman for a time), Miriam Ormiston, John Layton, Joseph Shotwell, and John Edgar. There were probably others, but at this late date it seems impossible to procure a complete list.

Aug. 25, 1853, the following citizens of Plainfield united for the purpose of organizing a new company, to be called "a fire-engine company," in the village of Plainfield: Isaac C. Varian, James M. Dunn, D. W. Dorman, L. E. Barkalew, Samuel Manning, John Cummings, William Gano, E. B. Titsworth, A. Vanderbeck, William M. Webster, R. C. Barkalew, E. W. Bloom, Henry R. Cannon, H. C. Randolph, Ellis Ayres, George Pack, Randolph Marsh, I. W. Martin, John V. Arrowsmith, Warren Marsh, John C. Runyon, Augustus Martin, George Strooks. James M. Dunn was made chairman; Samuel C. Varian was elected foreman. The organization was called "Harmony Fire Engine Company, No. 2;" a constitution and by-laws were adopted Aug. 31, 1853, and Samuel Manning was elected secretary and treasurer.

At the next monthly meeting Messrs. W. W. Webster, Jacob C. Varian, H. R. Cannon, E. B. Titsworth, John Arrowsmith, William Gano, and Lewis E.

Barkalew were appointed a committee to raise money to build a new engine-house and procure a new engine.

At a meeting Sept. 14, 1853, Dr. Cannon, treasurer of the committee, reported on hand $787.50 in subscriptions, and a committee was appointed to visit the different engine-builders in New York and Brooklyn, to examine carefully the construction and engage an engine for this company not to exceed in cost $800. The following were said committee: Messrs. D. W. Dorman, Washington Marsh, Isaac Varian, William Gano, Samuel Manning, and William Webster.

At their next meeting, Oct. 5, 1853, the committee reported that they had contracted with Mr. Joseph Pine for an engine to cost $900. At this same meeting it was decided to determine by ballot the name of the new engine. Three ballots were taken with no choice, when on motion of Mr. Dorman it was decided to call it "Washington, No. 2;" but at their next meeting this action was rescinded and a committee appointed to name the engine, consisting of the following: Messrs. Washington Marsh, L. E. Barkalew, James M. Dunn, E. W. Bloom, Ellis Ayres, and the committee reported the name of "Gazelle, No. 3."

Jan. 4, 1854, a committee was appointed to "prepare and circulate for names a petition to the Legislature of New Jersey for an act incorporating Plainfield into a fire district," and the company held their first meeting in their new house Aug. 3, 1854, called Fireman's Hall. D. W. Dorman was elected foreman, and Ellis Ayres secretary, at the annual meeting Feb. 1, 1855.

At a meeting held March 7, 1855, John Ayres was made foreman of a juvenile hose company. The hose-carriage, or "jumper," as it was termed, was a two-wheeled paint-cart procured from Frazee Marsh. A roller was fixed on the axles, and the same apparatus is in use to-day, known as "Warren Hose-Carriage, No. 3."

Before the purchase of the new engine the company worked an old double-deck engine, loaned them by Mr. Pine while he was building the new engine. This apparatus was called the "Night-Owl," and was surrendered to him when the new engine arrived.

The number of this company was changed about this time to No. 1 Engine, and the company had secured a lot on Cherry Street and commenced the erection of an engine-house next to Martin Brothers' grocery. The new engine arrived about Feb. 1, 1855, also a supply of hose. D. W. Dorman was re-elected foreman, and Ellis Ayres secretary. It was proposed to have a parade the 1st of April, and to invite the superintendent and inspectors of the railroad to attend the parade, which was afterwards postponed for two months.

The following have been elected foremen: 1854-56, Samuel Manning; 1857-58, Edward P. Thorn; 1859, John Roselle; 1860-61, Edward P. Thorn; 1862-63, John H. Tier; 1863-64, John Roselle; 1865-67, Theodore F. French; 1868, William P. Bailey; 1869-74, William J. Force; 1875-77, Thaddeus O. Doane; 1878-81, Augustus H. Martin; 1882, Thaddeus O. Doane.

The following have been secretaries: 1854-56, Lewis H. Ayres; 1857-58, Alexander Dunn; 1858, Joseph R. Eno; 1859-65, Ellis Ayres; 1866, John T. Lee; 1873-78, William J. Force.

A full regulation uniform was adopted Feb. 6, 1861, —red shirt, belt with name of company, and regular fire-hat.

In the year 1869, just after a fire had taken place, July 6th of that year, a meeting was called at Laing's Hotel to devise some plan to secure another steamer, as that fire proved the inadequacy of the department to cope with such fires. The meeting was presided over by Nathan Harper, Esq., and G. W. F. Randolph was secretary. The meeting was largely attended.

It was resolved to present a memorial to the Legislature asking them to allow of such legislation as would provide means to the extent of $10,000 for the procurement and maintaining of another steamer and appurtenances. Also a document was presented ready for the signatures of those desirous to contribute money towards this purpose, and money was contributed liberally. Messrs. Wallace, Vail, E. W. Runyon, and George Hoadly were appointed a committee to circulate the petition papers. Through Mr. Vail's indefatigable efforts some $12,400 were received in subscriptions within forty-eight hours. Chief Engineer Frazee, Fire Commissioner J. W. Manning, and J. F. Hubbard were appointed a committee to at once purchase the engine. The committee lost no time in closing a bargain with the Amoskeag Company for one of their third-class engines, the same as No. 2. On the 4th of October, 1869, a delegation of "Gazelle" firemen and Chief Frazee visited New York and escorted the new engine to Plainfield. While this engine was being built another engine company had been formed of citizens of North Plainfield, under the name of Warren Engine Company No. 3.

When the new steamer arrived at Plainfield all the fire department were in line at the station to receive the engine. The fire commissioner formally turned over to the Gazelle Company the new steamer, and the hand-engine over to the new company, "Warren, No. 3." The fire commissioners secured the needed legislation at the next session of the Legislature, and relieved all the subscribers on the list. Their names were merely pledges of security to the builders.

The Plainfield Company, No. 2, was organized in 1867. They have an excellent company, and have done good service with their steamer at the various fires in this city.

ZEPHYR HOOK-AND-LADDER COMPANY, No. 1.—Their truck was purchased by subscription through the efforts of the citizens, foremost of whom were the late respected George Miller, Esq., and Benjamin A. Mumford. The apparatus was afterwards turned over to the fire department.

The first chief engineer of this department elected was the late John Roselle, May 4, 1868. Theodore F. French, James F. G. Fraser, and Frank W. Vail. The first annual parade took place Sept. 3, 1868.

A RELIC.—The following interesting facts are related: In June, 1855, a committee consisting of William W. Webster, John Layton, Jr., and Samuel Manning were appointed to procure a bell to be hung in the belfry of the engine-house. It was rung for the first time on the morning of July 4, 1855. The money to pay for it was raised by subscription. There is quite a history connected with this bell, as follows: In the year 1867 the fire department purchased a steam fire-engine, and it was decided to form the nucleus for a new company out of the members of Gazelle, No. 1. Accordingly the roll was called, and as each member's name was announced he decided by his answer whether he would remain with No. 1 or join the new company. Twelve members decided to form the new company, and eighteen remained with No. 1. Then came a contest as to what should be the name of the steamer company. The men who formed the new company wanted also to take the number with them, and call their company No. 1, and Gazelle No. 2. The members remaining with the hand-engine finally triumphed, and the new steamer company was called "Plainfield, No. 2," and from that time there has existed a friendly strife between the two companies. When the old engine-house was purchased by Mr. Levi Hetfield the members of No. 2 thought to spring a trap on those of No. 1 in securing the bell as a trophy, and obtained the consent of Mr. Hetfield to allow them the bell. But members of No. 1 heard of this and determined that the old relic of the early days of the fire department in the village of Plainfield, which they justly considered belonged to their organization, should not fall into the hands of their rivals. One night the bell disappeared from the belfry, and then there was a hue and cry. The owner of the building threatened to sue somebody for the theft; who that somebody was no one could tell. Finally ex-Foreman Edward Thorn bargained with Mr. Hetfield and bought "a pig in a bag," as the saying is, by purchasing the bell for a nominal sum, the same to become his when found. For a long time that bell remained out of sight to the gaze of any member of No. 2. Finally, on the occasion of their annual ball and supper, the evening of February 22d, they determined to astonish their friendly rivals. During the progress of the dancing, when the "full set" was reached, the assemblage were astonished at hearing the loud clanging of a bell behind the paraphernalia and decorations at the end of the hall, a flag was drawn aside, and the astonished eyes of those members of No. 2 present fell upon the bell so long sought for. It was beautifully gilded in gold, and hung so that it could be swung at leisure. Information was received that an attempt would be made to rescue the bell, but a strong guard was kept over it, and it was returned again to a place of secrecy until Mr. Thorn announced himself the owner of it, when all attempts to capture it were dropped. This historic bell has now a place in another organization of this city, whose members often listen to its silent midnight tolling with pleasure.

The officers for 1881-82 are as follows: President of Board, Jeremiah Van Winkle; Secretary, T. J. Gillies; Treasurer, E. H. Depew; other members of board, E. L. Morris, Solomon Flaig, W. E. Jones, Chief Engineer, Frank W. Vail; First Assistant, George Kesselring; Second Assistant, Stephen Davis.

Gazelle, No. 1, Steamer.—Foreman, T. O. Doane; First Assistant, Jerry Moore; Second Assistant, Charles P. Sebring.

Plainfield, No. 2, Steamer.—Foreman, William L. Wright; First Assistant, William Laing; Second Assistant, Andrew D. Jennings.

Warren, No. 3, Engine.—Foreman, John Becker; First Assistant, William Harding; Second Assistant, George Becker.

Zephyr, No. 1, Hook-and-Ladder.—Foreman, Ephriam Hedden; First Assistant, Samuel Robinson; Second Assistant, Charles Smith.

Alert, No. 1, Hose Company.—Foreman, A. Salsman; First Assistant, S. T. Varian; Second Assistant, E. N. Erickson.

THE FIREMEN'S RELIEF ASSOCIATION.—Joseph A. Hubbard, president; David W. Rodgers, vice-president; W. R. Cock, secretary; A. D. Mallinson, treasurer; relief committee, A. S. Force, A. D. Jennings, and Frank Whiteley.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Plainfield Gaslight Company.—For a number of years some plan was sought to be adopted for lighting the streets of this growing city. Many plans were proposed and found to be impracticable or unsuccessful. At length an act of the Legislature was passed incorporating "The Plainfield Gaslight Company," March 13, 1857. In 1870 this act was amended. The company have several miles of mains laid in the principal streets, and are constantly extending them as demand increases. Capital, one hundred thousand dollars. The offices are located at the corner of Fourth and Washington Streets; President, I. R. Van Deventer; Superintendent, E. R. Pope; Secretary and Treasurer, P. Brunsen; Engineer, T. H. Morse; Directors, J. R. Van Deventer, Elias R. Pope, Peter Brunsen, George W. F. Randolph, and Carmon Parse.

Water-Supply Company.—An organization of citizens of Plainfield for supplying the city with water was effected in 1869, and the intention is at some future day to develop the much-needed and easily-arranged improvement for receiving a supply of fine, pure water from the neighboring hills, where there are abundant never-failing springs sufficient for all demands, either for extinguishing fire or for domestic or manufacturing purposes. The city will undoubtedly find it necessary sooner or later to draw its water supply from this source.

There were two acts of the Legislature passed in 1874: first, an act to authorize the construction of water-works for supplying Plainfield with pure and wholesome water; and second, an act to authorize the construction of works for supplying with pure and wholesome water, pursuant to an act of April 2, 1869.

Societies.—THE CALEDONIAN ASSOCIATION.—This society was organized in 1877 of resident Scotchmen. It is devoted to benevolence and the popular sports peculiar to the Highlanders.

THE ATHLETIC CLUB.—Among many of the younger portion of this city the Athletic Club is an institution, and has grown in popularity and influence by its successful sports and by its well-managed annual games, with liberal prizes which draw together many of the most celebrated athletes as well as amateur competitors in the country.

The Muhlenberg Hospital was fully organized in 1878. For years previously the want of such an institution had been felt by the citizens. Donations of money were made, fairs, etc., were held, and a fine plot of land was donated by the former mayor of the city, Job Male, Esq. The building was then commenced. It is now completed and ready to receive those needing medical treatment. The building with grounds are valued at about ten thousand dollars. The officers of the board of governors: Right Rev. John Scarborough, D.D., president; Nathan Harper, vice-president; W. R. Cock, secretary and treasurer. Medical Board: H. D. Burlingham, M.D., physician-in-chief; Charles Hart, M.D., surgeon-in-chief; Charles H. Stillman, M.D., consulting physician; J. E. Jamrin, M.D. (New York), and C. M. Field, M.D. (Bound Brook), consulting surgeons; Drs. Probasco, Boone, and Tomlinson, attendant physicians; Drs. G. W. Endicott and Long, attendant surgeons.

Relief Association.—This association have rooms corner Madison Avenue and Second Street. They give needed help to the poor through an employment bureau to those who are able to work, and dispense clothing, food, medicines, etc., through a scrutinizing executive board of self-denying ladies,—Mrs. G. W. Ferry, president; Mrs. C. E. Ryder, vice-president; Mrs. Joseph M. Myers, treasurer; Mrs. John S. Lamson, secretary; Mrs. H. C. Marshall, assistant secretary; Miss A. J. Pray, superintendent.

Plainfield Library.—In 1879 an act was passed by the Legislature creating a library fund. The following list of officers has been elected with three terms, viz.: Walter L. Hetfield, Craig A. Marsh, J. K. Myers, secretary and treasurer, hold office until 1883; George H. Babcock, Henry E. Daboll, John B. Dumont, president, hold office to 1884; John H. Evens, Mason W. Tyler, Henry R. Talmadge, hold office to 1885. Within the next six months this library will be opened to the public, and will be a valuable acquisition to the city.

Jerusalem Lodge, No. 40, R. and A. M.—The committee appointed to reply to certain inquiries of the Committee on Masonic History of the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey would respectfully report as follows:

1st. At the annual communication of the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge, held at Trenton, on the 11th day of November, 1817, the following petition was presented:

"To the Right Worshipful Grand Lodge of the State of New Jersey.—The petition of the subscribers most humbly sheweth, that your petitioners are all regular Ancient Masons, and having the honor and prosperity of Masons much at heart are very desirous to promote its philanthropic principles. That for the convenience of their respective habitations and for other good purposes they have agreed to form themselves into a new lodge to be named 'Union Lodge,' and have nominated Capt. John Allee to be our first Master, Doctor Elias Runyon to be our Senior Warden, and Captain William D. Sherwood to be our Junior Warden. That in consequence of this resolution they pray for a warrant to empower them to assemble and hold a regular lodge in the township of Westfield, and county of Essex, in East New Jersey, and then and there to make, pass, and raise masons according to the forms of the society and to execute all other duties of the craft. May it, therefore, please your Right Worshipful body to grant this request, and your petitioners faithfully promise strictly to obey and conform to all the orders and regulations of the Grand Lodge that shall be enjoined on them, and your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Signed,

"JOHN ALLEN, "ELIAS RUNYON,
"WILLIAM D. SHERWOOD, "JACOB LAZALIAR,
"WILLIAM WILLIAMSON, "SIMEON GAUGE,
"WILLIAM STEWART."

The petition having been read, it was "ordered that a warrant do issue and that Brother John Allen be the first Master; Elias Runyon, first Senior Warden; and William D. Sherwood, first Junior Warden of said lodge."

The lodge was known and numbered as Jerusalem Lodge, No. 40, in the township of Westfield (now city of Plainfield) in the county of Essex.

2d. There is no evidence of this lodge having previously worked under a dispensation.

The first applicant for degrees under the warrant was John Norcott, in May, 1818, and received the first degree in said lodge June 22, 1818.

The first meeting of the lodge under the warrant was held Dec. 27, 1817. The following officers and brethren were present, viz.: John Allen, W. M.; Elias Runyon, S. W.; William D. Sherwood, J. W.; William Williamson, Treas.; Elias J. Thompson, of Chatham Lodge, Sec. pro tem. Alexander Kinner, S. D.; Simeon Gauge, J. D.; Andrew Wallace, Tyler; William Stewart, David Smalley, R. W. Dept. Grand Master; William McKissack, R. W. Dept. Grand Secretary; George McDonald from Solomon Lodge, No. 1, at Somerville; Bros. Luther Little and Elias J. Thompson, of Chatham Lodge, No. 33.

During the entire existence of Jerusalem Lodge, No. 40, from Nov. 11, 1817, to April 23, 1834, no name is more prominently identified with its history than that of Col. John Allen. He was present at the annual communication of the Grand Lodge when the warrant was granted, and served his lodge as a representative eleven years. In the year 1832 he was elected to the honorable position of Senior Grand Warden. He was most faithful in his attendance at the regular communications of his own lodge, holding the station of Worshipful Master, serving the years 1818-19, 1823. As a citizen he was respected and honored as one of the most prominent in the community. After the lodge had ceased labor he removed to the State of Ohio. With his change of residence there was no abatement in his love of the institution of Masonry, and at his death, in 1856, he desired to have his remains taken to Plainfield, in New Jersey, and that the usual Masonic services should be performed by his brother Masons of Plainfield. A delegation from his lodge in Ohio accompanied his remains to his old home, and he was interred in the cemetery of the Baptist Church in this place. The funeral services were held on Sunday, July 13, 1856, and the ceremonies at the grave performed by Jerusalem Lodge, No. 26.

Jerusalem Lodge, No. 26, F. and A. M., located in Plainfield. This lodge was organized under dispensation by Most Worthy Grand Master Stewart, May 9, 1853, and the following officers were admitted: Elias Runyon, W. M.; Richard Manning, S. W. The minutes of the proceedings furnish the following list of brethren present on the occasion: Elias Runyon, Richard Manniog, Stephen Hall, James G. Williams, James C. Lyon, Edmund Seeley, Debruskoss A. Huxson, Thomas Wallace, Samuel Scott, Jonathan M. Wilcox.

The following are the officers of the lodge, Feb. 18, 1882: William R. Cock, W. M.; Benjamin F. Coriell, S. W.; Jonathan B. Johnson, J. W.; John L. Hall, Treas.; Edward Nelson, Sec.; John Ulrich, S. D.; Thaddeus O. Doane, J. D.; John Chandler, S. M. S.; Joseph G. Miller, I. M. S.; David Weaver, S.; William L. Wright, S.; Charles H. Westfall, Tyler.

Jerusalem Chapter meets the second and fourth Thursday evenings of each month in Masonic Hall, the Vandeventer Block, Front Street. John Hall, H. P.; I. C. Pope, E. K.; Edward Nelson, E. S.; I. N. Steiner, Treas.; T. A. Rodgers, Sec.

Anchor Lodge, F. and A. M., meets second and fourth Tuesday evenings of each month in Masonic Hall, in City National Bank building, Front Street. W. A. Freeman, W. M.; I. B. Dumont, S. W.; Charles Tweedy, J. W.; J. S. Nason, Treas.; James Lyon, Sec.

Odd-Fellows.—PLAINFIELD LODGE, No. 44, meets every Monday evening at their hall in Coward's building, Park Avenue. Officers, 1882: C. E. Austin, N. G.; William Boe, V. G.; T. J. Young, Treas.; I. K. Arnold, Rec. Sec.; P. V. Weaver, Per. Sec.

MOUNT HEBRON DEGREE LODGE, No. 11, meets second Thursday evening of each month. Officers for 1882: M. Schenck, D. M.; A. R. Hartpense, D. D. M.; Fred. Slater, Sec.; T. J. Young, Treas.

Knights of Pythias.—PERSEVERANCE LODGE, No. 74, meets every Thursday evening in hall, Front Street, corner of Park Avenue. I. C. Carney, C. C.; N. H. Guttman, V. C.; Martin Crounce, P.; Webster Grant, R. of F.; F. Whiteley, M. at A.; L. Ulrich, Trustee.

Howell's Division, No. 97, Sons of Temperance, meets at Alberti's Hall, East Front Street, opposite Park Avenue, every Tuesday evening. Webster Grant, W. P.; James R. Perine, W. A.; I. M. Taynor, P. W. P.; J. M. B. Pyatt, R. S.

The Would Be Social Club was organized June 15, 1877, and has occasional meeting at their rooms, No. 12 West Front Street.

Plainfield Sængerbund.—This large association was organized a few years ago for the care of the sick and helping the destitute. The singing society connected with this club give occasional entertainments, which have become popular with the German-speaking citizens of this city. They meet every Monday and Friday evenings at Frederick Caspar's hall.

Ancient Order of Hibernians meets in Association Hall, Park Avenue, the first Monday evening of every month. W. J. Tobin, president; James Muldowney, vice-president; Charles McCann, secretary; Michael Nugent, treasurer.

Children's Home.—This home is located on Hill-side Avenue. It was found that something should be done for the children of this city who needed care and support, and many little ones, orphans and half-orphans, or those whose parents are incompetent to provide for their necessary wants. This home was organized in 1872, and has been the means of doing a good work. The officers: Mrs. Horace Kimball, president; Mrs. James McGee, vice-president; Mrs. Charles Place, secretary; Mrs. L. W. Serrell, treasurer; Miss Lucy Everett, corresponding secretary; Mrs. C. V. F. Nevius, matron; E. W. South, M.D., physician of the Children's Home.

Holly Tree Inn.—This benevolent institution is situated on North Avenue near the depot. It is a well-patronized resort for the youth of our city, where they can find a home welcome, good, promiscuous reading-matter, and a simple lunch without any evil temptations. It is nearly self-sustaining, though needing the sympathy and assistance of a charitable public. It exists in the interests of temperance, and is doing a good work under the direction of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Officers: Mrs. J. W. Yates, president; Miss H. M. Convey, secretary; Mrs. S. S. Struthers, treasurer; Miss H. W. Convey, superintendent of Inn.

The Washington Monument Association.—This society, for the purpose of erecting upon Washington Rock a suitable monument, was organized in 1859, and its determined purpose is in no distant future to honor the memory of our great American chieftain by erecting a suitable memorial upon this summit, and near the notable rock that bears his name.

The Young Men's Christian Association was organized in 1867. They formerly had their rooms upon Front Street, but now have commodious quarters in the Chautauqua Building, corner of Park and North Avenues. They have in membership nearly three hundred, and a circulating and reference library of nearly two thousand volumes, and a free reading-room containing many of the best religious and secular publications. Under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association is given every season an excellent course of literary and scientific lectures and musical entertainments. The Sabbath-school normal class, with the main object of pursuing a systematic Biblical study, and the consideration of practical methods of religious instruction, is one of their most influential and important branches of Christian activity, having given to Plainfield a national reputation as a Sunday-school centre. Under its management the first congress of Sunday-school workers of the United States was convened in this place during the spring of 1876, when one hundred and sixty delegates were present, representing thirteen States and twelve different denominations. The efforts of the association in philanthropic as well as religious ways are designed to help and elevate the young men of Plainfield. The following officers, 1882: H. R. Munger, president; George R. Cornwall, vice-president; Walter McGee, recording secretary; H. J. Runyan, corresponding secretary; W. P. Webster, general secretary; H. O. Newman, treasurer; and W. S. Angelman, librarian.

Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle.—The national headquarters is in the Chautauqua Building, corner of Park and North Avenues. Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., president; Miss Kate F. Kimball, secretary. Plainfield Branch, Rev. J. L. Hurlbut, president; F. E. Marsh, treasurer.

The Potter Printing-Press Works.—They were erected in 1879 by C. Potter, Jr., about half-way from this city to Evona, on the southerly side of the New Jersey Central Railroad tract, having sufficient conveniences for loading and unloading their merchandise at the factory doors. The buildings are of brick, and are commodious, covering nearly an acre of ground,—the machine-shop, foundry, work-shop, and necessary buildings. The firm is an old, well-established concern, having had their works in Rhode Island for many years. Their workmanship is unexcelled by any other in the country. They employ over one hundred first-class mechanics.

of this class of industry in the United States. At their massive brick buildings on West Front Street they employ a great many skilled workmen, and afford steady occupation to scores of others in the surrounding neighborhood.

Mutual Agricultural Association of Union and Middlesex Counties.—This association was organized in the year 1879, and in the following month of September they held their first annual exhibition, which proved a grand success. They have ample grounds well located upon the easterly portion of Raritan township and the limits of the city of Plainfield. The grounds contain outbuildings and accommodations for the show of fine cattle. The regulations concerning the horse department are ample, and the past season many have been induced to introduce their fine stock, which these two counties are so well known to pride themselves in. The secretary, Hon. James S. Vosseller, has produced the past season a liberal premium list through the direction of the board of directors.

One of their articles of incorporation is the following: "All articles raised, grown, or manufactured in the counties of Union and Middlesex and in the township of North Plainfield may be exhibited, although the owner may not reside in such counties or townships."

Board of directors, John I. Holley, president; R. S. Little, Hon. Charles A. Campbell, first vice-president; Nathan Robins, second vice-president; J. W. Johnson, third vice-president; James S. Vosseller, secretary; E. C. Pearson, treasurer; James Neilson, M. H. Acker, I. C. Meyer, I. H. Platt, I. T. Pearson, William S. Darling.

Netherwood.—Within a few years a number of gentlemen made purchase of a large tract of land about a mile from the depot of Plainfield, and about the same distance from Fanwood, on the line of the railroad, the land being elevated and having an extended view of the surrounding country, the blue ridge of hills, and the valley. It is a charming elevation, and soon the interest of many who desired to make this a permanent in building a number of neat villas. Plans for a massive five-story brick building, with some two hundred and twenty-five rooms, elegantly furnished throughout, and complete in all its appointments, were adopted, and in 1878 completed at a cost of nearly one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, called the "Netherwood Hotel," and designed for a luxurious summer resort for New York business men and their families. A very neat brick building for the depot is built, a Union Chapel for religious worship and Sabbath-school, store, post-office, etc. The drives surrounding Netherwood are hardly equalled, as most of the avenues are neatly graded, macadamized, trees planted by the side of foot-walks, and during the pleasant days of summer are frequented by many of the residents in their carriages. Netherwood Hotel, near the depot at Netherwood, is built on high ground, having a fine view of the surrounding country. It is reported that John H. Dean, Esq., has lately become the owner.

The Belvidere Land and Improvement Company of Netherwood, N. J., have greatly improved this part of Plainfield by the erection of fine buildings, and offer plots of land at a reasonable price to actual settlers. The attractions of this beautiful neighborhood are great and convenient to the depot of that name. There are schools, stores, post-office, etc.

Evona is a small hamlet, has a neat railroad station and some substantial dwellings, the residences of business men of New York. There is a hat-factory here. The roads are kept in excellent condition. The village is about two miles from Plainfield station, and one mile from Dunellen. The neighborhood contains some of the best families, who make it their country home. An Episcopal chapel is about being built a short distance east of the station.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

DAVID J. BOICE.

His grandfather, George Boice, resided near New Market, Middlesex Co., where he owned and carried on a farm. He had six daughters and three sons. Jacob, Henry (a farmer, succeeded to the homestead and died in Plainfield), and Peter, who was a carpenter by trade, and resides in Newark, N. J., being the only surviving one of the nine children. Jacob was father of David J. Boice, was born in 1789 and died in 1845. He was respectively a farmer, a carpenter, and for many years kept a public-house at Samptown, New Market, and one year at the well-known "Old Sand Tavern" near Plainfield. His wife, Rebecca, was a daughter of David Blackford, of Samptown, who was born in 1790 and died in 1838. Their children were David J. and Mary, widow of Peter Fitz Randolph, of Green Valley, Ill., where they settled about 1855.

David J. Boice received during his boyhood very little education from books, but during his minority learned the invaluable lessons of self-reliance and economy, which often go very far toward making the successful business man. He was not favored with abundant means in starting out in life, neither were position and valuable compensation for labor within easy reach when he had reached his majority. He remained at home until 1840, and in 1842 settled in Plainfield. In 1844 he erected a house on the corner of Centre and Second Streets, where he resided until 1869. His first eight years after settling in Plainfield was spent in the employ of the Central Railroad Company. In 1850 he established a coal and lumber business there, which he has successfully carried on until the present time, his office and yard facing on Park Avenue. His lumber is purchased at Albany, N. Y., and shipped by water via Hudson River to Elizabethport, thence by rail to Plainfield, and also direct by railroad from Michigan. His coal trade is mostly confined to the Lehigh Valley coal. His sales annually, when he first began business, only amounted to some three hundred tons, whereas for many years prior to 1882 they have been three thousand tons.

Mr. Boice is one of the active and substantial business men of Plainfield, was one of the directors of the First National Bank for several years, and a member of Common Council for one term. He is a contributor to the various local enterprises of the city, and has been a member, trustee, and usher of the First Baptist Church there for many years. His wife, whom he married in 1840, is Rachel, daughter of Jonathan F. Randolph, and sister of Peter Fitz Randolph, before alluded to, of Plainfield. She was born in 1815. Their children are Sarah R., wife of J. D. Runyon, of New Brunswick, and Anna E., at home. Mr. Boice's residence, at the corner of Park Avenue and Fifth Street, he erected in 1869, whence he removed from his former residence.

CHARLES POTTER, JR.,

proprietor and founder of the "Potter Printing-Press Works" at Plainfield, N. J., was born in Madison County, N. Y., April 21, 1824. His paternal grandparents, George Potter and Mary Stillman, resided at Potter Hill, R. I., where the former died in 1801, leaving one son, Benjamin, father of John E. Potter, a well-known publisher of Philadelphia, and the youngest son, Charles, father of our subject. Charles Potter, son of George, born at Potter Hill, Sept. 7, 1799. After serving an apprenticeship with his older brother, Benjamin, at the carpenter's trade, at the age of nineteen went to Madison County, N. Y., where he married, June 22, 1823, Eliza, daughter of Samuel Burdick, who was born Sept. 22, 1807. He engaged in the successful manufacture of wagons in 1826, in West Edmeston, Otsego Co., N. Y., which he continued until 1836, when on account of failing health he settled, in 1837, on a farm in the town of Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y., where he resides at present.

Charles Potter was a man of sterling integrity in all his business relations, industrious habits, and honesty of purpose.

Charles, Jr., son of Charles and Eliza Potter, received a fair academical education, and for two terms during his minority was a successful teacher. In the autumn of 1846 he went to Rhode Island, and the following winter taught the Potter Hill district school, where many of his relations resided and the home of his ancestors had been.

Although he had intended to take a course of agricultural chemistry at Yale in 1848, with a view of engaging in scientific farming, upon the close of his school at Potter Hill he engaged as clerk with C. Maxsen & Co. there, with whom he remained two and a half years, when he was chosen to manage the affairs of the "Pawcatuck Manufacturing Company," a newly-organized company for carrying on the foundry business at Westerly, R. I. This he conducted so successfully and built up so large a local trade that at the end of three years the company declared a dividend of forty per cent. on the paid-up capital, and this unabated prosperity continued during the entire five years he had the management of its affairs. Believing fully now that mechanics and not agriculture was his forte, and that his experience and thorough education in finance entitled him to an established business of his own, he declined the offer of a large salary from the company to continue for ten years as their superintendent and general manager.

In 1854, George H. Babcock, of Westerly, R. I., invented, patented, and had made a printing-press of about letter-page size for printing in several colors at one operation. Mr. Potter thought he saw in this a short road to wealth, and engaged with Mr. Babcock (now the president of the Babcock & Wilcox Boiler Company) to build the presses, put them on the market, and for such service receive one-half of the profits. In January, 1855, he opened an office at 29 Beekman Street, New York, over James Conner's type-foundry, took several orders for presses of a larger size, and arranged for their construction. By experiments with the small press Mr. Potter discovered that brilliancy in the colors was lost by printing one color over another before the preceding one was dry, and therefore the value of the press was greatly impaired. At the end of seven months he sold his interest in the business to Mr. Babcock, father of the inventor of the press, and in the operation had lost not only his time but all his capital. He became interested the same year, 1855, in a printing-press invented by Merwin Davis, of New York City, and putting his services against the capital of the Pawcatuck Manufacturing Company, constructed and exhibited one of these presses in the Crystal Palace Fair in New York the same fall, receiving a gold medal, in 1856 a silver medal at the Mechanics' Fair in Boston, and at Maryland Institute in Baltimore, and quite a demand sprung up for these presses.

In 1856, Mr. George H. Babcock invented a very simple job-press, which Mr. Potter arranged to build and introduce. While canvassing for these presses, seeing the demand for a cylinder-press for newspaper printing, he, in the latter part of the year, set about the work, made his drawings, and supervised the construction of his first cylinder-press in a machine-shop at Westerly, and from this has grown the business and presses so well known at the present day. This press was completed in the spring of 1858, and was sold and set up in the office of Pearsol & Geist, at Lancaster, Pa., and gave satisfaction. For three years following Mr. Potter canvassed the entire United States and most of Canada, selling this (cylinder) and the Babcock & Davis job-presses, having his machines constructed and setting them up. Upon the breaking out of the late civil war, in 1861, Mr. Potter lost all he had accumulated and found himself largely in debt besides through all Southerners repudiating their obligations for his sales. Nor did misfortune come only financially, for in April, 1863, while in the office of the Portland Press, Maine, he received a fall which resulted in the amputation of his left leg near the ankle, and at a time when the press business looked more hopeful. Finding at this juncture that he had been in the business some nine years, had made no money and was in debt, he resolved that his experience should not be thrown away; that he would not only continue in it, but would not rest until the "Potter Printing-Press" should be acknowledged by all as having no superior. He made new designs, got out new styles of presses. Business rapidly increased until in 1865, not being able to attend to it alone, he associated with him as partner J. F. Hubbard, of Plainfield, under the firm-name of "C. Potter, Jr., & Co.," giving him a one third interest for two thousand five hundred dollars. Mr. Potter was now able to settle all his indebtedness, paying all claims in full. He at once removed the manufacture of his presses to Norwich, Conn., making arrangements for their manufacture with J. M. Huntington & Co. This business relation continued until 1877, when, upon the death of Mr. Huntington, it was dissolved, and two years later Mr. Hubbard, on account of failing health, also retired from the firm. Mr. Potter then associated with him Mr. H. W. Fish, for twelve years the confidential clerk of the old firm, and Mr. J. M. Fitzworth, his son-in-law, retaining the old firm-name. In 1879 he built new shops for the manufacture of his presses in Plainfield, N. J., contiguous to the New Jersey Central Railroad, which are probably the most complete works of the kind in this country and cover about two acres of ground. A specialty is made of Scott's patent presses, the fastest in the world, which print both sides, cutting, folding, counting, and putting in packages of twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred at the rate of five hundred and twenty newspapers per minute, or thirty-two thousand per hour on a single press, or sixty-four thousand per hour on a double press. In 1850 there were only two printing-press-shops in this country, and of the one doing the most of the business the New York Tribune of that year said, "That the house had built almost one per week of their celebrated presses," probably amounting to seventy-five thousand dollars. It is a safe calculation to say that the other built half as much, making a total of about one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars. The business of the firm of C. Potter, Jr., & Co. for the year 1881 amounted to five hundred thousand dollars. Many firms have been established since 1855 for the manufacture of cylinder-presses, and all save one besides Mr. Potter's have failed. A view of his manufactory will be found on another page of this work. Mr. Potter is a thoroughgoing and enterprising business man, liberal in the support of worthy local enterprises, and has introduced into Plainfield an industry that adds largely to the business interests of the city and gives employment to a large number of mechanics and laborers. In 1850, Mr. Potter was united in marriage to Miss Sarah P., daughter of Deacon Martin and Mehitabel Wilcox, of Unadilla Forks, N. Y., who has borne him four daughters, all of whom are living.

W. Potter Jr

Richard R. Coriell

RICHARD R. CORIELL.

The Coriells are of French ancestry, and tradition traces their origin in New Jersey to three brothers—Elias, Emmanuel, and David—who emigrated from the island of Corsica to America in 1663, one settling at Lambertville, N. J. Abraham Coriell, grandfather of Richard R., settled in Piscataway township from over the mountains, and resided the remainder of his life near Newtown, in Middlesex County, where he reared a family of twelve children. He served as a baker in Gen. Washington's army during the Revolutionary war, was identified with the Presbyterian Church at Bound Brook, and reared his family under religious instruction. He died Sept. 22, 1828, at the advanced age of ninety years. The maternal grandfather of Richard R. Coriell was Abraham Smalley, also of Piscataway township, a large property-owner, who upon his death at an advanced age, having been born in 1756, divided his property among his sixteen children.

Mr. Coriell's father, Richard, born Feb. 3, 1775, died Dec. 17, 1838. His wife, Sarah Smalley, born April 8, 1774, died March 31, 1848. Their children were Ira, born Jan. 24, 1799, deceased; Deborah, born Feb. 25, 1801, died March 6, 1876, was the wife of John Stanford; Catherine S., born March 11, 1805, wife of William B. Fisher, of Illinois; Richard R., born Dec. 1, 1808; Abraham S., born Dec. 5, 1811, deceased; Sarah Ann, born Oct. 12, 1814, deceased; Andrew S., born Oct. 8, 1815, deceased; Abner S., born Nov. 11, 1820, is postmaster at New Market, N. J.

The father of these children, Richard Coriell, was a millwright by trade, and followed this occupation most of his active business life. He was a staunch supporter of Andrew Jackson, although the Coriell family had previously voted with the opposition. His death occurred on his farm at Harris' Lane in Piscataway.

Richard R. Coriell received only the advantages of a common school education during his boyhood, and at the age of seventeen was apprenticed to learn the hatter's trade with Joel Vail, of Green Brook, N. J., with whom he remained for four years. After following this business as a journeyman for nearly two years at Columbus and at New Market, he married on March 7, 1832, Margaret, daughter of Richard Elliott, a native of England, who emigrated to Nova Scotia, where he resided until his death. She was born Jan. 1, 1811, and died in 1869. The children of this marriage are Isabella, deceased, was the wife of Morgan Bird; Robert E., deceased; Richard E., of New York City; William W., a wholesale produce dealer in Plainfield; Sarah, wife of J. W. Johnson, of New York.

After his marriage Mr. Coriell settled at Chester, N. J., where he purchased the hat-factory of Abraham Smalley, and for two years carried on business there. He settled in Plainfield in 1834, where for a time he worked at his trade as a hatter, and then opened a general fancy goods and millinery-store, which he carried on until he retired from business about 1860, since which time he has been engaged in the care of his property. Mr. Coriell united with the Baptist Church at Samptown, N. J., in 1832, and upon his removal to Plainfield joined the Baptist Church of that city, and is a supporter of all worthy local objects.

His present wife, whom he married June 4, 1873, is Sarah, daughter of John C. Peterson, of New York City, and her mother was Sarah Chadwick, a native of Bordentown, N. J. Mrs. Coriell was born May 26, 1820.

EVAN JONES.

Among the active, thoroughgoing business men who have engaged in real estate operations and contributed materially to the growth of modern Plainfield is the subject of this sketch, who, like most men who have won a place in the financial and business circles of the day, early in life contended with straitened circumstances and poverty, and gradually reached success by indomitable perseverance and well-developed calculations. He was born in Cardiganshire, South Wales, on Feb. 24, 1820, and was one in a family of twelve children, seven of whom emigrated to this county at various times. David, deceased, came in 1816, settled in Jersey City, where he carried on the shoe business, and became one of its first aldermen. John settled in the same city about 1828, and was in the same business. Lewis came to Jersey City with his brother Evan in 1836, is a mason by trade, and resided there in 1882; Margaret, wife of Evan Evans, resided in Jersey City until her death; Jane, wife of Evan Davis, resides at the same place, and came to America with her father, John Jones, in 1840; Esther married Benjamin Evans and settled in Ohio. Of the children left at home,—Mary, wife of Capt. John Jones, of New Quay, Daniel, Sarah, Hannah, and Ann,—only the first mentioned survives in 1882. The father of these children died in Jersey City, and was buried in the Jersey City Cemetery.

After landing in Jersey City in 1836, as before stated, Evan Jones, then a lad of sixteen, spent three years in learning the mason's trade with John P. Hill, a contractor and builder there. For one year following he worked as journeyman. In 1840 he returned to his native country, and married, that year, Miss Eleanor Dudley, who was three years his senior and a native of the same place. Returning to this country, and thinking to better himself, he settled at Ravenna, Ohio, where he carried on business for himself for three years. Returning to Jersey City about 1844, for some three years he was the foreman of William Bumstead, and then with small capital established business for himself. Mr. Jones continued business there as a contractor and builder until 1863, with the exception of five years which he spent as a hardware merchant in the city, having erected for his mercantile business a store on Newark Avenue, Nos. 71 and 73, the length of which was ninety-two feet, and the width forty feet, respectively.

In 1863, Mr. Jones settled in Plainfield, where he purchased the Jacob G. Laing farm, containing fifty acres. This property he laid out into village lots and streets, and has erected several substantial dwellings thereon, the whole now being a part of the city of Plainfield.

In 1867, in connection with Job Male, Mr. Jones purchased twenty-four acres of land on the suburbs of Plainfield, which forms one of the most desirable parts of the city for a residence, and is largely built up with residences, many of which are of fine architectural design. The Second Presbyterian Church is built upon this property.

In 1870, Mr. Jones purchased about two acres of land on Park Avenue and Seventh Street, erected a substantial residence thereon, and in 1872 he erected the "Park House" on the same block, an elegantly-designed building of five stories, an attractive and popular resort by people from New York and other cities. An engraving of this favorite hotel may be seen on another page of this work. Mr. Jones has taken a somewhat active part in local matters since he became a resident of Plainfield, and served in the Common Council of the city during its first two terms. Mrs. Jones died in Plainfield in October, 1875, leaving two surviving children,—Lewis Dudley and David D.; one daughter, Catharine, died at the age of eighteen, and five other children died young.

Mr. Jones' present wife, whom he married Dec. 11, 1876, is Emma E., daughter of Abel Ketcham, of Long Island, who has borne him two children,—Sadie Willet and Gracie.

ELIAS R. POPE.

Samuel Pope, his paternal grandfather, resided in Washington Valley, N. J., where he spent his active business life as a farmer. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and after his death his widow, who was before her marriage a Miss Moore, drew a pension. Their six sons were Samuel, Joseph, Squire, James, Henry, and John, and their daughters were Rhoda, wife of Augustus Moore, of Smalleytown, N. J., and Sarah. Of these children, only Rhoda survives in 1882. Samuel settled in Jerseyville, Ill., where he became a wealthy and influential citizen. Squire settled in Wisconsin; the others settled in the vicinity of their birth. John, father of our subject, born in 1807, married Sarah R., daughter of Barzilla Dunham, of New Durham, N. J., who was born in 1812, and survives in 1882. Their children are Elias R.; David S., of Plainfield; Sarah E., deceased, was the wife of Edward Runyon, of Dunellen; Charles S., of Dunellen; Howard A., of the firm of Pope Bros., dry-goods merchants of Plainfield; Simon R. and Asa D., of Dunellen; and James C.

John Pope was a shoe manufacturer at Dunellen during his active business life, and carried on a small farm there. He took no particular part in matters of a public character, but lived a quiet and uneventful life. He was a member of the Seventh-Day Baptist Church at New Market, in Middlesex County, N. J., and for many years served the church as trustee. He died in 1874.

Elias R. Pope, son of John, born at Dunellen March 8, 1836, spent his boyhood at home, and received only the advantages of the school of his native place. At the age of fourteen he went into the busy world to care for himself. Coming to Plainfield, he engaged as a clerk in the general store of Isaac S. Dunham, who was also engaged in the manufacture of clothing. Here he remained for fourteen years, and for three years following he was a partner with Mr. Dunham in his branch store at Basking Ridge. In 1867 he became a member of the firm of Pope, Parse & Mundy, general merchants, at the corner of Front and Somerset Streets, Plainfield. After six years Mr. Mundy withdrew, and for the following three years the firm was known as Pope & Parse. Howard A. and David S. Pope then became partners in the concern, Mr. Parse withdrawing, and the firm of Pope Brothers continued until 1881, when David S. Pope withdrew from the business, and the firm has since continued business under the name of Pope Brothers. In 1872, Mr. Pope turned his attention largely to real estate operations and other business outside of his mercantile operations, and from his first settling in Plainfield he has taken an interest in all that pertains to its growth and prosperity. He was one of the founders of the Dime Savings Institution, organized in 1868, and has been treasurer since. He was one of the directors of the First National Bank for ten years, resigned in 1875, and was one of the organizers of the City National Bank, its president until 1879, and vice-president since. He has been a large stockholder of the Plainfield Gas-light Company since 1873, and one of its directors; one of the board of trustees of the Young Ladies' College for several years, and since 1873 he has been treasurer and one of the board of trustees of the Seventh-Day Baptist Memorial Fund, an endowment fund for the maintenance of Alfred University. He has been president of the board of fire commissioners of Plainfield for fifteen years, and a member of the board for eighteen years, and also a director of Washington Fire Insurance Company of Plainfield, and treasurer since its organization, and secretary for four years.

Mr. Pope has for many years been identified with local politics; was collector and treasurer of Union County in 1874-75, a member of the lower branch of the State Legislature in 1875-76, when he served upon important committees, and he was appointed postmaster of Plainfield Feb. 13, 1882. Mr. Pope is an active, thoroughgoing business man, and readily lends his support to all worthy local objects.

He was united in marriage in 1858 to Hannah, daughter of Joseph P. and Clarissa (Davis) Allen, of Shiloh, Cumberland Co., N. J. Their children are Frank A. and Edward G.

HENRY GOULD LATIMER.

His paternal grandfather, Barzilla, was a jeweler by trade and resided at Wethersfield, Conn., but died at Eastbury, in the same State. His father, Samuel, was prepared for college, but led a business life, and was a druggist at Cromwell, in the same State, and died in Eastbury in 1812. His mother, Anna Stocking, died about 1865 at the advanced age of eighty-seven years. The children of Samuel and Anna Latimer were Albert S., drowned in Lake Champlain; Henry Gould; William, who was in business in Newberne, N. C., died in Hartford, Conn., and was buried at Cromwell; Mary Ann, living in Cromwell; Horace W., of Boston; Zebulon was in business with William in Wilmington, and died in New York in November, 1881.

Henry Gould Latimer, a resident of Plainfield since the spring of 1847, and one of its oldest residents in 1882, was born at Eastbury, Conn., May 2, 1800. At the age of fourteen he began learning the shoemaker's trade, and in 1816 went with his employer to Petersburg, Va., where, on account of the ill treatment of his employer, he remained only a short time, and by arrangement with the captain worked for his passage on board a vessel sailing to New York. Here he was left with only four dollars, but he had a willing heart and ready hands, with a fixed determination to do something for himself. Returning to Connecticut he finished learning his trade of shoemaking. For two years before reaching his majority he was employed at his trade a part of the time, and a part of the time he was employed by his grandfather Stocking on the Connecticut River fishing, where he owned a quarter-right, and also for a short time went to school at Hartford. In 1821 he went to North Carolina as the agent of William Nott, and sold goods through the country for about eight months, and for one year afterward was also in his employ. In 1823 he began business for himself, and sold goods through the country in the same State for two years, and then opened a store at 25 Chapel Hill, of that State. After a few months' business there in 1826 he established business with his brother William at Newberne, N. C., and after three years in 1830 took into the partnership another brother Horace, under the firm-name of H. W. Latimer & Co. They continued a successful mercantile business there until 1836, when Mr. Latimer retired from trade and spent the following ten years in Ohio. He came to Plainfield in the spring of 1847, as before stated, and has resided here since, being mostly engaged in the care of his property. He purchased the old bank property of Moses Y. Beach, and upon its site built his present residence.

Mr. Latimer is of a retiring disposition, never sought public place, is a man of correct habits, good judgment, practical ideas, and by his judicious management has secured a competency. In early life he learned the necessary lessons of economy and self-reliance as the main levers to wealth, and his life is only one of the many examples in this country of men who in boyhood faced with resolution and a purpose in life the obstacles incident to straitened circumstances.

Mr. Latimer is interested in the local improvements of Plainfield, and has been a large contributor to its varied enterprises, and although he has passed four-score years, both mentally and physically he is well preserved. His wife, Sarah Mitchell, a native of Chatham County, N. C., was born in 1816. They have no children, yet Mr. Latimer has assisted others to start out in life.

JACOB KIRKNER.

Mr. Kirkner is the son of Casper and Elizabeth Kirkner, who were of German parentage. He was born June 21, 1839, in Bridgeport, Conn. At the age of three years he removed to Flushing, L. I., and devoted his boyhood to study at the public school. Having been at the age of sixteen deprived by death of his father, he began a career of independence, and secured a position as teacher in the public schools of New York and Brooklyn. This calling was pursued successfully for a period of five years, when, having determined upon a more active business life, he entered the Bank of New York as check clerk, and ultimately became paying teller of the Fourth National Bank of New York.

He was married April 15, 1862, to Miss Annie E., daughter of William P. Moss, of New York. Their children are George M., May S., Carrie E., J. Casper, John W., and Charles L., deceased.

Mr. Kirkner's health having been impaired by close application to business, he left the bank and engaged as a broker in gold and stock operations. He became a member of the New York Stock Exchange, and is still actively interested in banking and a general brokerage business, in which he has been eminently successful.

He removed to Plainfield in 1863, which has since been his place of residence.

His early professional labors naturally rendered the subject of education one of unusual interest to him, and caused his appointment in 1869 as one of the Board of Education of the city of Plainfield, of which he was the efficient secretary until 1881. Dr. Charles H. Stillman, one of the ablest exponents of the admirable school system of the State, was president of the board, and Mr. Kirkner his able and judicious coadjutor. On the death of Dr. Stillman he became his successor, and still fills the office. His experience as an instructor enabled him to exercise much practical wisdom in the administration of his duties, and to successfully continue the measures of his predecessor. Both Mr. and Mrs. Kirkner are members of the Congregational Church of Plainfield, of which the former is a trustee. He donated the land on the corner of Seventh Street and Madison Avenue for the chapel now in process of erection.

Mr. Kirkner may properly be mentioned as a marked example of success, which is the result not so much of early or fortunate surroundings as of the self-reliance, energy, and a steadfast devotion to the principles he espoused at the beginning of his career.

JOB MALE

was born in Somersetshire, England, Aug. 24, 1808. His father, Ambrose Male, by his first marriage to Anna Coxe had children,—James, Betsey, Simon, Sally, now residing at Colborne, Canada, Job, and Ambrose. By a second marriage he had children,—Simeon, John, who died at Colborne in January, 1882, James, William, and Susanna, who resides in Erie County, Pa.

The father, with his first children, second wife, and two eldest children by his second marriage, emigrated to America, landing at New York in May, 1816.

Job Male, then a lad of eight years, went into the busy world to care for himself, and is first found attending the toll-gate over the Hackensack River, and for one and a half years served as clerk in the store of Asa Wright, at Hoboken, N. J. In November, 1819, he removed with his parents to Cobourg, Canada, where they resided until their decease, his father dying about 1861, at the age of eighty.

After remaining there for eight years, Job returned to Jersey City, where he worked at his trade as a carpenter until 1836, when he established business there for himself, and carried it on as a contractor and builder until 1845. Mr. Male was naturally of an ingenious turn of mind, and drew most of the plans for the buildings which he constructed. He then purchased a farm of sixty acres at Scotch Plains, Union Co., N. J., where he removed, and there resided for five years. Returning, he resided in New York and Brooklyn until 1853, when he again settled in Jersey City, and for six years was in the employ of the New Jersey Railroad and Transportation Company, building docks, piers, and reclaiming the river front, which included all east of Hudson Street lying between Essex and Wayne Streets. He planned and built the old circular roof depot for the company, which was five hundred feet in length and one hundred feet wide, and was located where the Pennsylvania Railroad depot now is, many substantial blocks for business, his own residence, and a block of twelve stores on ground which he leased from the company for twenty years, lying on the north side of Montgomery Street, between the Pennsylvania Ferry and Hudson Street, which he sold to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in 1879. He has also built for the Jersey Associates docks and piers for the accommodation of their Cunard steamers on the Jersey City side of the river, and after removing to Plainfield he constructed for this company a pier five hundred feet long, and widened it.

In May, 1866, Mr. Male and his wife, Maria Glaze, made a tour of Europe, and visited the leading cities and places of interest on the continent, and attended the Paris Exposition. Mrs. Male was a daughter of William Glaze, a glass manufacturer of Jersey City, and was born in Staffordshire, England, April 13, 1803. Returning from Europe in July, 1867, after spending a few months at Yonkers and in New York, Mr. Male settled in Plainfield, N. J., then a small village, where he purchased, in connection with Evan Jones, some twenty-four acres of land in the suburbs of the village, laid it out into village lots and streets, and has erected thereon some twenty substantial residences of fine architectural design, drawing the plans for all of them himself. These residences, with their surroundings, make up a most desirable part of the city of Plainfield, and form a part of his estate in 1882, except two, which he has sold. Since his residence in Plainfield, Mr. Male has perhaps contributed as largely to building up and beautifying the city as any other man, and has been liberal of his means in all worthy enterprises tending to its prosperity. While a resident of Jersey City he was a member of its Board of Education for several years, a member of the City Council, was a director of the Hudson County Bank for twenty years following its organization, and president of it for several years. He was an advocate for the incorporation of Plainfield as a city, and was its first chief magistrate for two years. Although he received a limited education from books during his boyhood, he is a man of practical business ideas, possesses strong force of character, and may be safely classed among the self-made, enterprising business men of the times.

He gave the ground upon which the hospital was erected, and is a worthy supporter of church, school, and kindred interests.

His life has been almost wholly devoted to business pursuits, and is one of the many striking examples in this country of what industry, self-reliance, and judicious management can accomplish towards securing a fair competency, and at the same time fulfill the full duty of a respectable, honorable, and useful citizen.

WILLIAM McDOWELL CORIELL.

The Coriells in New Jersey are descendants of three brothers,—Elias, Emmanuel, and David,—who emigrated from the island of Corsica in 1663, and were of the French-Huguenot stock. One branch of the family settled at Lambertville, N. J. Coryell's Ferry was famous as the place of Washington's crossing of the Delaware in the time of the Revolution.

His paternal great-grandfather, David, born Dec. 19, 1735, married Elizabeth Whitehead, who was born June 19, 1737, and bore him children,—Elisha, Rachel, David, Alice, grandmother of Chancellor Runyon, of Newark; Samuel, Elizabeth, Susannah, grandmother of Judge Runyon, of Plainfield; Isaac, father of Dr. Coriell, of New Market; and Abraham.

Elisha Coriell, grandfather of our subject, first resided at New Market, and subsequently at Dunellen, Middlesex Co., and his farm of two hundred acres was a part of the present site of the village of Dunellen. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and received a pension after its close. He was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church at Bound Brook for many years, and at the time of his death. His wife, Mary, daughter of Luke Covert, bore him children,—Ephraim, father of our subject; Elizabeth, wife of Zachariah Pound, of Dunellen; Anne, wife of David Laforge, Newtown; Sally, unmarried; Harriet, wife of David Vankirk, resides in Somerville, N. J., and is eighty-four years old; and David, who resided on the homestead property until his death. By a second marriage to Nancy Dunn, Elisha Coriell had children,—Eunice Maria, wife of Isaac Van Nostrand; Caroline, wife of Ralph Conover.

Ephraim Coriell, born Nov. 21, 1790, was killed by accident near Bound Brook by the cars on the railroad, Sept. 7, 1857. He obtained a part of the homestead at Dunellen by purchase and by inheritance, where he spent his life as a farmer. He was formerly a member of the Presbyterian Church at Bound Brook, and was one of the founders of the First Presbyterian Church of Plainfield, and one of its ruling elders. He was also one of the founders of the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church of Plainfield, and one of its ruling elders until his death. Ephraim Coriell was a representative man of his township, and served several years on the board of chosen freeholders. His wife, Sally, born Aug. 11, 1791, whom he married Dec. 26, 1811, died April 2, 1873. She was a daughter of Levi and Sarah Lenox, of Plainfield.

Levi Lenox was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and died Dec. 24, 1828, aged about eighty years, and his wife, Sarah, died Feb. 25, 1837, aged eighty-five years.

The children of Ephraim and Sally Coriell are Levi L., born Sept. 5, 1812, died young; William McDowell, born Dec. 19, 1815; and Abraham, born June 27, 1819, is an ex-member of the State Legislature from Somerset County, N. J., and resides near Dunellen.

William McDowell Coriell received the common advantages of a district school education during his boyhood, and at the age of seventeen began learning the hatters' trade with Van Nostrand & Conover, before mentioned, hat manufacturers at what is now Evona, in Plainfield township.

After reaching his majority, having completed his trade, he spent a few years at home, and without pecuniary assistance, but with a resolve to do something for himself, he worked for a few years as a journeyman at his trade. In 1844, with five others as partners, with small capital, he began hat manufacturing at the factory formerly occupied by Van Nostrand & Conover, which continued for only one year.

In 1846 he bought the same factory, and there manufactured hats until 1849, when he built his present manufactory near the railroad, where he has continued business since. His business has increased annually, and from the manufacture of thirty dozen full stiff-napped hats per week at the beginning he now turns out upwards of one hundred dozen per week of fine soft fur hats.

In 1842 he settled on the homestead formerly owned by his grandfather Lenox, upon which in 1856 he built his present substantial residence, which is near his manufactory.

Mr. Coriell was formerly a director and stockholder in the old Union County Bank of Plainfield; was one of the founders of the First National Bank, which took the place of the other, and has been a director since its organization; is one of the directors of the Washington Fire Insurance Company of Plainfield, a member of the Common Council for several years after the incorporation of Plainfield as a city, and he was one of the founders of the Crescent Avenue Presbyterian Church, and succeeded his father as one of its ruling elders in 1858. He married Oct. 20, 1840, Eliza C., daughter of Benjamin Runyon, of Plainfield, who was born March 8, 1819, and died Jan. 2, 1881. Their children are William Henry, Ephraim, born Dec. 16, 1842, died April 5, 1875, leaving two sons, Raymond and Ephraim, Benjamin Franklin, a partner with his father in the hat business; and Levi and David, who died young.

CHAPTER XLIX.

TOWNSHIP OF WESTFIELD.

Original Boundaries.—The Legislature of New Jersey on the 27th of January, 1794, enacted that all that part of the township of Elizabethtown lying within the following lines, to wit: Beginning at the line of the county of Middlesex, where the North and West Branches of Rahway River meet and form a junction; from thence running up the North Branch of Rahway River to the mouth of Nomahiggins Branch, it being the southeast corner of the township of Springfield; from thence running with the line of Springfield aforesaid in a course north forty-nine degrees west to the top of the mountain; from thence on the course to the East Branch of Green Brook; thence down said branch and Green Brook to the line that divides the counties of Essex and Middlesex; thence along the line of Middlesex to the place of beginning, should be set off from the township of Elizabethtown and "made a separate township, to be called by the name of the township of Westfield."

The above, copied from township records of Westfield, 1794, is signed by David Osborn, town clerk.

Plainfield, formerly the southwest extremity of the township of Westfield, was set off into a township in the year 1847. Cranford, formerly the southeasterly extremity of the township, was set off into a township in the year 1870. Fanwood (Scotch Plains), formerly the southwesterly extremity of the township, was set off into a township in the year 1877.

Natural Features.—The northwesterly portion of this township is bounded by the Blue Ridge, called the Westfield Mountains, to the line of Green Brook. The southern part is level or gently undulating. There are no very considerable elevations, except the Short Hills. The soil is chiefly a stiff clay loam and red shale to the southward, with many of the drift rock and red sandstone lying loosely upon its surface. The soil changes somewhat to a gravelly loam on the borders of Clark and Cranford townships. There are many large drift boulders deposited all along the Springfield road in the valley of the Blue Hills, and when broken up are in demand for building purposes. They are mostly a granite intermixed with hornblende and the red sandstone. This township is well watered, and has many facilities for manufacturing.

Organization.—Westfield frontier included in 1699 all back of the Elizabethtown borough, being part of Piscataway, in Middlesex County, New Providence, then called Turkey, Plainfield, Scotch Plains, Westfield township, which included Cranford, Clark, and parts of Rahway townships. It took its name, it is said, from the fields west of Elizabethtown, and went by the name of the Westfields.¹

¹ It has been stated that the settlement of Westfield dates back to the last year (1699) of the seventeenth century. It was the result of what was called "The Clinker Lot Division." Almost immediately after that

Wm M D Horner

It remained part of the borough of Elizabethtown until the 27th January, 1794, when it was set off by an act of the Legislature.

At this time there was but one religious organization in the village, about fourteen houses, one store, one blacksmith-shop, one tavern, and one school-house. It had been in substantially this condition for nearly or quite a century, there was absolutely no growth or increase whatever; the erection of new buildings barely kept pace with the natural decay and dilapidation; the erection of a new barn or house formed an era in the history of the town. The community were tillers of the soil, and improved their lands, cutting and clearing this large township of its heavy timber, and now in this century a beautiful village bedecks the plain, and cultivated fields, farm-houses, fine residences, and numerous groves of verdant trees are spread around in pleasing profusion.

Civil List.—At the first annual meeting of Westfield township, held on Monday, the 14th day of April, 1794, the first town officers were elected. Daniel Marsh, Esq., acted as moderator of the meeting.¹ The following have been town officers since that date:

ent districts in said township to repair the roads in manner as is directed in and by the said act, which was done accordingly. Daniel Marsh, Esq., chairman; Capt. Charles Clark, Luke Covert, and Ezra Darby, committee."

Early Settlement.—The first settlements were made in this township as the "West Field,"—that is, the western field of the borough of Elizabeth,—about the year 1720. The following are found among the first names: Acken, Badgley, Baker, Bryant, Brooks, Crane, Clark, Craig, Cory, Connet, Davis, Denman, Dunham, Frazee, Frost, Gennings, Hendrix, Hinds, High, Hetfield, Hole, Lambert, Littell, Ludlum, Meeker, Miller, Marsh, Mills, Pierson, Robinson, Ross, Spinnage, Scudder, Tucker, Terry, Williams, Woodruff, Wilcox, Yeomans.

Some of these names have disappeared and new ones come in, but most of them are still common in the township. Messrs. Nathaniel and Henry Baker, brothers, came from Easthampton, Long Island, and bought and lived where the widow of the late Mr. Jacob Baker resided. Afterwards Mr. Nathaniel Baker soon bought and occupied the property of Mr. Thomas Clark adjoining the parsonage. Henry Baker first lived half a mile from Westfield Church towards Springfield. He married Phebe Hedges, of Long Island, and had six children: 1. Daniel, born 3d June, 1753, and died 2d September, 1788. He married Margaret Osborn, born 14th July, 1760. 2. William, who married Jemina Woodruff, daughter of Thomas Woodruff, Esq. 3. Jonathan I., married, first, Keziab Clark, and second, Charity Clark, sisters, daughters of Jesse Clark, Esq. 4. Jeremiah, married 4th March, 1798, Mary King. They moved to Dover, Morris County. He was born 28th August, 1770; she was born 9th June, 1778. 5. Phebe, married Ziba Ludlow, of Berkshire Valley, Morris County; and 6th. Henry, Jr.

Joseph Acken was one of the first members of what was called the Log Church, and made deacon April 7, 1769, and died Aug. 22, 1804. He had five children,—Robert, Jonathan, Sarah (who married Moses McManners), Polly (who married John Ludlow, Jr.), and Phebe Acken (who married John Davis and had seven children, Joseph, Phebe, Mary, Rebecca, Betsey, Jacob, Thomas, and Sarah Anne).

John Briant lived where Mr. John R. Miller now resides. Col. Jacob Crane lived where Mr. Josiah Crane resided for many years and there died. The colonel was for several years a member of the Colonial Legislature, and died 1759, having long been (as we read on his tombstone) on the committee, and a zealous defender of the associate or town rights.

Mr. Jonathan Crane resided where Mr. John Wheeler Foster lived and died, and was for some time an alderman of the borough of Elizabeth, to which this township was until the year 1794. Mr. William Clark lived where Mr. Abner Miller lived. Mr. James Craig lived and owned the farm where ¹ It is with some difficulty that we can trace the Justices of this township back of the year 1844, but we believe the list as far as we can give it is correct.

William Clark

Mr. Andrew Craig lived and died a few years ago. Gardner Connett, or Connet, lived near Lambert Mills. John Davis lived near the Branch Mills, and John Denman lived near Cranford. Isaac and Moses Frazee lived where Deacon Henry Baker, Jr., resided.

Mr. Abner Frost owned where James Roll lived. Mr. Isaac Hendrix resided on the farm formerly owned by Mr. Elias Potter. Mr. Samuel Hinds resided at a factory called Williams'. Mr. John High lived in 1753 where the Widow Rachel Mooney resided. Mr. John Lambert, son of Roger Lambert, of Wiltshire, England, and grandfather of James Lambert, lived where Zophar Hetfield, Jr., resided. Messrs. Anthony, Andrew, Abraham, Absalom, Moses, and John Littell resided at the Willow Grove. Mr. Cornelius Ludlum, or Ludlow, owned and lived in 1734 on the premises of the late Mrs. Parsel and Mr. Sanford Vreeland. Mr. John Meeker lived where Mr. Joseph Ogden Meeker lived. Mr. Jonathan Marsh resided where the Widow Keziah Ludlow owned. Mr. Ephraim Marsh lived where Mr. Theophilus Pierson died, now owned by his son, Oliver Pierson. Mr. Marsh lived where Mr. Charles Marsh, Jr., does. Mr. William Miller lived where his grandson, Mr. Clark Miller, resided. He was long an alderman of this ward (Westfield), in the borough of Elizabeth. He was a large landholder, and when he came here his nearest neighbor was Mr. John Lambert, Peter Willcoxsie and James Badgley being from him a distance of some miles; others soon gathered around him. Mr. John Miller settled where his grandson, Mr. Abner Miller, resided. He, too, was a deacon in the church, a very regular attendant on the sanctuary, and generally in early life came to the church on foot, and had the curiosity to count the steps from his dwelling to the church. Mr. Enoch Miller came from East-hampton, Long Island, and lived where his sons John and Jacob lived until they settled on their farms near the homestead. The house is still standing, but was altered a few years ago. Mr. William Marsh's house stood in the field opposite the late Mr. Edward Townley's. Mr. Joshua Marsh resided where the widow of Deacon Squier Pierson resides. Mr. Joseph Mills' house stood in the field west of Mr. Samuel Downer's house, and was removed a few years ago to the front of the Westfield road, adjoining the property of the late Maj. Aaron Ball's property, and D. W. Lamont purchased the late Josie Mills' house, as it was called, a few years ago. Mr. William Pierson came from Bridgehampton, on Long Island, and resided where Mr. Sylvanus Pierson died, and where Silas D. Pierson lived, near the late Eli Marsh's farm. Mr. Daniel Pierson resided where Andrew H. Clark, Esq., lived and died, and now occupied by his son, Lawrence Clark. Mr. David Pierson resided where lived William Clark, Jr., now owned by the Clark family. Mr. John Robinson resided nearly opposite Mr. Sanford Vreeland's. Mr. John Ross resided where Gideon Ross, Esq., lived, and still remains in the Ross family.

Mr. John Ross was in 1743 mayor of the borough of Elizabeth. A Mr. Daniel Ross resided a short distance east of Mr. Amos Scudder's. Mr. John Spinage lived where Mr. L. H. Miller owned. Mr. Ephraim Scudder owned and resided on the Rahway road. The farms are still owned by the families of Scudder. It was purchased by the ancestor of the Scudders from a Mr. Nicholls, of Boston, Mass., and was long known as the Nicholls place. Capt. John Scudder resided in the centre of Judge Coe's farm. Mr. Warner Tucker resided where Mr. Robert French lived. Mr. Thomas Terry came from Riverhead, on Long Island, and resided on what was known as the John Terry farm. Mr. — Williams lived on the Jonathan Williams farm. Jonathan Woodruff resided where Jonathan Woodruff, Esq., lived and died, back of the church on Mountain road. Mr. John Woodruff lived where Mr. Sylvanus Pierson resided.

The Indians frequently annoyed these early settlers, and many incidents are handed down to the present generation. It is said that they had growing tobacco and peas, and had some fruit-trees; they had salt and copper beads as well as copper pipes. "There was many battles fought, and the last one about one mile from Westfield Mountain, New Springfield," which resulted in the defeat of the Indians, who were pursued as far as they could be and leave time for their pursuers to reach home at night.

The commencement of what is called the French war in Canada drew off the Indians in that direction, and they never returned in great numbers to this vicinity, and the few that came back resided near the Branch Mills. Their burial-ground is to be found on the late Jacob Miller farm, on a line of the mill stream.

It appears from various records that the early settlers were troubled with wolves, "which caused considerable annoyance. A bounty of thirty shillings was offered for every one that might be killed."

"Ash Swamp, Short Hills, July 16, 1750. About ten days ago a shower of hail as big as hens' eggs destroyed fields of wheat and corn, limbs of trees broke to pieces, and of birds and fowls scarce one was saved."

An advertisement of a singing-school fixes the terms at one dollar for thirteen nights, or two dollars a quarter, subscribers to find their own wood and candles.

The clothing of the pioneers was spun and woven by the women. In almost every household women wore their linsey-woolsey and made the clothes for the family. Nearly every head of family tanned his own leather. The tan-vat of those days was a large trough sunk in the ground; bark was shaved and pounded; ashes were used in place of lime for taking off the hair; bears' and hogs' lard and tallow answered in place of fish oil. The currying was done with a large knife, and the blacking was made of soot and hogs' lard. They made plows of wood and barrows with wooden teeth. They also made their own cooperware. Some who could not do these things for themselves gave their labor to those who could, and so all were profited and materially accommodated.

At that time when the young corn came it was a perfect jubilee among the young people. They would roast it with husks on in the ashes, and considered it a very great delicacy. Afterwards when it became hard they would grate it on a home-manufactured grater and bake the coarse meal, calling it johnny-cake, which they would take on long journeys in the interior. The hand-mills and hominy blocks were found in most of their homes.

The following prices current for the year 1705 and earlier are subjoined for the entertainment of the curious: Veal, $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ to $2d.$ per pound; beef, do.; venison, $1d.$; capons, $1s. 6d.$; hens, $9d.$; ducks, $13\frac{1}{2}d.$; Indian corn, $1s. 6d.$; turnips, $1s.$; oats, $22\frac{1}{2}d.$; salt, $4s.$ to $5s.$; cider, $13s.$ a barrel; sugar, $6d.$; hops, $1s.$; wearing, $8d.$ a yard; a day's work, $2s. 3d.$ for man, $1s.$ for woman; powder, $3s. 6d.$ per pound; shot, $4\frac{1}{2}d.$ per pound; oxen, $\$4$ $10s.$; colts, $14s.$; salt shad, $3d.$ each; oysters, $9d.$ per hundred; wheat, $4s.$ to $6s.$ per bushel; buckwheat, $2s.$; rye, $3s. 4\frac{1}{2}d.$; pears, $4s.$; apples, $2s.$ to $3s.$; butter, $4s. 6d.$ per pound; cheese, $4\frac{1}{2}d.$ per pound; flax, $9d.$ per pound; raccoon-skins, $1s. 6d.$ each; shingles, $3s. 6d.$ per hundred; clapboards, $5s.$ per hundred; rails, $6s.$ per hundred; tobacco, $5s.$ per pound; gloves, $4s. 6d.$. Here you see the great difference in prices of nearly two hundred years ago. Many of the goods they imported. For instance, black silk, $4s. 6d.$; stockings, $5s.$; pins, 27 cents a paper, etc. The men wore broad-brimmed hats turned up at the corners, with short pants, lappels and vests worn long, large pocket-fold, and the coats with straight collars, cuffs, and generally gilt or silver buttons; shoes with steel or silver buckles. Many had lace ruffles to their shirt-bosoms; their hair behind tied in a cue with ribbons, generally brown or black.

Speaking of the inhabitants composing this settlement, the first deputy of the Quaker proprietors, Thomas Rudyard, says, "The people were generally a sober, professing people, wise in their generation, courteous in their behavior, and respectful to those in office." The Governor, Gawen Laurie, assures us that there was not in all the parish a poor body or one in want. Their treatment of their servants was mild, and they had beef, pork, bacon, pudding, butter, milk, and good beer and cider to drink.

On coming to this Westfield frontier the pioneers came to an uncultivated soil, and had many hardships and privations to encounter, but there was among them a great degree of kindness, and every man helped his neighbor. As a former resident remarks, "Hardly any were without the means of support, and none thought himself too rich to live without labor, and we are not the less happier for it, but the more so."

The record of the Pierson family is somewhat brief and imperfect. The first emigration was from England to Boston or Lynn, Mass., about A.D. 1635, and from there to Southampton, L. I., which place they with others founded A.D. 1640. Two brothers are named, Rev. Abraham Pierson and Henry Pierson. Dissatisfaction arose, and Rev. Abraham Pierson and a part of the colony removed to Connecticut, and afterwards to Newark, N. J., which city they founded. Henry Pierson remained at Southampton, L. I., and some of his descendants emigrated to Westfield, N. J., and the names of these are recorded among the early settlers, viz.: William, Daniel, and David. David Pierson married Esther Badgley, and they had eight children: 1, Stephen, born Feb. 10, 1763; 2, Hannah, born Nov. 2, 1765; 3, Squire, born April 20, 1767; 4, David, born Aug. 28, 1770; 5, Moses (1st), born Oct. 9, 1774; 6, Moses (2d), born Oct. 15, 1776; 7, Samuel, born Aug. 6, 1778; 8, Daniel, born Jan. 1, 1783. David, their father, was born Feb. 10, 1737, and died 1790. These have all passed away, and we know nothing of them except the children of Squire Pierson, son of the third child, or Squire first. Our immediate ancestor was Moses Pierson, the fifth son of David and Esther Badgley Pierson, born Oct. 15, 1776. Just one hundred and five years ago his mother died when he was quite young, and he left home early, without education, and fared hardly in his young days. He learned the trade of a carpenter, and gave himself an education to fit him for the duties of life. At about thirty-one years of age he married Miss Elizabeth Martin Brown, of Woodbridge, N. J., by whom he had nine children, six sons and three daughters. They journeyed along in life together for more than fifty years, and now rest side by side in the quiet cemetery of Westfield, N. J.

Moses Pierson, born 1776, died 1857, aged eighty-one; married 1807.

Elizabeth Martin, born 1784, died 1862, aged seventy-eight; married 1807.

Their children:

William Martin Pierson, born Aug. 12, 1808.

Daniel Brown Pierson, born Jan. 10, 1810.

Charlotte Martin Pierson, born July 11, 1811.

George Washington Pierson, born Nov. 2, 1813.

Daniel Marsh Pierson, born Feb. 3, 1815.

John Pierson Pierson, born Nov. 4, 1816.

Charles Pierson Pierson, born Aug. 7, 1818.

Araline Martin Pierson, born Nov. 18, 1820.

Lydia Smith Pierson, born Aug. 20, 1822.

At a reunion held at the residence of Mrs. Charlotte Mendell, Cranford, N. J., Oct. 15, 1881, these were all present except David, who died in 1867, with their children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren.

In Westfield the first who kept store was Samuel Downer (1st); he died Oct. 22, 1824, at the age of one hundred and one years. His son Samuel (2d) took his place, and for many years until his death, which took place May 29, 1846, in his eighty-sixth year, was the store-keeper opposite the village. He was the first postmaster and elder in the Presbyterian Church. William H. Pierson occupied the store after his death, and built the present one, now belonging to Mr. Gideon Ludlow.

William Black

A. H. Clark,

Thomas Baker kept a store on the corner of the Westfield road and road to Rahway for many years, now known as the Dr. Corra Osborn house.

Isaac H. Pierson, Esq., for a few years kept a store where he resided and died, opposite the village green. He was school-teacher and justice of the peace.

Charles Clark was store-keeper and postmaster on the corner of main road and road what was called the Jerusalem. He died suddenly in the year 1869.

Mr. Henry B. Morehouse occupied the store when Mr. Pierson vacated, and went into the coal and lumber business, he being the first one in Westfield in the business, in 1859, but after a few years he sold the business to Joseph Moffitt, and was appointed ticket agent at the Westfield depot. Mr. Morehouse lives at the present time in Plainfield.

Daniel Baker was tanner and currier, and his house and shops were near the late Mrs. Abby Clark's property, by Clark's Lake, now called. He carried on the business until his death, which took place Jan. 15, 1776. He married Abigail Hendricks, of Westfield.
